"The question, therefore, comes to be whether the defenders belong to the limited class of singular successors who are enfranchised by the feu-contract, so as to entitle them to an entry on payment of the taxed composition, or whether they are in the position of ordinary purchasers, who can come in only under the Montrose v.

Provan's

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(First) The taxation was a benefit intended for the heir of the tenant and the first purchaser from him. That was a natural provision, for the feuars had been kindly tenants, and it was likely that their lord would wish to do them a favour, while there was no reason why he should not take a full composition from a second assignee.¹ Such a clause as this was to be read most strictly in favour of the superior,² the reason being that at this time the superior could not be compelled to receive any singular successors at all, unless comprisers. Comprisers were by the deed excluded from the benefit of the taxed entry. "Assignees" was generally read as meaning "assignees before infeftment," and it had been held that the entry of singular successors was not taxed, even where the charter conveyed the lands to heirs and assignees, with a provision that so often as the lands fell to the superior "by reason of life-rent, escheat, non-entry, or otherwise, for whatsoever occasion," they should be given out again to the vassal "and his foressaids" at a taxed entry.³ The principle of this decision had been recently affirmed.⁴ Here "assignees" meant the first assignee after infeftment only. So much must be conceded, but the concession by the superior should not be carried any further. [LORD YOUNG.—Is there any case in the books where "assignee" has been read in that sense?] No; but that was the result of construing this deed as strictly as its words would allow in favour of the superior. The taxation was only in favour of persons buying from the feuars "or yr forsaids," and the antecedent to "forsaids" was "air or aires." In other parts of the deed the feuars, "their aires and successors," were spoken of, an expression which made the words of the taxing-clause all the more significant.

(Second) No assignees who were not of the quality of "three chalders" could claim to take benefit by the taxation. That was a general measure of value, and included rental of any kind, not necessarily agricultural rent only. That fancied limitation had its origin in the fact that chalders were now only used as a measure in the case of stipends dependent on teinds, statutes enabling singular successors to compel an entry, so that, prior to the Act of 1874, they could not have obtained a charter except on payment of a year's rent, and are now liable under that Act for a similar payment by reason of their implied entry.

"I am of opinion that, in so far as regards the parcel first described in the conclusions of the summons, they are liable only for the taxed composition, because I think they answer the description of buyers who 'do not exceed three chalders victual in yearly rent.' Victual rent is a term applicable only to the rent of agricultural subjects, and the defenders, although they have heritable property in Glasgow, have no property yielding an agricultural rental.

"It is true that the purpose of the stipulation has entirely failed, and that the superior has no interest in excluding vassals holding lands elsewhere, even if he had power to exclude them. But the obligation to accept a taxed composition from purchasers having a limited rental still remains an integral part of the contract constituting the relation of superior and vassal. It is an obligation which was plainly intended to follow the transmissions of the feu in perpetuity, and I see no reason to doubt that the defenders are entitled to enforce it.

"As to the second parcel, the defenders concede that they must pay the sum claimed by the superior, because by their infeftment in the first parcel they became proprietors of land exceeding the stipulated value."

and limited to agricultural rent. The superior obviously desired to have as his vassals a class of coloni with no very great holdings, so that if one applied for an entry who was not of that class he could not claim the benefit, while, if the subject itself had increased in value, the whole meaning of the clause was lost, and it could avail no one. There had been an impression among kindly tenants that they had a right to assign to persons of their own rank,¹ and the provisions of this charter gave expression to that contention.

Duke of Montrose v.
Trustees.

Argued for the respondents;—It was conceded by his Grace that the term “assignees” could not in this deed be confined to assignees before infeftment—a limitation for which, no doubt, some authority might be found. For the use of “assignees” in the sense now contended for no authority could be cited, and the clauses of the deed did not bear it out. “Yr fords” was said to have reference to “air or aires,” but that term was used indiscriminately throughout the deed as equivalent to the other phrase “aires and successors.” It was remarkable, too, that the Earl was given power to pursue in his own Court for the taxed entry-money “of ilk laill air and new conqueischer,” an expression which pointed to a series of singular successors.

As regarded the quality of the vassal, the qualification of three chalders must be looked for not merely in agricultural rental, but in rental upon the Earl's estate, one of the objects being to prevent latifundia, or the accumulation of many feus in one hand. It was on that footing that the defenders had agreed to pay a full year's rent in the case of their second holding. It could not be that when a richer person came forward he was to pay more, for richer persons were excluded altogether, the explanation being that which the Lord Ordinary had adopted.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This is an action for the payment of casualties under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. It is admitted that a casualty is due in respect of each of the parcels of land described in the conclusions of the summons, in consequence of the death of the last entered vassal; and the only question is, whether the composition payable by the defenders has been taxed, or whether they are liable for a year's rent of the lands.

The Lord Ordinary explains that as to the second parcel “the defenders concede that they must pay the sum claimed by the superior,—that is to say, a year's rent of the feu, because by their infeftment in the first parcel they became proprietors of land exceeding the stipulated value,—that is to say, three chalders victual in yearly standand rent.”

The controversy therefore relates to the liability of the defenders for a year's rent of the first of the subjects described in the conclusions of the summons, and the answer depends on the construction to be put on the second part of the obligation by which the superior binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, “to accept and receive the heir or heirs of the said John Wair, Archibald Buchanan, and George Macindoe, respective and successive, in and to their particular parts of the foresaid twenty shilling land, with the pertinents as above described, . . . and also shall receive in and to the foresaid lands ony tenant that shall happen to buy the same frae the saids persons, or ony of them, or their foreseids, the buyers thereof not exceeding the rank above written.”

This latter provision is that with which alone we are now concerned, though for its interpretation it is necessary to take into account the first part of the clause which has just been quoted. The pursuers contend that the true interpretation is that the obligation to receive "in and to the foresaid lands any tenant that shall happen to buy the same fra the saids persons, or ony of them, or their foresaids," is only to receive any buyer from these persons, or their heir or heirs.

The defenders, on the other hand, contend that the obligation extends not only to buyers from the original feuars, or their heir or heirs, but also to buyers from buyers, or their heir or heirs. The Lord Ordinary has adopted the latter view, and I concur in his judgment, the reasons for which are explained in his note. My view of the matter is short and simple. I think that by the words "from the said persons, or any of them, or their foresaids," we are referred back to the dispositive clause of the feu-contract, which bears that the superior has "set and in feu-ferm and heritage perpetually demitts, as he by thir presents sets and in feu-ferm and heritage perpetually demitts to the said John Wair, and his heirs whatsoever or assignees (wha shall not exceed three chalders victual in yearly standant rent), heritably, perpetually, and irredeemably, all and whole," &c. The assignees who are here mentioned are not merely those to whom assignation has been granted before infeftment on the feu-charter was exped, but "ony tenant that shall happen to buy the same from the saids persons, or ony of them, or their foresaids." These assignees are entitled to acquire the lands; they are entitled, for that is the clear implication, to convey the lands, and those to whom they convey, as much as the assignees themselves, are entitled to an entry on the terms which are specified in this clause of obligation.

This appears to me to be the true, and it is the natural, interpretation, for the idea that a buyer from an heir was to be received by payment of a taxed composition, and that a buyer from him was to be received only on payment of a year's rent, is a fanciful and unreasonable intention to ascribe to a superior. The view of the contract taken by the Lord Ordinary seems to me to be warranted by the terms of the feu-contract itself, and to be recommended by the considerations which influenced him in reaching his conclusion.

With reference to the other question, whether the defenders are not in the sense of the feu-charter "three chalder men," I think it unnecessary to say anything, as that subject is as good as exhausted by the explanation given by the Lord Ordinary.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

Succession—Mutual Testament—Husband and Wife—Protected Succession.—

A husband and wife executed a mutual deed whereby, on the narrative of their affection to each other, and for other good causes, they each bequeathed to the other, if survivor, the whole moveable estate of which the predeceaser might die possessed, and severally constituted the survivor executor and universal legatory of the predeceaser, and, on the further narrative that they were desirous to settle the succession to their moveable estate in the event of the decease of the longest liver of them, they jointly and severally, and each of them, whichever of them might be the survivor, bequeathed the whole moveable property of which the longest liver might die possessed to certain relatives of the husband, one of whom was appointed executor to the surviving spouse. A power of revocation was reserved to the spouses jointly, and to the husband if survivor.

No. 75.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Nicoll's Executors v. Hill,

The husband died shortly after the execution of the deed, and the wife survived for over twenty years. She had no separate estate, and her only means of support were her husband's moveable property, which she took under the deed, amounting to about £300, and the liferent of her husband's heritage, about £75 a-year, which she enjoyed under another settlement by him. She was able to save considerable sums of money, which she, with the view of defeating the legacies to her husband's relatives in the mutual deed, placed in bank on deposit-receipt or on current account in the names of various persons to whom she wished to make donations, who on her death uplifted the money, and declined to account therefor to the general legatees, who had been appointed executors-dative to the widow. The latter accordingly brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment.

Held that the deed conveyed the moveable property of the predeceasing spouse to the survivor absolutely in fee, and that quoad ultra the deed was merely the testament of the surviving spouse and revocable by her, and that therefore the donations made by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, were effectual.

On 17th July 1863 David Nicoll, feuar in Dundee, and Isabella Key^{2d Division.} or Nicoll, his wife, executed a deed in the following terms:—"We, David^{Lord M'Laren.} Nicoll," &c., "from our affection to each other, and for other good causes, have agreed, with mutual advice and consent, to grant these presents in manner underwritten,—that is to say, I, the said David Nicoll, do hereby leave, legate, assign, and bequeath to and in favour of the said Isabella Key or Nicoll, in case she shall survive me," the whole moveables that might belong to him at the time of his death. Mrs Nicoll then made a similar bequest in favour of her husband, and they severally constituted the survivor to be sole executor and universal legatory of the predeceaser. The deed then proceeded:—"Moreover we, the said David Nicoll and Isabella Key or Nicoll, being desirous to settle the succession to our moveable and personal estate in the event of the death of the longest liver of us, therefore we do hereby jointly and severally, and each of us, whichever of us may be the survivor, leave, legate, assign, and bequeath in that event to and in favour of James Nicoll, basket and toy merchant in Dundee; Charles Nicoll, engineer, Victoria Docks, London; Robert Nicoll, seaman in Dundee; William Marshall Nicoll, mill overseer there; and Helen Nicoll or Cooper, widow of the deceased William Cooper, seaman in Dundee, and the survivors or survivor of them, equally among them, share and share alike, declaring that the lawful issue of any predeceaser or predeceasers leaving lawful issue shall nevertheless be entitled to such share as their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled to if alive. All and Sundry the whole goods, gear, debts, sums of money, household furniture and plenishing, books, bed and table linen, paraphernalia, and all other moveables whatsoever, including heirship moveables, that may pertain and belong or be resting owing to the longest liver of us at the time of his or her decease, with the whole vouchers and instructions thereof, and all that has followed or may be competent to follow thereon: And further, we do hereby severally nominate, constitute, and appoint the said William Marshall Nicoll, whom failing, the said James Nicoll, and whom failing, William Nicoll, son of the said James Nicoll, to be the executor of the longest liver of us respectively, with all the powers of the office: But these presents are granted always with and under the burden of all the just and lawful debts, sickbed and funeral charges, of the longest

No. 75. liver of us, and the legacy hereinafter appointed to be paid and delivered: And we ordain our said executor to pay and deliver the following legacy to the person after named and designed, viz., to Ann Nicoll Callender, presently residing with us, the sum of £30 sterling." They then revoked all former wills of moveable property, and reserved "full power to us at any time during our joint lives, and to me, the said David Nicoll, if I shall be the survivor, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, as may be thought proper: But declaring always that these presents, in so far as not altered, innovated, or revoked as aforesaid, shall be effectual, though undelivered, wherever found, the delivery thereof being hereby dispensed with."

Nicoll's Ex-
ecutors v. Hill,
&c.

Mr Nicoll died in September 1863. His widow survived till January 1886. The spouses never exercised the joint power of revocation reserved in the deed.

The inventory of Mr Nicoll's estate amounted to £80 (including household furniture), and the pursuers of the action to be mentioned stated (what the defenders denied) that Mrs Nicoll also, shortly after her husband's death, received payment of a debt of £150 due to him. She had no separate estate of her own, and her only source of livelihood beyond what she took under the mutual deed was derived from the liferent of her husband's heritable property, amounting to about £75 per annum, which she took under a disposition and settlement by him, dated in 1862.

Being of very parsimonious habits, Mrs Nicoll was able during the twenty-three years which elapsed between her husband's death and her own to save considerable sums of money, which she placed on deposit-receipt or in bank current account in the names of various persons. In this way she placed in the British Linen Company Bank at Dundee, on deposit-receipt in the names of James Hill and herself and payable to either or the survivor, sums which at her death amounted to £186; she further deposited £300 on a receipt dated 16th July 1879 in the names of Mrs Meldrum and her daughters Isabella and Mary Anne Meldrum; a sum of £100 on a receipt dated 24th January 1883 in the names of Mrs Meldrum and another daughter; and another sum of £100 on a deposit-receipt, of the same date, in the names of James Hill and Mrs Andrews; and she also opened three current accounts with the Dundee Savings Bank—two in the joint names of Mrs Meldrum and herself, and one in the name of Mrs Meldrum alone. The sums deposited in these accounts amounted to about £75 in all.

Hill and the other persons named having after Mrs Nicoll's death uplifted the sums so banked, and having declined to account therefor, an action of count, reckoning, and payment was, on 24th May 1886, raised by Robert Nicoll and others, as executors-dative of Mrs Nicoll qua general legatees, against Hill, "as trustee or mandatary of the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, or otherwise as a vitious intromitter with the means and estate of the said deceased David Nicoll and Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, or either of them, and as an individual"; and against Mrs Meldrum and the other persons named in the deposit-receipts, including Charles Nicoll and Mrs Betsy Aitken or Nicoll aftermentioned, "as vitious intromitters with the means and estate of the said deceased David Nicoll and Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, or either of them, and as individuals."

The pursuers averred (Cond. 9) that Mrs Nicoll, after the death of her said husband, openly expressed a wish that his relations should not get any benefit under the mutual testament of any means she might leave; that in order to carry that wish into effect, she, by herself or in concert with the defender Hill, attempted, by making mortis causa donations of her estate, to dispose thereof in such a way as to defeat the provisions of the mutual testament, and the rights of the legatees under the same; in particular, that she handed over to Hill certain monies and deposit-receipts belonging to her, and, inter alia, a deposit-receipt in her name and that of Hill for £186 sterling; and that "the said monies and deposit-receipts were so handed over to the defender, the said James Hill, and were received by him, in trust or otherwise, in order that he might carry out the mortis causa instructions of the said deceased Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll" (Cond. 10) "In accordance with these instructions, and to defeat the rights of the legatees under the foresaid mutual testament, the defender, the said James Hill, out of the monies so received by him from the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, and after her death, paid, inter alia, to the other defenders Charles Nicoll, basketmaker, Dundee, and Mrs Betsy Aitken or Nicoll, his wife, sums amounting to £50 sterling and £10 sterling respectively. The sums so paid to the said Charles Nicoll and Mrs Betsy Aitken or Nicoll, and all other sums forming part of the estate of the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, paid by the defender James Hill, otherwise than in settlement of her just debts, were donations mortis causa by the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll to the recipients thereof" (Cond. 12) "The pursuers have further discovered that the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll has, in order to defeat the rights of the legatees under said mutual testament, made other mortis causa gifts to" the other defenders. "These various mortis causa gifts have been made by the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll by taking deposit-receipts in favour of herself and the defenders intended to be benefited, or the defender the said James Hill, or the parties themselves, but the same were not delivered to the parties prior to her death. At all events, she and the said James Hill had the control thereof, and the interest thereon was accounted for to her."

Nicoll's Ex-
cutors v. Hill,

The defenders (Ans. 9) "Admitted that Mrs Nicoll openly expressed her determination that her husband's relatives, by whom she has been subjected to serious insults and annoyances, should not benefit by the said mutual testament. She was advised by her law-agent that while a question might be raised as to her power to make a new will, she could dispose of her property as she liked during her lifetime. In accordance with this advice, Mrs Nicoll from time to time" took the deposit-receipts and opened the current accounts already mentioned "with the object of thereby constituting, in favour of the said parties respectively, a donation inter vivos, or, alternatively, mortis causa." In answer to cond. 10 the defenders gave this explanation,—“Explained that shortly before Mrs Nicoll's death she asked James Hill if he would consent to 'part' with £50 to Charles Nicoll and £10 to his wife, as they had been kind to her during her illness. He consented to do so ex gratia. She afterwards told Charles Nicoll and his wife that she had given away all her money, but that she had asked James Hill to give up £60 to them, and that he had agreed to do so. James Hill then, with Mrs Nicoll's knowledge and approval, wrote out and delivered to Charles Nicoll a memorandum to that effect, which was afterwards destroyed when the money was paid to them. The said sums were voluntary payments made by James Hill in deference to Mrs Nicoll's wishes, or, alternatively, were donations mortis causa from her to Charles Nicoll and his wife."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances condescended on, the defenders, having severally intromitted with the moveable estate of the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, are severally bound to count and reckon with the pursuers, as executors foresaid, for their respective intromissions therewith, and to pay-over to the pursuers the sums of money belonging to the estate in their hands, as concluded for.

No. 75.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Nicoll's Ex-
ecutors v. Hill,
&c.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) Upon a sound construction of the said mutual testament, the provisions with reference to the succession to the survivor of the spouses were testamentary, gratuitous, and revocable, and were pro tanto revoked by the donations libelled on. (4) Separatim, Mrs Nicoll had full power, notwithstanding the said mutual testament, to dispose of the savings from her alimentary liferent by gift inter vivos or mortis causa. (5) The said sums having been received by the defenders from Mrs Nicoll as gifts inter vivos, or alternatively mortis causa, they are not bound to account therefor to the pursuers.

On 10th July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by their mutual testament David and Isabella Nicoll conveyed to trustees the estate of the survivor for the purposes there mentioned: Finds that Isabella Nicoll, the surviving spouse, was barred by implied contract from revoking, altering, or defeating the provisions of this trust, in so far as these dispose of her predeceasing husband's estate; but finds that the said Isabella Nicoll was entitled to dispose of her separate estate or savings effected from her income after her husband's death, and that either by will or donation, the mutual will being to that extent defeasible by her acts: Further, allows a proof, on a day to be afterwards fixed, on the question whether the deposits libelled were or were not the husband's estate, and grants leave to reclaim."*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary's third finding was erroneous. Mrs Nicoll had bound herself not to alienate her own property by any gratuitous deed, and had nevertheless done so. *Craich's Trustees*¹ was almost exactly the present case, and was supported by other authorities.² The wife had no estate of her own; the whole property came from the husband; it was his relatives who were to be benefited; it was reasonable, therefore, that a power to revoke should be reserved to him. The rule expressio unius est exclusio alterius applied to the clause reserving power to revoke. The Lord Ordinary's third finding

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion in this case that as regards the reciprocal destination by the one spouse to the other the settlement was onerous, and as regards the provision made for the succession of the survivor, that must be taken to be a testamentary destination by each spouse, revocable by each spouse as regards the particular estate which he or she conveyed. As regards the wife's money, I have really no doubt that she was perfectly entitled, being the survivor, to make a new will, or a mortis causa gift of any part of it. The mere circumstance that no power is reserved will not prevent her from doing so. But then as regards the husband's estate I think the case is different, because while undoubtedly he gives his wife the fee, so that she might have spent the whole of the money, yet in so far as the money remained unexpended at her death, I think we must look to the words of reserved power of alteration. We find that the power of alteration is only given to the husband in the event of his being the survivor, and not to his wife. He has the power of alteration in regard to his own estate. It would follow from my opinion that there must be a separation of the estates, and on the question whether the husband's money was all spent in paying his debts and funeral expenses, or whether any part of it remains, I think that may be dealt with more satisfactorily by both parties putting in all documents in their possession than by a parole proof."

ought to be recalled, and a proof allowed as to the delivery of the deposit-receipts. No. 75.

Argued for the defenders;—The deed here, if it expressed a contract at all, did so only in so far as it provided for the spouses themselves; <sup>Jan. 25, 1887. Nicoll's Ex-cutora v. Hill,
&c.</sup> quoad ultra it was testamentary merely, and revocable by either spouse after the death of the other. Its narrative was that of a testamentary instrument—of two testamentary instruments, but the putting together of two testaments would not make a contract. There were no words of obligation; there was no express exclusion of Mrs Nicoll's power to revoke; the deed was not a marriage-contract; there was nothing in it to shew that the relation of the legatees to Mr Nicoll was such as to constitute an inductive cause of granting it on his part; and Mrs Nicoll took nothing more under the deed than her legal right to aliment from his estate. These elements distinguished the present case from those founded on by the pursuers, and brought it within the undernoted cases.¹ In Craich's Trustees, which of those cited by the pursuers most closely resembled the present, there was a clause of absolute warrandice, which, as Lord Cowan observed, never occurred in a deed intended to be revocable.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers in this action found their demand against the defenders on the alleged terms of a mutual settlement executed by a husband and wife in 1863. The pursuers are the nephews and a niece of the husband. The defenders are certain persons who are said to have received sundry payments from the wife, who survived her husband. It is maintained that these payments were in fraud of the mutual settlement, which it was out of the power of the widow to disappoint, and the pursuers call for an accounting.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained the pursuers' demand for an accounting. While holding that the wife was not precluded by the terms of the mutual settlement from testing on property which belonged to her apart from the settlement, and that while she was uncontrolled fiar of any personal funds left by her husband, and was entitled to spend them as she pleased, he holds that her executors are yet bound to account to the legatees for such portion of these funds as remained in her hands at the date of her death, or which had been gratuitously transferred mortis causa to third parties.

I differ from the Lord Ordinary on the last point. It appears to me very doubtful if this settlement contains anything of the nature of what is now called a protected succession in favour of the pursuers. I think, further, that even if it did it would not support the demand now made.

The settlement here consists of two parts. By the first the spouses mutually convey to the survivor all the personal property of which the predeceaser may die possessed, and each nominates the other executor. To this extent the instrument constituted an onerous contract. The second part commences with the word "Moreover," and proceeds as follows,—“we, the said David Nicoll and Isabella Key or Nicoll, being desirous to settle the succession to our moveable and personal estate in the event of the death of the longest liver of us, therefore we do hereby, jointly and severally and each of us, whichever of us may be the survivor, leave, &c., in that event to and in favour of” certain persons named, “and the survivors or survivor of them equally, share and share alike, the goods and gear of the longest liver at his or her decease,” appointing the persons named to be executors in succession of the longest liver. The clause as to revocation is as follows,—“And we do hereby further reserve full power to us at any time during our joint lives, and to me, the said David Nicoll, if I shall be the survivor, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, as may be thought proper, but declaring always that these presents, in so far as not altered, innovated, or revoked as aforesaid, shall be effectual, though undelivered, wherever found, the delivery thereof being hereby dispensed with.”

I am of opinion that the second part of this deed was purely testamentary, and conferred, and could confer, no right on the pursuers which can sustain the present action. There is no reason for assuming that the mortis causa conveyance contained in the first part of the settlement was the consideration for or conditional on the testamentary provisions contained in the second. These last possess no element of onerosity, as there was no blood relationship between the wife and her husband's nephews, and as the husband reserved a right to revoke; whatever other effect this might imply, it shews there was no intention of creating a jus crediti in the pursuers, and perhaps of itself indicates an absence of mutuality or reciprocity in these testamentary provisions.

This doctrine of protected succession in moveables rests on a series of decisions not altogether consistent, and I sympathise with the remarks on this head which I find in the last edition of Fraser on Husband and Wife, ii. 1507. But the present case does not give rise to any difficulty. My view of it is well and shortly expressed in two passages, one from an opinion of Lord Benholme and one from Lord Neaves in the case of Lang v. Brown, 5 Macph. 789. The settlement in that case was conceived in terms nearly identical with the present. It was between husband and wife, and professed to provide not only for the event of survivance, but also for the decease of both, in which case the property was conveyed to the daughter of the wife by a previous marriage. The wife survived, and left the property to her sister. In an action by the daughter Lord Benholme said,—“It is important to observe that the only contracting parties were Mr and Mrs Marshall. So far as they were concerned the deed was an onerous one. It was intended to provide for the survivor of the two spouses, but it was never intended to do anything against the survivor. The whole onerosity of the deed ended, in my opinion, with Mr Marshall's death.” Lord Neaves said,—“The deed before us seems to have two objects. The first is to make provision for the survivor of the spouses, and this provision, which is material, is clearly onerous. The second object seems to be thus indicated,—‘Considering the propriety of making arrangements to prevent disputes as to our respective successions at the death of either or both of us.’ Such arrangements are naturally introduced into the deed, but they are incidental only to its chief purpose, and I see no mutuality or onerosity in them.” So I think here.

But if I thought otherwise on the general construction of the settlement I could not have applied the doctrine of protected succession to such a case. No. 75.

 There was in truth no succession to protect. The husband died in 1863; the wife in 1886. He had in 1862 conveyed the only heritage he possessed to his wife in liferent for her alimentary use, and to his brother in fee. At his death he left her no other means of subsistence but this liferent, which yielded some £70 a-year, a sum of £150, a debt which was paid to her by her brother-in-law, and the value of the household furniture. It does seem, however, that by dint of much pinching and privation this old woman contrived, during the twenty-three years which elapsed since her husband's death, to amass some hundreds, which she gave as gifts to sundry friends, as explained in the record. I think she fairly earned these savings by her thrift and self-denial, and that they do not fall under any obligation in the mutual settlement. The £150 is not said to be extant in any specific form, and I think we must assume it to have been spent.

 cutors v. Hill,

LORD YOUNG.—By the mutual will the whole moveable estate of the predeceasing husband passed to the surviving wife, and became her absolute property in fee-simple, and although the language of the instrument shews that he contemplated that at her death her moveable estate (not his) would pass to the legatees therein named, yet this could not possibly be by his will or by any other will than hers. His will was completely executed on his death in 1863 by the passing of his whole estate to his widow in fee-simple. But the mutual instrument expresses her will also, and we need not consider whether she was at liberty to revoke it, for she did not revoke it, and it may be taken, so far as my opinion is concerned, that it will carry to the persons named the whole moveable estate belonging to her at her death in 1886, which, however, seems to have consisted only of furniture and the proportion of the rents of some liferented heritage from Martinmas 1885 till her death in January 1886.

This action, which is a count and reckoning, regards mainly certain sums of money which she had gifted to various persons and at various times during a period of seven years prior to her death, by depositing it in bank on deposit-receipts taken in their name, and in such manner that without any further act on her part, and without any aid from the Court, they have received payment of the money, and have it now in actual possession. To take the case of the earliest of these deposit-receipts—that dated 16th July 1879 (seven years before the widow's death), for £300, in name of Mrs Meldrum and of her daughters Isabella and Mary Ann Meldrum, and which they have in fact uplifted on no other right and title than the terms of the receipt gave them—I must hold that this was a complete gift of the money, and so irrevocable by the donor, as every complete gift is. There may indeed have been facts as between the donor and the donees which implied a trust in the latter, but none such are averred, and the pursuers, so far from alleging a trust in the donees or a right to revoke in the donor, aver distinctly that the donor's intention was that the donees should have the money so that the pursuers might not get it under the will. But this was a lawful intention with respect to money which was her property to spend or gift as she pleased, and all that can be said is that it has been accomplished. Had she changed her mind it is clear that she could not have revoked the gift without the consent and aid of the donees, who had the written obligation of the bank in their favour, or without appealing to the Court and invoking its

No. 75. aid on an averment and proof of facts entitling her to have it. The same remarks apply to all the deposit-receipts, which one and all of them import complete gifts, the parties named in them receiving the money on the right and title which these receipts conferred on them from their respective dates.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Nicoll's Executors v. Hill

I am therefore unable to hold that these donees, or any of them, are liable to account for the money, which they have so drawn, as money pertaining and belonging or resting owing to Mrs Nicoll at the time of her death.

For substantially the same reasons, I am of opinion that there is no obligation to account for the money deposited by the deceased in the Dundee Savings Bank in name of certain persons. She intended them to draw it and to keep it as their own, and they have drawn it accordingly on the right and title which the deceased gave them, and, as the pursuers aver, intended to give them by the terms of the deposits. It is an undoubtedly lawful and effectual way of gifting money to put it into the donee's bank account, or into an account opened with a bank in his name, and with the intention of gifting it. Any attempt to take a fraudulent benefit from an account opened, or money lodged for another purpose than gift, would of course be frustrated on proper averments and evidence, but no case of that kind is here presented, and, indeed, it is the pursuers' case, as I have already remarked, that gift was intended by the acts which ex facie import it, although they contend that it ought to be held unavailing to the donee because of the motive for it, viz., to defeat the mutual will. To this objection I would not assent, even on the assumption, which I have been making, that the surviving widow was not at liberty to revoke that part of that will. I have, however, to say, though I think it unnecessary to the decision of the actual case, that in my opinion Mrs Nicoll was entitled to revoke her will as expressed in the mutual settlement, and that with respect to her whole moveable estate without distinction, for if the estate was hers I can see no good ground for distinguishing between that part of it which came to her from her husband and the rest which came from any other source. If there were ground for such distinction, which I think there is not, the part that came from the husband would require to be traced and identified as extant at the period of her death, for otherwise it would be impossible to act on the distinction. It is stated that the inventory of his estate, including furniture, amounted to £80. The furniture may no doubt be identified so far as extant. But with respect to money I do not see how identification is possible. The pursuers aver that the widow received payment of a debt for borrowed money to the amount of £150 due to her deceased husband. But, assuming this to be so, how is the money so paid twenty years ago to be identified, and shewn to have been extant at the widow's death? It was her own absolute property, so that she might spend it on her maintenance or otherwise as she saw fit, and to allow a proof in order to trace money—the currency of the realm—in the hands of the absolute owner during a period approaching a quarter of a century seems rather extravagant. The furniture which the widow died possessed of is left to pass by the will. The Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof “whether the deposits libelled were or were not the husband's estate.” I do not understand this to mean that there shall be a proof of the mere amount of money which came to the widow under her husband's will, which I should hardly have thought a fitting subject for a proof at large. I rather understand it to mean the tracing of the actual bank-notes or coin which came to her from him, and shewing that these were deposited in bank on the receipts libelled, and to the propriety or practicability of such a proof I could not assent. That to the extent of the value of the estate left by the husband the beneficiaries named in the mutual will shall not be prejudiced by any act of the surviving wife, or at least not by her donations, is a simple (although I think an erroneous) idea, but beyond this I must own my inability to follow the Lord Ordinary's views. To trace money as having come from him and having been left intact by his widow, the owner, during her survivance of twenty-three years, is, I think, impossible. I should at least, before allowing a proof for such a purpose, require some distinct special averments regarding the tracing of the money, and the identification of it as unspent and extant.

Nicoll's Ex-
ecutors v. Hill,

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After explaining the provisions of the mutual deed)—Mr Nicoll died in September 1863 survived by his wife, who died in 1886. The testators did not during their joint lives exercise the reserved power of revocation. Mrs Nicoll, however, it is said, gave mortis causa donations in order to defeat the legacies in the joint settlement by her and her husband. And the purpose of the present action is to counteract those donations on the ground that they were ultra vires, and bring back to the legatees under the joint settlement the money which, in the way mentioned, she attempted to put away.

That Mrs Nicoll was vested with the full right of the property which was the subject of mutual settlement between her and her husband is not in controversy. That she was entitled to spend it to the last farthing, if she thought fit, is also a matter on which parties are agreed, but what is said is, that what she might leave, however acquired, was beyond her power of disposal, because, though in the form of a will, it was in reality a contract betwixt the spouses that what she left should pass to the legatees, who are represented by the pursuers, subject, of course, to the legacy that was bequeathed to Mrs Ann Nicoll Callender or Mel-drum. My opinion is that the contention of the pursuers cannot be maintained. The settlement, according to my reading of it, is a will, and nothing but a will, so far as regards the property that was the subject of bequest to the legatees by whom her succession is now claimed. The bequest by the one spouse to the other spouse, for anything appearing in the will, was not the cause for which the legacy in question was granted, but simply their desire to settle the succession to their moveable and personal estate in the event of the death of the longest liver of them. This is set forth in the narrative to that part of the settlement by which the bequest in question is prefaced. There is no presumption in favour of the view that this part of the settlement was a contract. The contrary is the natural conclusion. Mrs Nicoll could spend it. She could gift it in her lifetime. What was bequeathed to her by her husband, and what moveable property she had inherited from her husband—what of her own she had before his death, and what she acquired afterwards—were all absolutely at her own disposal so long as she lived. This being the case, the reasonable inference is that, as the legacy could be defeated in this way, it might also be revoked. The exercise of such a power would, I think, require to be expressly, or at anyrate unambiguously, excluded. But there is no such exclusion. On the contrary, the legacy stands upon what is merely the will of the survivor, and as Mrs Nicoll was the survivor she might by revocation, as well as by spending or by gifting the money in her lifetime, put an end to the bequest, the benefit of which is claimed by the pursuers of the present action.

The Lord Ordinary so far shares these views, but he thinks the revocation could not take effect upon that portion of the moveable property belonging to cutors v. Hill,

the wife which she had acquired from her husband by the joint settlement. I think no reason for this limitation is supplied by the settlement. The words upon which this depends are,—“All and Sundry the whole goods and gear . . . that may pertain or belong, or be resting owing, to the longest liver of the said David Nicoll or the said Mrs Isabella Key or Nicoll, at the time of his or her decease.” Whatever therefore the survivor left was included in this bequest, and my opinion is that the widow was entitled to revoke it, as well as regards the portion of her moveable property which she acquired from her husband as that which was her own previous to the making of the joint settlement or which she acquired during her viduity.

For these reasons I think that the interlocutor should be recalled.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur with your Lordship.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defences, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.

ARCHIBALD ARROL, Petitioner (Appellant).—Pearson—Napier.

TRUSTEES OF THE NEW CLUB, Respondents.—Asher—Murray.

Property—Burgh—Conveyance of front area to lower proprietor in tenement—Right of upper proprietor in the tenement.—The proprietor of a dwelling-house with an area fronting the street disposed the two upper stories and attics of the house, with a declaration that the disponee should have no right to the area. Subsequently the proprietor of the lower floors and area built over the area to the height of his part of the house. The proprietor of the upper floors having proposed to erect a new building and rest it upon this addition, held that he was not entitled to do so.

Question, whether he was entitled to extend his house over the area provided he did not rest upon the lower proprietor's extension.

Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.
M.

ON 15th July 1886 Mr Robert Kirk Inches, jeweller, proprietor of the two shops, Nos. 87 and 88 Princes Street, Edinburgh, and of the sunk area in front, obtained from the Dean of Guild a warrant entitling him to build out his premises on the ground storey of the tenement to the limit of the area in front of his house towards Princes Street, which operation he subsequently carried out.

On 9th July 1886 Mr Arroll, the proprietor of the upper floors of the same tenement, had presented a petition to the Dean of Guild, in which he called Mr Inches and the trustees of the New Club* (the next house on the east) as respondents. He prayed the Court to grant warrant to him to erect a new front and oriel window resting upon the extended portion of the shop below, which Mr Inches proposed to build.

The petitioner pleaded ;—(1) The petitioner's property being bounded on the south by Princes Street, and the proprietor of the under part of the tenement having brought forward, or being about to bring forward, the south front of his shops, the petitioner is entitled to improve his property by the alteration now proposed. (2) The proprietor of the dining-room and sunk storeys of a tenement having obtained authority to project his frontage, the proprietor of the upper storeys of the same tenement is entitled to obtain authority to make a similar alteration.

Inches, &c.

Mr Inches opposed the application, on the ground that the operations proposed by Mr Arrol were not confined to his own property, and encroached on the respondent's property rights. The New Club also lodged answers.

It appeared from the titles that prior to 1823 the whole tenement was possessed as one subject by the proprietor, Mr Henry Johnston, who in that year disposed the upper floors to Mr George Mylne. An instrument of sasine in favour of Mylne, recorded on 17th May 1823, proceeded upon the disposition in favour of Johnston and the disposition by Johnston in favour of Mylne. It narrated the disposition in favour of Johnston, as disposing to him the whole tenement, which was thus described,—“All and Whole that lodging or dwelling-house, consisting of a sunk storey, three other storeys, and garrets, erected by Alexander Reid, mason in Edinburgh, upon the westmost half of the area or piece of ground feued by him from the Magistrates and Town-Council of the city of Edinburgh, measuring 55 feet 8 inches in front of lot letter E, situated upon the north side of Princes Street, and lying within the new extended royalty of the city of Edinburgh, with the area whereon the said house is built, which house and area thereby disposed measure 27 feet 10 inches in front from east to west, as also the back area or ground belonging to the said dwelling-house, enclosed with a stone wall, and the stable and coach-house built upon the said back area or ground, and situated behind the said dwelling-house; together with the sunk area, cellars, and pavement above the same in front of the said house.” Then followed a description of the boundaries, that on the south being Princes Street.

The instrument then narrated the disposition by Johnston in favour of Mylne, as conveying “All and Whole the two upper storeys and garrets, being the drawing-room, bedroom, and attic storeys of the lodging or dwelling-house particularly before described; together with all right, title, and interest, claim of right, property, and possession which the said Henry Johnston, his predecessors and authors, heirs and successors, had, have, or might anyways claim or pretend to the said two upper storeys or garrets thereby disposed, in all time coming; but declaring that the said George Mylne should have no right to the dining-room storey and sunk storey of the said house, or to the area and cellars in front thereof, or to the area behind the same, or stables and other buildings erected or to be erected thereon.”

In May 1860 the trustees of the New Club, Edinburgh, who had become proprietors of the drawing-room, bedroom, and attic storeys of the tenement, conveyed them to Mr Archibald Arrol. The description of the subjects conveyed in the disposition was in these terms:—“All and Whole the two upper storeys and garrets, being the drawing-room, and attic storeys of that lodging or dwelling-house, consisting of a sunk storey, three other storeys, and garrets, erected by Alexander Reid, mason in Edinburgh, upon the westmost half of the area or piece of ground feued by him from the Magistrates and Town-Council of the city of Edinburgh, measuring 55 feet 8 inches in front of the lot letter E, situated upon the north side of Princes Street.” It further declared that Mr Arrol should have “no right whatever to the dining-room storey and

No. 76. sunk storey of the said house or to the area and cellars in front thereof, or to the area behind the same. . . .
 Jan. 27, 1887. Arrol v. Inches, &c. In May 1880 Mr Inches obtained a disposition to the sunk flat and street storey of the tenement and front and back areas from David Croall and others, who had become proprietors of the same. The disposition conveyed the whole tenement, as described in the disposition to Johnston, excepting the portion disposed to Mylne, thus,—

“All and Whole that lodging or dwelling-house, consisting of a sunk storey and three other storeys and garrets, erected by Alexander Reid, mason in Edinburgh, upon the westmost half of the area or piece of ground feued by him from the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, measuring 55 feet 8 inches in front of lot letter E, situated on the north side of Princes Street, and lying within the new extended royalty of the city of Edinburgh, with the area whereon the said house is built, which house and area hereby disposed measure 27 feet 10 inches in front from east to west; also the back area or ground belonging to the said dwelling-house, enclosed with a stone wall, and the stable and coach-house built upon the said back area or ground, and situated behind the said dwelling-house; together with the sunk area, cellars, and pavement above the same in front of the said house, which dwelling-house, back ground, stable, and coach-house, sunk area, cellars, and pertinents are bounded as follows, namely:—on the east . . . on the south by Princes Street,” &c., “but excepting always from the dwelling-house above described the two upper storeys and garrets.”

On 21st October 1886 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the operations in question are not confined to the petitioner's own property: Finds that the proposed alterations would entail interference with the mouldings in front of the New Club buildings, and would infringe a condition of the petitioner's title: Therefore refuses the warrant craved.”*

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—On a fair interpretation of his title the boundary of his property to the south was Princes Street. He had not indeed any title to the solum of the area, but the space of air out to the boundary and above Mr Inches' extension belonged to him. An upper proprietor had a right to project his building outwards as far as the lower proprietor,¹ where the nature of the extension from the lower storey was such as to render it necessary for him to rest his proposed building on it.² He was willing to pay Mr Inches for any

* “NOTE.— . . . There are two series of titles of the subjects in question, and these shew clearly the law of tenement which must be followed in this case. Under these the ownership was admitted to be as follows:—The petitioner is particularly restricted to the upper flats and attics of the tenement, and the respondent Inches possesses the whole of the area with the buildings on it, except the portions of the tenement possessed by the petitioner. As mentioned above, the respondent Inches has obtained warrant to project an extension of his property over the space originally occupied by this area, which by his titles belongs exclusively to him, and it is on this extension that the petitioner claims a right to rest his proposed new front and oriel window.

“The Dean of Guild cannot admit this claim. It might have been otherwise if he had merely proposed to make certain operations on his own property. But he does not propose only to erect a new front and oriel window for his property. He proposes further to rest these on the respondent Inches' proposed projection, and it appears to the Dean of Guild that this would impose a burden on the lower projector to which he is not bound to submit.”

increased expense incurred by this additional weight being put on his building. If the Court were of opinion that he was not entitled to rest his building on Mr Inches', he was willing to alter the prayer of his petition, to the effect of asking to be found entitled to project an oriel window from the present front of his house above, but not resting on Mr Inches' extension. No. 76.
Jan. 27, 1887.
Arrol v.
Inches, &c.

Argued for Mr Inches;—The titles did not give Princes Street as the boundary of the petitioner's property; that was the boundary of the whole tenement before it was divided, but was not continued through the titles of the upper storeys after the separation took place. The petitioner's proposed alteration increased the burden on the lower proprietor's property, which he was not entitled to do.¹ The petitioner had no right whatever in the particular space on which he wished to build, whereas the respondent had. The area was conveyed to him in his titles, and his right extended usque ad cælum, subject only to the common interest in the tenement.² A proprietor of the lower storey of a tenement in a town always had that qualified right, even where the titles reserved a right in common to the solum on which the house was built to all the proprietors in the tenement. He could build over the area in front of the house so long as he did not injure the lights, &c., of the upper proprietor.³ If this petition were granted the proprietor of a back green could not build over his back green even up to the level of the ceiling of his property, at least he could not light any such building from the top, which amounted to a prohibition against building. But it had been decided that a proprietor of a subject in the same position as Mr Inches could not only build over his back green, and light the building from the top, but could build above the level of the ceiling of his subject so long as he did not interfere with the lights of the upper proprietor.⁴ In short, an upper proprietor, such as the petitioner, had no right of property in the stratum of air extending out laterally from his property. There was no room for distinction between Mr Inches' extension and the saloon in Boswell's case, from the point of view of property, though there might be as regarded common interest.⁵ Here, however, there was no question of shutting up the lights of the petitioner.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case it appears that Mr Inches is the proprietor of the area and shop floor of the tenement Nos. 87 and 88 Princes Street. He has obtained warrant from the Dean of Guild to extend the shop front towards the street to the limit of his property,—that is, to the limit of the area of the house as it was originally built. The proposal of the petitioner is that, that operation having been carried out by Mr Inches, he, the petitioner, should be allowed to raise a new front to his property, which consists of the upper flats of the tenement in question, to build out an oriel window, and to rest his proposed addition on the new building put up by Mr Inches. The Dean of Guild has refused to grant warrant in terms of the petition.

Now, to decide the question between the petitioner and Mr Inches, it is necessary to understand the state of the titles, but when once that is understood it seems to me that the whole case is free from doubt.

No. 76. The whole house or tenement originally belonged to one proprietor, who, in May 1823, disposed the upper floors to George Mylne. The instrument of sasine in Mylne's favour narrates the disposition in favour of his author of the whole subjects, which are described as "All and Whole that lodging or dwelling-house, consisting of a sunk storey, three other storeys, and garrets . . . situated upon the north side of Princes Street, . . . with the area whereon the said house is built, . . . as also the back area or ground, and the stable and coach-house built upon the said back area or ground, together with the sunk area, cellars, and pavement above the same in front of the said house. . . ." There is a description of the entire subject by boundaries, and the boundary on the south side is Princes Street. The instrument then narrates the disposition in favour of Mylne himself of "All and Whole the two upper storeys and garrets, being the drawing-room, bedroom, and attic storeys of the lodging or dwelling-house, particularly before described, situated upon the north side of Princes Street." So far, the description is quite simple, only the two upper storeys and the garrets are conveyed; but there follows a very distinct declaration that the disponent "shall have no right whatever to the dining-room storey and sunk storey of the said house, or to the area and cellars in front thereof, or to the area behind the same." The right to these remained in the disponent and his successors. Mr Inches is now the person standing in that position, and he is accordingly proprietor of the areas of the house, behind and before.

The result of the titles is therefore that Mr Inches has a right of property in these areas, and that the petitioner has no right of property whatever in either. Now, the effect of that is, of course, that Mr Inches is entitled to build over the front area, and he has obtained a warrant to do so up to the limit of Princes Street, and that right of property in him extends a celo ad centrum.

Whether, notwithstanding that right of property in the proprietor of the lower storeys, it might be in the power of the proprietor of the upper storeys to project any building from his own property over the area, but without resting on Mr Inches' property, with a view to beautifying his property or preserving the view from his own windows, is a different affair. If the right to build up from the area to any height he chose belonged to Mr Inches, of course the Court would interfere; but that right does not belong to him, for by so doing he would shut up the lights of the upper proprietor, and it is the law of the tenement (as it has been well termed) that the windows he would thus shut up shall be the light of the upper part of the house. That question, however, is not before us, and if it were it would require a report founded on the knowledge of the Dean of Guild to enable us to decide it. The only question before us is whether the petitioner is entitled to rest his proposed building on the top of Mr Inches' extension, and I can see no ground for enabling him to do so. If the petitioner has no title to the solum of the area on which Mr Inches builds, how he can have a right to rest his buildings on Mr Inches' I cannot see. That is the ground on which the Dean of Guild has decided, and I think rightly decided the case, and therefore, I think, we ought to adhere.

LORD MURK.—The petitioner is proprietor of the three upper storeys of the tenement in question, and the respondent, Mr Inches, is absolute proprietor of the street and sunk storeys and of the area. In these circumstances, and the respondent having obtained leave to extend his front shop as far as the boundary of Princes Street, the petitioner has made this application for leave to extend his frontage to Princes Street also, and to rest his extended front and windows on the respondent's new building. Now, I know of no authority for holding that, when the proprietor of the ground floor and area extends his buildings over his own area, the upper proprietor is entitled to build out also to the same extent, and to rest his extension on the new building below. Whether the petitioner would be entitled to throw out oriel windows over, but not resting on, the respondent's extension I give no opinion, as that question has not been brought before us for decision. And I agree that, as matters stand, we should simply adhere to the judgment of the Dean of Guild.

Arrol v.

LORD SHAND.—There is no doubt that the titles dealing with this tenement are quite distinct, and that whatever Mr Arrol's rights may be with regard to building out from his own part of the building, they must be asserted and maintained on the footing that the solum of the area facing Princes Street is exclusively the property of Mr Inches. That is distinctly the effect of the titles. I am clearly of opinion in these circumstances with your Lordships and the Dean of Guild, whose judgment is very clearly expressed, that the petitioner's proposal cannot be entertained, there being no ground in law for the view that Mr Inches has, by putting up the building which he has done, given his neighbour any right to build over it, and to rest his new building on Mr Inches' extension. As the Dean of Guild says, it might have been different if the petitioner "had merely proposed to make certain operations on his own property," but as I have said he proposes to rest his new building on that of Mr Inches. I wish to reserve my opinion as to what would be Mr Arrol's right if his proposal were to build out from his own property without resting on the building below. I am not satisfied that the right of property which Mr Inches has would be exclusive of such a right, but on that point I now indicate no opinion.

LORD ADAM concurred.

v. Taylor.

Bankruptcy—Title to sue—Trust for creditors—Stipulation for discharge—Right of non-acceding creditor to sue trustee for share.—Where a debtor executed a trust-deed for behoof of acceding creditors, with the condition that all creditors acceding or receiving a dividend should be held to have discharged their claims in full, held (1) that a creditor who did not accede to the trust was entitled to a share of the estate in proportion to his debt unconditionally, and (2) that he was entitled to recover his share by direct action against the trustee.

ON 11th March 1885 John Johnson, a tailor, carrying on business in 2^D Division. Paisley and Glasgow under the firm of Buchanan & Johnson, granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr James Taylor, C.A. in Glasgow, "as trustee for behoof of my whole lawful creditors at the date hereof, and who shall accede hereto," for the purpose, inter alia, "of paying the whole debts due by me to the creditors acceding hereto." The deed contained this clause,—“Declaring always, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that this trust-disposition is granted by me on the condition that the creditors who accede hereto or who shall take a dividend out of my said estate shall be held to have thereby discharged me of the whole debts due by me to them, without the necessity for any formal deed of accession or discharge being granted; declaring that the acceptance by any creditor of a first dividend from this trust-estate shall import a discharge to the said trustee."

Thomas Ogilvie & Son were creditors of the firm of Buchanan & Johnson to the amount of £273, 5s. They did not accede to the deed. The estate in June 1886 was estimated by the trustee as likely to yield 5s. 6d. per pound. Thomas Ogilvie & Son accordingly demanded payment of the sum of £75, 1s. 6d., being the amount of the dividend of 5s. 6d. per pound on their debt. They offered a receipt for that sum, but declined to grant a discharge. The trustee refused to pay unless there was a discharge of the debt by Thomas Ogilvie & Son.

Thereupon Thomas Ogilvie & Son raised this action, on 19th June 1886, concluding for the sum of £75, 1s. 6d.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect the defender is trustee in trust under the said conveyance or trust-deed for behoof of the creditors of the said Buchanan & Johnson, and having accepted office and being in possession of the means, estate, and proceeds of said insolvent, he is bound, in virtue of his office, to distribute the same among the creditors in proportion to their respective debts.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having declined to accede to said trust-deed, they are not entitled to any benefit therefrom. (3) The defender having all along been willing to pay pursuers said dividend, subject to said condition, he should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), on 4th August 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—"Finds on the whole case, and in law, (1) that the condition as to discharge is one which cannot legally in the circumstances be enforced, and must be held pro non scripto, (2) that therefore pursuers are entitled to receive a dividend on the debt due to them by Buchanan & Johnson without granting the latter a full discharge," &c.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The trustee was a mandatary and he must administer the trust according to his mandate; if creditors were not satisfied with the course of administration they might sequestrate.¹ Deeds for behoof of creditors had been set aside altogether, but this was the first time it had been sought to leave the deed standing and to hold the conditions pro non scriptis. That a condition of this kind would not invalidate the deed was certain. A trust-deed with a clause in these terms would exclude even a non-acceding creditor from doing diligence by arrestment, and would secure equality.² The principle of equality would be violated if acceding creditors discharged their debts in obedience to the deed, while non-acceding creditors merely took the dividend as an instalment.

Argued for the pursuers;—A trust-deed should be sustained in so far as it was legal, and quoad ultra disregarded. One creditor non-acceding had as much right to challenge it as twenty.³ Such a condition as that in question it was ultra vires of the debtor to impose. The trustee held for the creditors, and for the whole body of creditors, whether they acceded or not, for no man could put his estate beyond the reach of creditors.

v. Taylor.

LORD YOUNG.—From the first I own I have considered this a very clear case. It is quite a commendable thing for an embarrassed debtor to employ an agent or an accountant or to get a friend to make his estate available to his creditors as far as it will go. That is perfectly legal. Further, where he and all his creditors agree that it will be satisfactory and economical to realise and divide the estate in that way on condition of the creditors discharging their debtor on getting such a dividend as the estate will afford, there is no objection to that. The debtor and the creditors agree that there is no alternative between that and sequestration, and that that will be the most satisfactory and economical method.

But that is all done by agreement, and sometimes a recalcitrant creditor frustrates that course which the great body of creditors think best. There is no help for that, for it is a matter of voluntary agreement, and a sequestration may always be substituted for the agreement so frustrated.

To realise his estate and to make it go as far as possible is the duty of every debtor. But it is quite certain that no debtor is entitled to put his estate beyond the reach of his creditors or to prescribe conditions on which alone they are to be entitled to participate. Any proposition to the contrary is extravagant. But that is what the debtor has done here when he placed the estate in the hands of his trustee. He, forsooth, has prescribed as a condition on which alone the creditors are to be entitled to participate in the estate, that they shall give a discharge.

Now, a trust-deed honestly granted, although without the accession of all creditors, has been held effectual by the Court to this extent, but to this extent only, that individual creditors should not be at liberty by arresting in the hands of the trustee to interfere with equality of distribution. I am not aware of a trust-deed being recognised to any other effect than that individual creditors should be restrained from using diligence. An individual creditor shall not disturb the provisions for equality of distribution in respect of which the trust-deed is regarded with favour. But if he cannot use diligence at all, if he cannot use it to secure his own legitimate share, then it is put beyond his reach altogether.

This deed provides that creditors shall discharge their debts for any dividend they may receive. That dividend turns out to be 5s. 6d. in the pound. Just fancy the proposition that no creditor shall interfere with the estate unless he will discharge his whole debt for 5s. 6d. in the pound! A more extraordinary proposition I never heard. The Dean of Faculty says, "Let him resort to sequestration." But a creditor cannot be obliged to resort to sequestration. There is no obligation on any creditor to make his debtor notour bankrupt, and sequester him. He may say, "The debtor can pay me 5s. 6d. now, and I'll wait for the rest." The debtor himself may apply for sequestration if he is in a position to do so according to law. I do not know whether he is in that position or not. The creditor here does not and cannot interfere with that right; he only says, "I'll take what the estate will afford, and wait for the rest." A discharge, as we know, is not a matter of course even in a sequestration. By a recent statute (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22) the debtor in certain cases must shew that

No. 77. his inability to pay arose from innocent misfortune. Further, this discharge is to apply to acquirenda, so that if the debtor succeeds to a fortune within six months the creditor shall get no share of it, and all that just because the debtor says so.

Jan. 27, 1887.
Ogilvie & Son
v. Taylor.

The only difficulty I have felt is this—Shall the creditor have a direct action against the trustee? But I readily overcame that difficulty. If a debtor puts his whole estate into the hands of a trustee or a friend, I think we should sustain the title of the creditors to sue that person, and we should do that to avoid circuitry of actions. If not, the creditor would bring an action against the debtor, and would then use diligence against the estate in the hands of the trustee; that would secure equality of distribution. He may not use an arrestment that will interfere with equality, but upon such an arrestment as I have indicated being used, the trustee must make forthcoming to him the share of the estate belonging to him, and that is all he asks here.

I think, then, that the condition so attempted to be imposed is absolutely illegal, and I have no difficulty on the matter except on the technical ground of the direct action against the trustee. I have overcome that, and the result is that I agree with the Sheriff-substitute. The pursuer is entitled to decree for that proportion of his debt; it is his legal right, and he is entitled to have it. But I do not agree with the last part of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, in which he finds no expenses due to the pursuer. This is the case of a just claim being resisted on untenable grounds, and I have no hesitation in holding the pursuer entitled to expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree with the judgment proposed, and concur in the reasons given by Lord Young for that judgment. I cannot conceive how any honest debtor has any interest in resisting such a demand as is made on the grounds on which it is resisted here.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. The only difficulty I have had is the difficulty of form which Lord Young has mentioned. I had some doubt whether the pursuer is entitled to a direct action against the trustee for his dividend. The proper and obvious course was to raise an action against the debtor and arrest in the hands of the trustee; of course he would limit his arrestment to the amount of his dividend. I do not know that he could arrest the dividend; he would arrest so much of the estate as remained in the hands of the trustee.

But, after all, this action only brings about the same result, and therefore I think we are bound to sustain this action, which can do the debtor no harm. I do not see how it can in any way prejudice him. It has been said that it will in some way prejudice his right to obtain sequestration, but that has not been made clear.

I think, then, that we may sustain a direct action against the trustee, which gives the creditor no more than he would obtain by an action against the debtor.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree. A private trust-deed for behoof of creditors as a piece of machinery in the law of bankruptcy is often very useful and very economical, but I imagine it to lie at the foundation of the law on that subject that the deed is granted for rateable distribution among all the creditors. But questions have arisen whether, when there are conditions in the deed which may be thought to lead to inequality, the trust-deed is entitled to stand at all. In that connection Professor Bell uses the expression that they may be held pro non scriptis. I do not think that that is a very felicitous expression, but, however that may be, I agree with the judgment proposed, because I am of opinion that every creditor is entitled to a dividend on the principle that his just right is to an equal distribution of the estate.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, c. 5.—Where money is advanced on the faith of a specific security to be immediately granted, it will not vitiate the security that it is not formally completed till within sixty days of the grantor's bankruptcy; but when the stipulation is that the debtor shall give security, whether general or over a specific subject, whenever the creditor shall desire it, the granting of the security within sixty days of the grantor's bankruptcy is reducible under the Act 1696, cap. 5.

A firm, within sixty days of bankruptcy, obtained a loan from another firm, to whom they granted a promissory-note and this letter:—"On consideration of you having this day discounted, for our sole benefit, our acceptance at four mo' from date, for £462, 10s., and handed us proceeds of same, we hereby hand over to you, as security for same, 100 shares for £6 paid in Holmes Oil Coy., and bind ourselves to transfer same to you at any time during the currency of the bill if you desire it." The certificate of the shares was at the same time delivered to the lenders. A transfer was executed three weeks thereafter, and fourteen days before the sequestration of the granters.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear), following Moncreiff v. Union Bank, Dec. 16, 1851, 14 D. 200, that the transfer was reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5.

ON 23d December 1885 Messrs John Millen & Company, coalmasters, Glasgow, applied to Messrs Richard Mackie & Company, steamship owners, Leith, for a loan or advance of £450, which was given by the latter. In exchange therefor, Messrs Millen & Company granted to Messrs Mackie & Company their promissory-note of said date for £462, 10s., and payable four months after date. They also granted a letter in the following terms:—"On consideration of you having this day discounted, for our sole benefit, our acceptance at four mo' from date, for £462, 10s., and handed us proceeds of same, we hereby hand over to you, as security for same, 100 shares for £6 paid in Holmes Oil Coy., and bind ourselves to transfer same to you at any time during the currency of the bill if you desire it."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
M.

The scrip or share-certificate was delivered at the same time, but no transfer was then executed. The transaction was carried through by Mr John Millen on the one side, and by Mr Richard Mackie on the other on behalf of their respective firms.

The affairs of Messrs Millen having become embarrassed, were, on 14th January 1886, placed in the hands of Messrs Thomson, Jackson, Gourlay, & Taylor, chartered accountants, Glasgow, and a circular intimating this fact was issued to the creditors. On the following day (15th January) Mr Richard Mackie procured from Mr John Millen a transfer of the said shares, which was at once intimated to the company on the same day, and in respect of the said transfer new scrip or share-certificates were issued to Mr Richard Mackie in his own name.

Mackie.

The transfer was dated 23d December 1885 by the secretary, to correspond with the above-mentioned letter of that date.

The estates of John Millen & Company, and of the individual partners, were sequestrated on 28th January 1886.

On 9th March 1886 John Gourlay, C.A., Glasgow, the trustee in the sequestration, raised an action in the Court of Session against Mr Richard Mackie, concluding for reduction of the transfer, and also concluding for delivery of the certificates of the said 100 shares issued in favour of the defender, dated 15th January 1886.

The pursuer averred;—"The said transfer or assignation was signed and delivered voluntarily and without consideration by the bankrupt John Millen as an individual to the defender, in satisfaction of and as security for a prior debt of his firm, due to said Richard Mackie & Company, on the eve of sequestration, and within sixty days of bankruptcy, contrary to the terms of the Statute 1696, chap. 5."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The transfer or assignation described in the summons, having been given in security or satisfaction of a prior debt within sixty days of bankruptcy, contrary to the terms of the Statute 1696, chap. 5, the pursuer is entitled to have the same reduced and set aside, as concluded for. (2) The pretended sale of the said shares described in the said transfer or assignation by the bankrupt John Millen to the defender not having been a bona fide sale, and the same having been an illegal and fraudulent transaction between the parties, it is void, or at least reducible at common law, and the pursuer and the creditors of the said bankrupts are entitled to be reponed thereagainst.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The said shares having been transferred to the defender in implement of a prior obligation by the said John Millen & Company to do so, the action, so far as based on fraud at common law, is unfounded. (2) The said shares having been transferred in respect of a novum debitum, and in specific implement of a prior specific obligation, the action, as based on the Act 1696, cap. 5, is unfounded.

On 10th July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained the pleas in law for the defender, and assoilzied him from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The only question in this case is whether the security which the pursuer seeks to reduce is struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5; for, apart from the statute, I think it clear that there is no relevant averment of fraud. The general rule of law by which the question must be determined cannot be better stated than in two propositions laid down by Professor Bell in his Commentaries, and cited with approval by the Lord President in Stiven v. Scott, 9 Macph. 930. The first is, that 'wherever money is paid or advanced, or property made over, in consideration of a general promise of security not over a specific subject, the distinction is sanctioned between the debt and the security subsequently granted; and in its true intent and meaning the rule of the statute is understood to apply to the security, when it comes to be granted, as being truly a security for a previous debt.' The second proposition is, that 'wherever there is stipulated a specific security over a particular subject, in consideration and on the faith of which an advance of money or transfer of goods is made, the completion of that security, although after an interval of time, and after the term of constructive bankruptcy has begun, is not within the intent and meaning of the Act.' The question is, under which of these two categories the disputed security falls, and I am of opinion that it falls under the second.

"The transaction between the defender and the bankrupts was a very simple one, and there is no dispute as to its terms. On the 23d December 1885 the defender made a loan to the bankrupts of £450 by discounting their acceptance; and on the same day they delivered to him the scrip or share-certificate of certain shares in the Holmes Oil Company, and a letter addressed to him, in which they say,—‘On consideration of you having this day discounted, for our sole benefit, our acceptance at four mo^t from date for (£462, 10s.) four hundred and sixty-two pounds, ten shillings st^d, and handed us proceeds of same, we hereby hand over to you, as security for same, 100 shares for £6 paid in Holmes Oil Co^r, and bind ourselves to transfer same to you at any time during the currency of the bill, if you desire it.’ It is true that the delivery of the certificate did not of itself operate as a transfer of the shares; but the letter shews that the transaction was, in intention and in substance, a loan on the specific security of the shares, and the obligation to execute a formal transfer was instantly prestable. The advance and the security were part of the same transaction, and it is a transaction which appears to me to satisfy the requirements of the law, as these are explained by the Lord President in the case of Stiven, where his Lordship says,—‘If the party come under an obligation to do something immediately and unconditionally, it shall have the effect of creating a good security; and when I say come under an obligation, I mean nothing short of this, that he subjects himself to an obligation instantly and absolutely enforceable. When he comes under such an obligation as that, then the fulfilment of that obligation, although within sixty days, will not make a case under the statute, because then the security is substantially granted before the sixty days, and at the same time that the debt is contracted. It is a security contemporaneous in that point of view with the contraction of the debt.’ It is true that the security was not in this case granted before the sixty days, but that is because the debt was contracted within that period. It was a new debt contracted within sixty days of bankruptcy; and if I am right in thinking that it was contracted on the security of the shares, the completion of the transaction cannot be considered as the voluntary granting of a further security for a prior debt.

“I do not think this view inconsistent with Moncreiff v. The Union Bank. There is no doubt a certain resemblance between the facts of that case and those of the present; but I think the two cases distinguishable in a very material point. The Union Bank made an advance to the bankrupts more than sixty days before their bankruptcy on the security of a promissory-note, and took from them at the same time a missive addressed to the manager, binding themselves at any time required to assign a heritable bond and certain policies of insurance, which were immediately deposited with the bank. The assignation was not required till the promissory-note fell due, six months after the date of the loan, and within six days of the bankruptcy of the borrowers. It appears to me that the only question of difficulty in that case was a question as to the construction of the contract upon which the advance was made; and the ground of judgment, as explained by Lord Fullerton, was ‘that the missive taken by the defenders shewed that the instant granting of the security was not the consideration of the advance. There was no absolute stipulation for the security at the time of the advance.’ And accordingly the Court distinguished the case from those in which, although the security was not actually given prior to, or simultaneously with, the advance of the money, the granting of the security really formed, by the terms of the original contract, the consideration for such advance. In the present case, on the other hand, I think the missive shews that the security upon which the defender made the advance was not the personal obligation contained in the bankrupts’ promissory-note, but the specific security of the shares in question. It is said that the obligation to transfer the shares is qualified by the words ‘if you desire it,’ and that this must mean just what was meant by the words ‘if re-leading authority, and in no degree shaken by intermediate cases. The parties here did not intend an out-and-out transference of the shares, but a transference depending on the condition "if you desire it." That desire might never have arisen. The transference also must be "during the currency of the bill." The granting of the transfer was a separable matter from the obligation in the promissory-note. The defender had been willing to advance the money on the personal credit of the bankrupts, and had altered his position to his own benefit, and to the loss of the creditors, within sixty days of bankruptcy. It would have been a different question if the parties had intended an immediate transference of the shares, and the delay had merely arisen from some time being required to complete the formal transfer. The question whether or not the bankrupts could have been compelled to grant this transfer was not the test, otherwise Moncreiff v. Union Bank would be bad law, for undoubtedly there the bankrupt could have been compelled to grant the assignation. To the same effect was the judgment in Mansfield v. Walker's Trustees,¹ which recognised that deeds granted in implement of a previous obligation might be "voluntary" in the sense of the statute. To escape the statute the obligation must be "instantly and absolutely enforceable."² An obligation to assign went for nothing, unless "prestale independently of after requirement."² The transactions of 23d December 1885 settled the rights of the parties, and the transfer of 15th January 1886 was in "further quired' in the case of Moncreiff v. The Union Bank, so that, on the authority of that decision, it must be held that the obligation to transfer was not absolute and unconditional, but dependent upon after requirement. But the whole letter must be read to ascertain the terms of the contract, and if it be clear, as I think it is, from the previous words that the advance was made on the specific security of the shares in the Holmes Oil Company, it is impossible to infer from the words in question that the security was not an absolute term of the bargain, but that it was left open for after consideration whether any such security should be required or not. It appears to me that the words 'if you desire it' take nothing from the force of the absolute and unconditional obligation to transfer, provided it be clear that the contract between the parties was an advance on the specific security of the shares. The case of Moncreiff v. The Union Bank is an authority for the rule of law which may be extracted from it, but it is no authority for the construction of a different contract from that which was then in question.

"If I am right in the construction I put upon the present contract, the case falls within the rule, which must now be taken as firmly established, that 'wherever, on an advance of cash, a simultaneous engagement is made to give a specific security for the specific advance, such security may be validly completed within sixty days of bankruptcy, and is not struck at by the Act of 1696.' The rule is settled by a series of decisions, but Taylor v. Farrie is probably the most important, since it was a judgment of the whole Court.

"I do not think the rule displaced by the consideration (if that can be gathered from the contract) that the parties may have been uncertain as to the form which might be necessary for making the security effectual. The important matter is that the advance was made substantially on the security of the shares, and that the obligation to transfer the shares on demand, for the purpose of making the security effectual, was absolute and unconditional. There was no new transaction between the parties, and no voluntary transference by the bankrupts."

 Gourlay v. Mackie.

Further, the pursuer was prepared to aver and prove that John Millen was chairman of Holmes Oil Company, and therefore it was not likely to have been in contemplation of the parties that he should be divested of the shares held by him. Admittedly the transfer was not made of the date it bore, and therefore the defender must shew bona fides in the transaction.

Argued for the defender;—The Act 1696 only struck at voluntary deeds granted to a creditor in satisfaction or further security of his debt. A deed was not voluntary, in the sense of the Act, which a party was bound to execute.¹ Here the parties considered the security sufficiently constituted by delivery of the certificate for the shares, but if found to be necessary a formal transfer was to be granted. There was an absolute obligation to grant this transfer, which could have been instantly enforced. It was pars contractus, and was granted "on consideration" of the defenders' firm discounting the promissory-note. It would have been a fraud for the bankrupt to transfer these shares to anyone else. "If you desire it" did not necessarily mean "if bankruptcy supervene." It might quite well mean "if you are advised that a transfer is necessary, I bind myself to complete your title." If the transfer here had actually been procured, and parties had merely agreed not to register it, that would not be bad under the Act. There was no contravention of the statute when a specific security is stipulated for, and when what is afterwards done is simply in implement of the stipulation. That was settled in Miller's Trustee v. Shield,² which also settled that it was immaterial whether the transaction was a sale or a loan. That principle was precisely applicable here. The Legislature did not intend to disable parties from fairly and strictly performing their obligations ad factum prestandum.³ Moncreiff v. Union Bank was distinguishable from the present case. The obligation there was contracted beyond sixty days from bankruptcy, while the security was taken within that period; the time for requiring security was quite indefinite, while here it was limited to the currency of the bill; the security was to be granted "at any time required," words which were not susceptible of the same construction as those here used; and the obligation to grant the security was not part of the contract, as here, but dependent on after requirement. In Stiven v. Scott & Simson the borrowers were intended under the contract to retain power to deal with the goods forming the security at their pleasure, and it would have been no fraud to give them over to a third party, which was a very different case. A novum debitum was sustained because the bankrupt estate got the counterpart of what the bankrupt gave, and the whole transactions here being within sixty days, the estate presumably would not lose.

The debtor John Millen was sequestrated on the 28th January 1886, and the pursuer is the trustee on his estates. The circumstances under which this transaction took place were the following: On 23d December 1885 the bankrupts, John Millen & Company, applied to the defender's firm for a loan of £450, which was given by the latter. In exchange therefor the bankrupts' firm granted to the defender's firm their promissory-note of the same date for £462, 10s., payable four months after date. They also granted a letter in the following terms:—"On consideration of you having this day discounted, for our sole benefit, our acceptance at four months from date for £462, 10s., and handed us proceeds of same, we hereby hand over to you as security for same 100 shares for £6 paid in Holmes Oil Company, and bind ourselves to transfer same to you at any time during the currency of the bill if you desire it." It is really on the terms of that obligation that the whole question turns. In point of fact that letter was granted on 23d December, and it was on 15th January following that the transfer of the shares was executed by the bankrupt. It turns out that the date affixed to the transfer was 23d December, but that, it is explained, was done by the secretary of the company without the knowledge of the defender, in order to make the transfer conform to the letter of 23d December. These facts are not disputed, but it is alleged that the advance was made solely on the faith of the security being granted. I do not think that allegation in any way whatever alters the question.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender, but I cannot concur in his judgment. I do not doubt that where money is advanced on the faith of a specific security, stipulated for as part of a present transaction, it will not vitiate the security that it is formally completed within sixty days of the granter's bankruptcy. The security is in that case truly granted in fulfilment of a prior obligation. But this case, in my opinion, belongs to an opposite category. The money here was not advanced on the faith of a present or instant security. It was advanced without security and in the knowledge that there was none, but under a promise from the debtor that if and when the creditor desired it the shares in question should be transferred to him. The meaning of this is quite plain. It was a transaction separate from the advance, and was not absolute but conditional. So far as the parties were concerned, neither desired that any present or instant security should be then given. The debtor wished to avoid the notoriety the transfer would imply. The creditor was willing to forego it as long as he thought he could so with safety. The position was precisely that described by Lord Ivory in his note in the case of Moncreiff v. Union Bank,¹ which I think well decided, and from which I cannot distinguish the present. In that case the debtors, Messrs Tod & Hill, had applied for and obtained an additional cash-credit for £3000 from the bank, and by a relative letter Mr Tod agreed to convey to the bank at any time required certain securities therein specified. The bank demanded the assignation of these securities within six days of the debtors' bankruptcy. In this state of matters Lord Ivory reduced the security, and the Court adhered. Lord Ivory says in his note,—“The agreement neither constituted any present security for the debt, nor was it in any just sense contemplated or intended as one which should operate in that manner. It was in truth a mere device, and that of the most dangerous description, looking to the interests of the general creditors, to evade the operation of the statute." "What was intended was not a present but a future, or, in the words of the statute, a further security." This being so, I am at a loss to understand the ground on which the Lord Ordinary hesitated to follow a precedent so plainly applicable. It is true Lord Gifford in the case of *Stiven*¹ expressed a doubt whether the case of Taylor v. Farrie,² decided three years afterwards by the whole Court, did not shake its authority. But the Lord President in the case of *Stiven*³ expressed a clear opinion that nothing had occurred to overrule the case of the Union Bank, and that the case of Taylor proceeded on facts entirely dissimilar. The latter case was a contract of sale of a going business with the premises in which it was carried on, which were under lease, and the assignation to the lease was delayed for some weeks, in course of which the seller became bankrupt. But that is a clear case of a completed contract beyond the sixty days, and the obligation to grant the assignation was not conditional but simul et semel with the contract of sale.

I think the interlocutor should be altered, and decree of reduction pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordship, and on the same ground. I think the case of Moncreiff is in point exactly, and therefore is conclusive, unless we can disregard it as an authority, which I am not prepared to do. After reading the report of Moncreiff I was somewhat surprised that the Lord Ordinary did not think it in point, and I read more than once the observations made by his Lordship to shew that it was not in point, but I cannot find his reasons distinctly stated. His Lordship says,—“The case of Moncreiff v. The Union Bank is an authority for the rule of law which may be extracted from it, but it is no authority for the construction of a different contract from that which was then in question.” I rather think that, being interpreted, means what I have heard was sometimes said in England where the Court thought a case relied on was ill decided, that the case is an authority for itself and must be followed where everything is just exactly the same. The Act of 1696 has given occasion for a great diversity of opinions. It seems fated to be so. In short, as Lord Fullerton says, it is impossible to reconcile the conflicting decisions,⁴ but I think we have some propositions firmly established. It does not apply to a sale—that is, to implement of a contract of sale by the bankrupt delivering the goods after bankruptcy or within sixty days of it. That has been provided for since the case of *Gibson v. Forbes*⁵ by Act of Parliament, for by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, where a seller of goods has received payment of the price, these no longer pass to his creditors, but the buyer is entitled to delivery. No question under the Act 1696 can occur again such as arose in Gibson v. Forbes, but the case is useful as establishing the principle that where a buyer pays the price of goods bought and received, or a seller delivers the goods that he has sold and has been paid for, that is not a case of satisfying or securing a debt. It is a case of exactly satisfying an obligation, but there is no debt secured or unsecured, satisfied or unsatisfied, therefore there is no satisfying a debt or giving security for it. It is also on that principle that Taylor v. Farrie was decided. It was a purchase and sale, and all that was done was implement by the seller. There was no security or satisfaction by way of inducing the purchaser to be content.

But here there is a security given—a security given for a prior debt. That admittedly is struck at by the Act 1696 unless there is a contract binding and efficacious in law to the contrary. Now, I quite agree with the doctrine that is stated by Professor Bell, that where it is stipulated that a specific security shall be given over a particular subject, in consideration and on the faith of which a transfer of goods or an advance of money is made, the completion of that security, although after an interval of time and after the term of constructive bankruptcy has begun, is not within the meaning of the Act.¹ But I assent to it only as meaning this, which I understand it to mean, that the security bargained for is to be simultaneous and contemporaneous with the debt, and if it is given as soon as may be—as soon as the formalities can be gone through—though bankruptcy has come, or it be within sixty days of it, it will nevertheless be considered simultaneous and contemporaneous with the debt. Just as in the case of a sale for ready-money. It is none the less so where a party asks for an article across the counter and the article has been delivered to him before he has taken the money out of his purse, or gone to the bank or to his house to bring it. It is a ready-money transaction, and though the purchaser may have walked off with the goods it would still be regarded as a ready-money transaction. It is not a sale on credit. And so where there is an advance on security stipulated for to be instantaneous, it will be esteemed so notwithstanding that some minutes or hours, or even a few days, may elapse before the formalities are completed. But where the stipulation is not for a simultaneous security, but that the debtor shall give security, (and I do not care whether it is general or over a particular subject,) whenever the creditor sees it is his interest to demand it, that is a different thing. That was the stipulation in the case of Moncreiff, and Lord Ivory there says that it is a device to evade the operation of the statute. But for that device the Act would have applied in terms to a security granted within sixty days of sequestration, and if the security is bad by the Act it is bad notwithstanding any device to frustrate the operation of the Act. The creditor says,—“You shall give it at any time when I demand it, and if that should happen to be on the eve of bankruptcy the Act 1696 shall not apply.” That is the parties contracting themselves out of the Act. I think it clear that parties cannot contract themselves out of the Act 1696. It shall apply whenever circumstances make it applicable, notwithstanding any contract between parties to the contrary. Here the contract was, “Go on and act as the owner of the shares, sit as chairman of the company, and whenever I desire it you are to give a transfer; and it is also the contract between us that the Act 1696 shall not apply.” That is a device to evade the operation of the statute, and an attempt by parties to contract themselves out of the statute. The result is that I agree with your Lordship that decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the action.

ALEXANDER FLEMING AND OTHERS (Jarvie's Trustees), Claimants (Respondents).—Gloag—Fleming.

Writ—Delivery—Trust—Policy of insurance in favour of wife and children.
—Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and the children of the marriage did not confer a vested right in the beneficiaries without delivery, actual or constructive, of the policy.

—Circumstances which were held not to amount to delivery of a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and children.

By policy of assurance, dated 6th September 1870, the Scottish Provident Institution, on a narrative that Nedrick Jarvie, manufacturer, Glasgow, had complied with certain conditions and had paid the first year's premium, certified that Jarvie had "been duly admitted a member" of the institution, and that Alexander Fleming, merchant, Glasgow, and others, "in trust, as directed by writing under the hand of the said Nedrick Jarvie for behoof of Mrs Eliza Miller or Jarvie, his wife, and the children of their marriage, whom failing, the heirs and assignees of the said Nedrick Jarvie, shall be entitled to receive, out of the funds of the said institution, at the end of six months after the decease of the said Nedrick Jarvie, the sum of £1000: . . . But always with and under this condition, that the said Nedrick Jarvie shall duly pay, or cause to be paid, to the said institution, on the receipt of the manager for the time being, the future annual contribution of £35, 14s. 2d. sterling, on or before the 6th day of September in every succeeding year during his life, or within one calendar month thereafter"; but always under certain specified conditions.

1st DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.

By assignation dated 6th and 7th April 1885 Mr Fleming and the other trustees, with consent of Mrs Jarvie, the three children of Mr Jarvie who had reached majority, and the three minor children of Mr Jarvie, acting with consent of their father "as their administrator-in-law," assigned in favour of Mr Jarvie their interest in the above-mentioned policy of assurance. The assignation proceeded on the narrative that, "considering that the premiums on said certificate or policy of assurance have all along been paid by the said Nedrick Jarvie, and that the said policy of assurance has never been delivered to us, or any of us, as the trustees named in it, and the fact of its existence was only recently communicated to us, which communication was made to us in connection with a request by the said Nedrick Jarvie that we should grant these presents, and that we have never acted as trustees under the said policy in any manner of way. And further, considering that the said Nedrick Jarvie recently represented to us that the said certificate or policy had all along been and remained in his possession undelivered, and under his control, and that he has given no direction by writing under his hand or otherwise as to the disposal of the said policy or the sums thereby assured, and that the donation or provision which he contemplated making by the said certificate or policy, and by a writing under his hand which he contemplated granting in terms of said certificate or policy, has never been completed, but that the said certificate or policy and the sums thereby assured remained his individual property, and at his free disposal, and that he has requested us in these circumstances to convey the same to him in manner under written."

On 14th April 1885 Mr Jarvie, in terms of a bond and assignation of that date, granted by him in favour of the Scottish Provident Institution, obtained from them on loan on the security of the above policy the sum of £230.

By trust-deed, dated 8th February 1886, Mr Jarvie conveyed his whole estates to Mr Martin, accountant, Glasgow, in trust for his creditors.

Mr Jarvie died on 21st March 1886. On 12th April 1886 Mr Martin, in name of the Scottish Provident Institution (as nominal raisers), raised an action of multiplepounding.

The fund in medio was stated as the sum of £1000 (the amount of the policy), under deduction of the loan of £230.

Mr Martin and the trustees under the policy both claimed the fund in medio; and in their condescendence admitted the facts as stated in the narrative of the assignation above set forth.

Mr Martin pleaded;—(1) The said policy of assurance being the property of the said deceased Nedrick Jarvie, and forming part of his estate, the claimant as trustee for behoof of his creditors is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

The trustees pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said policy created an irrevocable provision for Mr Jarvie's wife and children. (2) The consent of the wife and minor children being of no avail, the said assignation is null or reducible, and should be set aside or reduced. (5) The said assignation and what followed thereon being of no effect, the claimants should be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

On 3d November 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) ranked and preferred the claimants Alexander Fleming and others upon the fund in medio in terms of their claim.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action instituted for the purpose of determining the right to the proceeds of a policy of life assurance for £1000, effected by Nedrick Jarvie, deceased, with the Scottish Provident Institution, less the sum of £230 advanced upon it by the insurers. The competition is between Mr Jarvie's creditors and his wife and children.

"The policy bears that Mr Jarvie had been admitted a member of the society, and that certain persons named as trustees, 'in trust, as directed by writing under the hand of the said Nedrick Jarvie, for behoof of Mrs Eliza Miller or Jarvie, his wife, and the children of their marriage, whom failing, the heirs and assignees of the said Nedrick Jarvie,' should be entitled to receive the said sum of £1000 six months after his death, provided that Mr Jarvie should regularly pay or cause to be paid the stipulated annual premiums.

"Thereafter Mr Jarvie's wife and family, on the narrative stated in the record, assigned the policy to him, and thereupon he obtained an advance of £230 from the society. The children are said to have been in minority at the time, and to have acted under the advice of their father.

"The first question is, what is the meaning of the obligation to pay to Mr Jarvie's wife and children? It was contended by one of the parties that 'and' is to be construed here as a word of destination, and that the gift is to Mrs

Mr Martin reclaimed, and argued;—The first and most important question raised in this case was whether a policy of assurance was an “irrevocable transfer” in the sense in which the Lord Ordinary used the words—viz., that when once taken out in name of a certain party, the person taking it out could not change the name of the donee under it. He submitted that it was not. There was nothing peculiar in the nature of a policy of assurance, and taking a policy out in the name of a third party was in all respects analogous to taking a security for a debt in the name of another. The creditor in such a debt could undoubtedly go to the debtor and make him change the name of the party to whom the money was payable. The language of the note of the Lord Ordinary would apply not only to a policy of assurance, but to any analogous document taken in favour of a third party. As regarded policies of assurance it required a statute—Married Women’s Property Act, 1886 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 26), sec. 2—to make policies irrevocable as provisions to wives, and even under the statute the trustee on a policy, with consent of the wife, obtained leave from the Court to surrender the policy.¹ That case went to this, that there was no indefeasible right in the beneficiary merely because her name was in the policy. This policy would have acted as a good testamentary provision, if it had been found in Jarvie’s repositories, or had been delivered, and so put out of his power of alteration.² The right of the wife here was to depend on some writing to be afterwards executed, but which was not executed. The act was incomplete, and all the circumstances shewed that his mind was not made up whether he should revoke the gift or not. A beneficiary could not be vested with an indefeasible right by a deed which he never heard of, and which was Jarvie in liferent (or possibly in fee), and to the children after her death. I have not been able to adopt this reading. The gift is to the wife and children in trust, as may be directed by Mr Jarvie. As Mr Jarvie left no deed of directions, I think that all the donees must share equally, unless they are displaced by the other claimants, the mother sharing with the children. This is an unusual arrangement, but I think it is the legal meaning of the words used.

“The next question is, who are the creditors in the obligation of the Scottish Provident Institution to pay £1000 after death? I think that the trustees for the wife and children are the creditors, although these gentlemen did not in fact know of the existence of the deed until after Mr Jarvie’s death. On behalf of Mr Jarvie’s creditors it is urged that the gift was not completed by delivery of the policy to the trustees. In my opinion, this is not a case where delivery by Mr Jarvie was necessary to vest the right in the donee, because, under this policy, Mr Jarvie was never instituted creditor in the obligation, and the obligation in its inception was in favour of the trustees for wife and children.

“It is as in the case of a person who pays money into the account of another. The payment of the premiums to the society was, in my opinion, an irrevocable transfer of funds into the hands of a third party for the benefit of the wife and children. The trust was sufficient for the protection of the interest of unborn or unnamed children, and when the time of payment arrived it would be the duty of the society to apprise the trustees of this irrevocable investment in their names.

“The next point is, whether there is a good assignment of the policy by Mr Jarvie’s wife and children to Mr Jarvie himself. I think not, because the husband and father, being the administrator-in-law for his wife and children, could not legally take from them a deed in favour of himself.

“From these considerations I come to the conclusion that the assignation is ineffectual, and that Mr Jarvie’s creditors are not entitled to be preferred to the fund in medio.”

undelivered.¹ Delivery or publication was essential. Intimation of an assignation or the recording of an heritable security were by law equivalent to delivery, but there was nothing of that kind here. The case was distinguishable from Craig v. Galloway.² There there was no question as to whether delivery had taken place. It was assumed all through the case. Here the whole question was delivery. It could not be said that the father here was holding as the proper custodian for his children. The trustees were the proper custodians. To read the gift in the policy as a fee to the wife, you must read in the words "in fee" between the words "wife" and "children" in the policy. There was no authority for doing that, and no indication that such was the father's intention. The assignation was not good except with regard to the major children.

Argued for the respondents;—The intention of Mr Jarvie was clearly to make an irrevocable provision for his wife and children, and therefore he appointed trustees to hold the fund. The provision was in favour of a class, and he could not disappoint the class; all that he could do was to reserve a power of apportionment to himself. Jarvie by taking the policy in his own name, and then assigning it to trustees and intimating the assignation, could have divested himself. An intimated assignation, though the deed was not actually delivered, was effectual.³ All that was required was intimation to the debtor; that was supplied here by the narrative contained in the deed of April 1885, which disclosed to the company the rights of parties. All the facts here were in favour of delivery. Mr Jarvie had no interest in the fund, it was not payable till his death, and the trustees were creditors in the policy. The case was distinguishable from Hill's case,⁴ for there the fund never left the grantor's hands. Here, Jarvie did his best to put the fund out of his own reach and that of his creditors by nominating trustees. The case was ruled by Craig v. Galloway, which proceeded on the assumption that the policy, the premiums of which were paid as here out of the husband's funds, was intended as a provision for the wife. The provision ought to be read as a fee to the wife.⁵ Mr Jarvie here was the proper custodian of the policy for his wife and children, and therefore there was an equivalent to the delivery as in Craig's case. The trustees were only appointed to pay, not to hold the fund. Up to the death of Mr Jarvie they had no duties to perform, and therefore that point of distinction between this case and Craig v. Galloway was displaced. There was no indication that any new writing was required to complete this act. The words "as directed" were in the past tense, and alluded to the proposal for the policy. Were it not for the assignation which followed, that would certainly have been the meaning assigned to those words. The assignation was really out of the case altogether, because the father had no power to act for his children or his wife in such a matter.⁶

Jan. 28, 1887.
Jarvie's Trustees v. Jarvie's Trustees.

The policy was taken by Mr Jarvie himself in 1870. He applied then to be admitted a member of the Scottish Provident Institution, and to become a contributor to its funds. He made payment of the first premium when he obtained the policy, and the insurers in consideration of that payment certified that he had been "duly admitted a member," and that certain trustees therein named "as directed by writing under the hand of the said Nedrick Jarvie for behoof of Mrs Eliza Miller or Jarvie, his wife, and the children of their marriage, whom failing, the heirs and assignees of the said Nedrick Jarvie, shall be entitled to receive, out of the funds of the said institution, at the end of six months after the decease of the said Nedrick Jarvie, the sum of £1000: But always with and under this condition, that the said Nedrick Jarvie shall duly pay, or cause to be paid, to the said institution, on the receipt of the manager for the time being, the future annual contribution of £35, 14s. 2d. sterling, on or before the 6th day of September in every succeeding year during his life, or within one calendar month thereafter."

This policy was delivered to Mr Jarvie, and remained in his custody and possession till fifteen years after, during the whole of which period the existence of the trust affecting the contents of the policy was unknown to the trustees named therein, or so far as we know to the beneficiaries under the policy, viz., Mr Jarvie's wife and children. In short the trust was in every sense latent, and the deed creating it remained in Mr Jarvie's possession.

The question then comes to be, whether upon the facts of the case, combined with the terms of the policy, the contents of the policy on his death become the property of the trustees under the policy (or rather, whether they are entitled to draw the proceeds and apply them in terms of the policy), or whether the proceeds do not form part of the estate of Mr Jarvie, and so fall to the trustee for his creditors. The question is, whether there has been anything equivalent to delivery of the policy for the benefit of the beneficiaries. The Lord Ordinary has not considered that question, because he is of opinion that the policy did not require delivery to make it an "irrevocable transfer of funds" in their favour. In that ground of judgment I cannot concur. If such a deed remains undelivered in the hands of the person who causes it to be made in favour of another person, it remains entirely in his power. To hold otherwise would be to go back on a long series of cases of which I will only mention Hill v. Hill, M. 11,580, and Walker's Executor v. Walker, 5 R. 965.

No doubt in those cases the deed in question was not a policy of insurance but a bond for money. The creditor in the bond made it payable to another person than himself—in the case of Hill to his son, in the case of Walker to himself and his wife—but in both cases the deed, though so payable, remained in the custody and power of the party who actually made it; and the doctrine of those cases is that, so long as that is the state of matters, there can be no equivalent to delivery. The circumstance that the deed here in question is a policy of insurance does not bear on the question. The obligation of the insurers is to pay a sum in certain events to a certain person just the same as if they had been debtors in a bond, and in truth a policy of insurance is just a bond by the insurers to pay a certain sum to a person named. It appears to me that here, if

No. 79. there had been no trust, and the policy had been taken to the wife and children without the intervention of trustees, and the husband had kept the deed in his possession, the result must have been the same. The deed remained within his power. In the cases I have mentioned the only party who could demand payment was the son or the wife, but still the Court held that the money was the property of the father in the one case, and of the husband in the other, and that on the grounds which I have stated.

Jan. 28, 1887.
Jarvie's Trustees v. Jarvie's Trustees.

The question, then, comes to this: Is there anything like an equivalent to delivery here? I think all the circumstances are very unfavourable to that view. In the first place, we are bound, I think, to look at the terms of the policy itself to see what was the intention of Mr Jarvie. He creates a trust by the policy, and gives the trustees the right to receive payment of £1000 soon after his death, and he gives them power to receive it "as directed by writing" under his hand. That suggests at once a good reason for keeping the deed in his own hands; he keeps the trust entirely latent, for he has not made up his mind exactly what to do with the money. He means to make another writing to declare his final purpose as to the proportions in which the money shall be paid. That obviously means that he does not intend to deliver the deed, or make its purposes known, until his mind is finally made up on the matter. There is another consideration which shews he had not made up his mind,—that is, that he uses the words "for behoof of his wife and the children of the marriage." That is a curious phrase, and one unknown in practice. I have never had occasion (and I do not suppose any of your Lordships have had) to construe such a phrase, and I think that suggests that Mr Jarvie never intended those words to be a final expression of his intention; on the contrary, knowing it to be obscure, he did not intend that anything should be done under the trust until he had done something further under another writing. So the deed itself affords evidence that he did not intend it to be in any sense a delivered evident available to anyone but himself.

Now, what was done in 1885 does not, I think, affect the question. He took this assignation on the footing that there was a vested interest in the beneficiaries, but the narrative in that deed, though available in argument, does not touch the question. An ingenious argument was submitted that the society being aware of the trust and the purposes for which it was created, they had therefore intimation of the rights of parties interested in the policy, and that that is, in effect, the same thing as if the policy had been taken in his own name, and had been assigned to trustees and intimated. The case referred to on that point is the case of M'Lurg, M. 845. No doubt that case is somewhat near this on the facts, but it is very far from it in legal effect. Taking the policy to himself and assigning it, is like taking it direct to another person, but there is a legal doctrine in the one case which is wanting in the other. If you execute an assignation, that is made effectual by intimation without delivery, just as a conveyance of land is effectual without delivery if you take infestment in favour of a third party. The infestment and the intimation complete the right, and afford a complete publication or equivalent to delivery. The two questions therefore involve totally different propositions in law.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that this policy forms part of Mr Jarvie's estate, and therefore passes to the trustee under his trust-deed for creditors.

LORD MURE.—The case of Craig v. Galloway has been strongly pressed upon us in support of the claim of Mr Jarvie's widow and children, and, if the facts of this case had been substantially the same as those which there occurred, I should have been very glad to have given effect to the claim for the trustees under the policy. But I do not think that the facts of this case come up to those of Craig v. Galloway. There the policy had been delivered, and the receipts for the premiums were also in the possession of the wife; and the broad ground on which the House of Lords decided that case was that, in these circumstances, the policy of insurance was to be looked upon as a provision for the wife, there having been no marriage-contract, and the husband being solvent at the time the policy was effected. It was there held that the fact of the receipts being in the custody of the wife shewed that it was intended to be a provision for her. But in this case neither the wife nor the trustees ever had possession either of the policy or of the receipts for the premiums. The policy remained in the possession of the husband, and the trust remained inoperative and unknown until 1886, when the assignation of the policy was granted. Up to that time the trustees knew nothing of the trust or of the existence of the policy. In those circumstances, I am of opinion that there was here no delivery of the deed or anything equivalent to delivery, and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the contents of the policy must be held to form part of Mr Jarvie's estate, and that the claim of his trustee should be sustained.

Jan. 28, 1887.
Jarvie's Trustees v. Jarvie's Trustees.

LORD SHAND.—I have come with reluctance to the same conclusion as your Lordships. I think with Lord Mure that had it been possible we should gladly have sustained this claim for Mr Jarvie's widow and children, especially as there is enough to shew that he intended that the policy should at all events ultimately form a provision for them.

I concur in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's view of the case cannot be maintained. His Lordship says in reference to the payments of premiums following on the policy taken in the names of the trustees,—“It is as in the case of a person who pays money into the account of another.” Now, that is an unambiguous act which means that the money is there and then given over to another party, but I do not think that the mere taking out of this policy and payment of premiums can be assimilated to that. The Lord Ordinary goes on to say,—“The payment of the premiums to the society was, in my opinion, an irrevocable transfer of funds into the hands of a third party, for the benefit of the wife and children.” A complete answer to that is, that it has been held in the stronger case of money being lent to one person and the obligation taken for repayment by the lender to another, that this alone does not create a right in the third party. The reason is, that so long as the lender retains the custody of the document, it is in his power to alter the destination or have it altered, and therefore there is no “irrevocable transfer.” So here the circumstances of the policy being taken in the name of trustees followed by the payment of premiums, cannot by itself operate an irrevocable transfer. I think that, as well on reason as on authority (particularly the authority of the case of Hill v. Hill), in a case where the person taking out the policy is still in life retaining his power over it, the view stated by the Lord Ordinary cannot be sustained.

The question therefore comes to be one of fact. Was the policy delivered? On that question, I am disposed to take the view that the terms of the policy create a destination in favour of the wife. It has been held that where there is a destination to a wife in life and to children in fee, the fee is in the wife, and I think there is much to be said for the view that we should read this as a destination in these terms. But taking it that the policy contains a destination to trustees to hold the policy and pay the proceeds to the wife; it appears to me that looking at all the circumstances delivery has not been made out. If the destination had been simply to the wife, and it appeared that the husband had held the policy simply as the proper custodian for her deed, then the case could not have been distinguished from Craig v. Galloway. But in Craig's case, as your Lordship has said, delivery was assumed. Here the elements against delivery are very strong. In the first place, the destination is not directly in favour of the wife, but to trustees, and I think that shews that if Mr Jarvie intended the deed to be looked on as delivered, it should have been given into the custody of the trustees; they were the proper custodians. He was not a custodian for them, as he might be for his wife. Again, these trustees were to hold the money as directed by a writing under Mr Jarvie's hand. Mr Gloag has argued that this must refer to some writing already executed, but it is agreed that no such writing was ever executed, and I do not think the words can be so read. They evidently refer to some contemplated writing, and it is reasonable to assume that he deferred giving delivery till the writing was executed. Taking then the fact that the policy was in favour of trustees for the wife, that Mr Jarvie never parted with the custody of it, and that it contained the clauses just referred to, I am of opinion that it was not delivered, and that being so, I think that it forms part of the husband's estate, and must go to the trustee for his creditors.

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary in his note says,—“In my opinion this is not a case where delivery by Mr Jarvie was necessary to vest the right in the donee, because under this policy Mr Jarvie was never instituted creditor in the obligation, and the obligation in its inception was in favour of the trustees for wife and children.” If the Lord Ordinary means that as an expression of the law as regards all documents where an obligation is conceived in favour of a third party, it is quite unsound. It is directly at variance with Hill v. Hill, and the well-known principle that merely taking a document in name of an individual will not per se establish donation, proof aliunde of actual donation being necessary. The Lord Ordinary does not attempt to draw any distinction between this and any other bond, and, if that is so, it is decisive against his view of the case. If the policy required to be delivered, or to be held for behoof of the donee by someone else, then that is not proved, because in this case Mr Jarvie was not the proper custodian for the donees; the trustees were. I concur in thinking further that the clause in the policy which points to the execution of some future deed shews why he retained the control of the policy. He kept it till he made up his mind how the money was to be apportioned.

We cannot go on the statements made in the assignment of 1886, for obviously that statement was made when the circumstances had changed. It would have been different if the statements there as to the policy having remained in his individual possession had been made unico contextu with the policy, so I prefer not to rest on the statements there made at all. I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and ranked and preferred the claimant James Martin to the fund in medio, in terms of his claim.

Earl of Glasgow v. Boyle.

Prescription—Entail—Limited and unlimited title—Consolidation.—An entail, dated in 1715, comprised, inter alia, certain lands the dominium utile of which had been disposed by the entailor or his predecessors prior to the date of the entail, so that the entail only carried the superiority thereof. The dominium utile was acquired in 1721 by the next succeeding heir of entail, who took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, being a different destination from that contained in the entail. He was not infeft either under the entail or under the disposition. In 1765 the next heir was infeft upon the unexecuted precept in the conveyance of 1721, having previously served heir in general to the last heir. The next heir in 1780 made up a title under the entail, but no separate title to the said lands, which he possessed along with the entailed estate down to 1843, when he died.

Held that consolidation had not operated so as to bring the dominium utile of the said lands within the entail, and that a subsequent heir was therefore proprietor thereof in fee-simple.

Elidauk v. Campbell, 12 S. 74, distinguished.

UNDER a deed of entail, dated 2d and recorded 30th July 1715, granted by David, first Earl of Glasgow, the lands of Kelburne and others, in the counties of Ayr and Bute, were entailed upon his son and the other heirs of entail therein mentioned. Prior to the entail part of the lands (Bellichevan and Culoch) had been disposed by the Earl or his predecessors, to be holden of the granter and his successors as superiors thereof, so that the conveyance in the deed of entail carried only the dominium directum of these lands. The dominium utile of these lands was acquired by Lord Boyle, the entailor's eldest son, afterwards second Earl of Glasgow, by disposition, dated 31st March 1721, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 11th January 1751, from James Boyle of Bellichevan, who then possessed the lands on apparenay. The disposition was in favour of Lord Boyle and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, not of the series of heirs set forth in the entail. Lord Boyle was never infeft on the disposition, but possessed the lands down to his death in 1741. In 1733 he had succeeded his father, David, under the deed of entail, but never took infeftment thereunder. In 1742 John, third Earl of Glasgow, son of the second Earl, exped a general service to his father, and he afterwards exped an instrument of sasine, dated 19th September and recorded 30th October 1765, following on the precept contained in the disposition of 1721 by James Boyle in favour of his father, and on the retour of his service as heir in general to his father.

The third Earl was succeeded in 1775 by his son George, the fourth Earl, who completed no separate title to Bellichevan and Culoch, but made up a title to the entailed lands by instrument of sasine, recorded 30th May 1780, and possessed the former lands along with the entailed estate down to his death in 1843. George, fourth Earl, was succeeded in 1843 by his son James, the fifth Earl. In 1853 the law-agent of Earl James, duly authorised by a commission granted in his favour by the Earl, executed a combined charter of confirmation of the disposition of 1721 and precept of clare constat, dated 5th May 1853. The charter of confirmation confirmed the lands and the disposition granted in 1721 by James Boyle in favour of John, Lord Boyle, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, the retour of the service of John, the third Earl, as heir in general to his father John, Lord Boyle, and the infeftment following thereon in 1765, to be holden the said lands and others immediately of the said James, Earl of Glasgow, and his successors, superiors thereof, in free blench farm for ever. The precept of clare constat stated that it appeared that the said John, third Earl of Glasgow, died last vest and seized in the said lands under the titles above narrated; and that James, then Earl of Glasgow, was nearest and lawful heir of his grandfather, the said Earl John, in the said lands and others. Upon this precept James, Earl of Glasgow, was infeft, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour, recorded 10th May 1853. He possessed the lands from 1843 until his death in 1869.

In 1869 James, the fifth Earl, was succeeded by his brother George, the sixth Earl. He did not succeed to the fee-simple lands left by his brother, but subsequently purchased them from his brother's trustees. In June 1869 he served heir of tailzie and provision to his brother.

A question having arisen as to whether the lands of Bellichevan and Culoch were included in the entail or not, a special case was presented to the Court by (1) Lord Glasgow and the trustees under a trust-disposition and conveyance executed by him, and (2) the next heirs of entail, the question put being,—“Does the entail of Kelburne include the superiority only of the lands of Bellichevan and Culoch, or has the dominium utile of these lands come by consolidation to be embraced in the entail?”

The second parties maintained “that in virtue of the prescriptive possession upon the superiority title by Earl George from 1775 to 1843, the base feudal right was extinguished and consolidated as effectually as if resignation ad remanentiam had taken place, and that the property of the said lands was therefore included in the entail as well as the mere superiority.” The first parties maintained “that there was no such consolidation as is contended for by the second party—the property of the said lands having been held on a different destination from the superiority, and the possession by Earl George having been of the superiority only under his entailed title.”

Argued for the first parties;—The present question was not solved by any previous decision, but the case of Bruce v. Bruce, infra, was the exact converse of it. Where a person had two absolute titles to one estate, prescription was not applicable, as he was presumed to possess upon both even although he had made up his title on the one and had ignored the other.¹ But an exception was introduced where there was an interest to sopite one of the titles, or where something was to be gained by setting one of them up as against the other. Where the heir made up his title in such a way as to involve a challenge, the result of unchallenged possession might be to fortify one of his titles as against the other.² Where possession was on apparency, and neither title completed, it was held that both titles subsisted.³ The above cases were all cases of proper double title. The present case was not, for there were here not only two titles, —one limited, the other unlimited,—but also two subjects, the dominium directum and the dominium utile of the lands in question.¹ The doctrine of consolidation was thus said to be applicable. But consolidation did not operate ipso jure,² but only by resignation ad remanentiam, which had not here been resorted to, or by prescriptive possession. The second party relied on Earl George's possession, and the fact that he had made up no separate title to the dominium utile of the said lands. But that fact alone was not enough, unless Earl George's intention was shewn, to merge the fee-simple title in the entail. It was impossible to presume such an intention, for (1) there was no obligation to possess under the entail only, as in Lord Elibank's case, infra, and (2) the interest was of course in favour of possessing on the unlimited title. Where there were two titles to either of which possession might be ascribed in dubio, the law ascribed it to the more beneficial, and the presumption was in favour of freedom.³ It was settled law that apparenacy was a good basis for prescription.⁴ As to the case of Lord Elibank,⁵ which was founded on by the other side, there were distinctions between it and the present case which were of great importance. In that case there could hardly be said to be two competing titles; there was the clearest intention on the part of the entailer to include the fee-simple lands within the entail, and further, the series of heirs under both titles were the same in that case, while here they were different—(see per Lord Mackenzie in Wilson v. Pollok, supra).

Earl of Glasgow v. Boyle.

The second parties argued;—From 1773 to 1853 the lands in question had been possessed on one infeftment only, viz., upon the superiority title, and the case was not one of double title. Accordingly, the authorities cited by the first parties were not in point. Consolidation operated after the forty years' possession on one infeftment had run, which in this case was prior to 1853.⁶ Possession upon a superiority title necessarily wiped out all other infeftments.⁶ It was important to observe in this case that there had been an unbroken descent from father to son until the present Earl succeeded. Accordingly the line of succession, whether under the entail or under the fee-simple title, had not been split. The only feudally complete title was to the superiority, which was habile to import possession of the dominium utile. It might be that there was a presumption in favour of freedom, but where there were two titles the possession was referable to the more eminent of the two, viz., in this case the superiority title.⁷ There was no authority for the view that a personal title, or one on apparenacy, could prevail against

The only authority for that proposition was to be found in the case of Wilson.¹ But Mr Ross had stated that his opinion did not accord with Lord Mackenzie's dictum in that case.² Lord Mackenzie was there dealing with the question of proper double title. Prescription could never follow upon an apparenry title.

Jan. 28, 1887.
Earl of Glasgow v. Boyle.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The material facts of this case are as follows :—The Kelburne entail is dated 2d July 1715, and was made by David, first Earl of Glasgow. It contains among other parcels of lands the lands of Bellichevan and Culoch. But prior to the date of the entail these lands had been feued out to be held of the entailer or his ancestors as immediate lawful superiors. The dominium utile therefore was not and could not be comprehended in the entail, and the conveyance of Bellichevan and Culoch to the heirs of entail carried the dominium directum only.

The second Earl of Glasgow before he succeeded to the title and estates acquired the dominium utile, and in 1721 took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. He was not infest, but in 1742 his son, the third Earl, exped a general service to his father, thereby acquiring right to the unexecuted precept in the disposition of 1721, and completed his title to the dominium utile by infestment on that precept in 1765. The third Earl had thus one title to the dominium directum under the entail, and a separate title to the dominium utile in favour of himself and his heirs-general under the infestment of 1765.

From that date and down to 1853, the Earls of Glasgow have possessed the lands, both property and superiority, of Bellichevan and Culoch, being all of them not only heirs of entail under the entail of 1715, but also heirs-general under the disposition of 1721 and infestment of 1765. No consolidation of the property and superiority has taken place by resignation or otherwise, unless consolidation has been operated by prescription as contended for by the second party. The last investiture of the dominium utile prior to 1853 is the infestment taken by the third Earl, while on the other hand each succeeding Earl has made up a title to the entailed estate. In this state of the facts, the second party contends, that the heir of entail having possessed on the superiority title of the entail for more than forty years, the base fee has been extinguished and consolidation has been effected as completely as if there had been resignation ad remanentiam followed by forty years' possession. And this position would be impregnable if the heirs of the entail had during the prescriptive period only one title to which their possession could be ascribed. But possession of the dominium utile began in 1765 upon the infestment of the third Earl which was a fee-simple title, and although neither the fourth nor the fifth Earls were infest in the dominium utile till the years of prescription had run, they had a title of possession quite as good as heirs-general, viz, the title of apparenry, and there are no acts of possession alleged of such a nature as to be ascribable to one of these titles more than to the other. When, therefore, in 1853, the fifth Earl, No. 80. by his commissioner, executed a charter of confirmation and precept of clare in Jan. 23, 1887. his own favour, confirming the disposition of 1721 in favour of the second Earl, Earl of Glas- the retour of service of the third Earl as heir-general to his father, and his in- gow v. Boyle. feftment of 1765, the first parties contend that he had a good prescriptive fee-simple title to the base fee by virtue of this same forty years' possession which is founded on by the second parties in favour of the heir of entail. I am of opinion that the contention of the first parties must be sustained, because it is founded on two well-established principles or rules of law.

1. The first of these two rules is, that possession for forty years, following upon a disposition and sasine, will make a good prescriptive title, although part of the forty years' possession has been by an apparent heir or heirs uninfest.

For some time in the course of the last century the judgments of the Court on this question fluctuated, but in the case of Caitcheon in 1791, M. 10,810, the question arose purely for decision, and resulted in the establishment of the rule I have stated. The rule there settled has not since been departed from, but, on the contrary, is confirmed by subsequent authorities, of which Neilson v. Erskine, 2 Shaw, 216, and Hamilton v. Westenra, 6 Shaw, 44, may be taken as examples.

2. The second rule to which I refer is that when a person has two titles to the same lands, to either of which his prescriptive possession may be ascribed, the one title being unlimited and the other limited (as by an entail), the presumption is in favour of freedom, and he is entitled to ascribe the possession to the fee-simple title, and to hold the lands in fee-simple accordingly, unless the nature of the possession is not consistent with the title to which he seeks to ascribe it. The principle on which this rule is founded is very clearly expounded by Lord Kilkerran in reporting the case of Smith and Bogle v. Gray in 1752, M. 10,803. After explaining that while the heir in both titles is the same no question can arise, he proceeds to say, that where the succession "comes to split," the question "is resolved by a distinction that if by both rights the possessor is unlimited far then prescription cannot run by possession on the one title against the other; but if one of the titles be an unlimited right and the other be a limited right, e.g., by a tailzie or a clause of return, then, if the possession has been for forty years upon the unlimited title, the limitation in the other title will be wrought out by prescription."

Again, in the case of Bruce v. Carstairs in 1770, M. 10,805, the rule is thus applied by the Court,—"In the present case there were two titles in the same person, the one limited, the other not. The parties were in these circumstances entitled to ascribe their possession to, and to plead upon, the unlimited title. Their creditors would have been entitled to carry off the lands as an unlimited fee by adjudication, and upon the same principle must they, i.e., the lands, as a fee-simple, descend to the heir of line." This judgment was appealed, and affirmed by the House of Lords.

It is only necessary in conclusion to notice the case of Elibank v. Campbell, 12 S. 74, on which in the argument the second parties mainly relied. In that case, no doubt, the operation of the positive prescription following on the entail was held to have effected a consolidation of the dominium utile of the lands of Stantalane (which had been feued out for a temporary purpose by the entailer to his law-agent prior to the date of the entail) with the dominium directum of the same lands which was within the entail. But the circumstances afford a complete contrast to those of the present case. The entail's law-agent had within a few weeks of the creation of the base fee reconveyed to the entailor by disposition, with procuratory and precept, on which, however, no title was ever made up by the entailor or any of the heirs of entail. But for the reconveyance there can be no doubt that the prescriptive possession of the dominium utile of Stantalane must have been ascribed to the tailzied title, for the heirs who possessed had and could have no other; and the Judges seem to have been all of opinion that the execution of the reconveyance by the law-agent with nothing following on it gave them no separate title to the lands. But even supposing that the reconveyance gave them a separate title on which prescriptive possession might follow, they were taken bound by the conditions of the entail to use any separate rights they might happen to acquire or possess for strengthening and supporting the entail, and for no other purpose whatsoever. In these essential particulars the case of Lord Elibank differs from the present, and has therefore, in my opinion, no application as an authority here.

LORD MURR concurred.

LORD ADAM.—In 1853 Earl James made up a fee-simple title to the lands in question, which had been originally conveyed by the disposition of 1721. The question is whether the title so made up is a good title, or, in other words, whether Earl James was entitled to hold these lands in fee-simple. It is quite obvious that in 1853 Earl James was possessing upon two titles, either of which might have furnished him with a complete feudal right to the subjects. If he had the superiority title only, possession upon that would have given him a complete feudal title. So, if he had had only the property title, possession upon that would equally have given him a complete feudal title.

The question is, To which of these titles is his possession to be ascribed? There are no acts stated in the case as being applicable rather to the one title than to the other. That being so, to which is the possession to be ascribed? The presumption, in my opinion, is in favour of freedom, and, that being so, I think the possession must be ascribable to the property and not to the superiority title.

As to the bearing and effect of Lord Elibank's case, I have nothing to add to what has been said by your Lordship in the chair.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the entail of Kelburne includes the superiority only of the lands Bellichevan and Culoch, and not the dominium utile, and decern."

Road—Statute Labour Road—Footpath—Effect of closing road under statutory authority—Negative prescription.—Held that a road over which the public had acquired a right of way for all purposes became thereby a statute labour road, whether the Statute Labour Trustees had allocated statute labour money to its maintenance or not.

Where a public road which is not shewn to have originated as a footpath is shut up as superfluous by the statutory authority, it is shut up for all purposes, and not merely as a cart and carriage road; but question whether the same result would follow if it were shewn that the road was one over which the public had acquired a right of footpath before it became a cart and carriage road.

An action was brought in 1885 for declarator that there existed no public right of way over a piece of ground belonging to the pursuers, and that any public right of way which formerly existed was validly shut up as superfluous in 1869 by the Statute Labour Road Trustees under the authority of their local Act. The defence was a public right of footpath founded on immemorial possession, the defenders further maintaining (1) that the order of the trustees in 1869 was an invalid order, in respect that there was at that date no cart-road over the ground which the trustees could competently shut up, either because the road had never been used by carts, or at least had ceased to be so used for over forty years prior to 1869, or because the trustees had never taken the road under their jurisdiction by the expenditure of statute labour money on it; and (2) that even if the road was validly closed as a cart-road, the public right of footpath over it was unaffected thereby. The following was the import of the proof:—There was no evidence as to the origin of the road in question, but from the earliest point to which the proof extended down to 1820 it was used as a cart-road as well as for foot-passengers. In 1820, owing to the opening of a new turnpike-road, its use as a through road almost entirely disappeared, and from that time onwards such cart traffic as passed over it was almost wholly between the neighbouring farms or connected with two coal pits on the road, but this traffic continued till 1829, and probably till 1835, when the road was partly planted over with trees. From that time it became impassable to wheeled traffic. Foot-passengers still made use of it, though they consisted rather of persons resorting to the road itself to gather sticks and the like than of through-going passengers, and this sort of use continued down to the raising of the action. The evidence as to whether the trustees had allocated any statute labour money to the maintenance of the road was inconclusive, but, at the most, they expended three or four sums of £2 or £3 at irregular intervals from 1807 to 1820, and nothing after 1820. Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that the road in question was a statute labour road under the jurisdiction of the trustees in 1869 when they pronounced the order shutting it up, and that the effect of that order was to close the road as a footpath as well as a cart-road. Decree of declarator granted accordingly.

On 4th November 1885, James C. Hope Vere, Esq. of Blackwood, and the trustees of the late William Tod, Esq. of Logan, brought this action against Daniel Young, tailor, and certain other inhabitants of the village of Kirkmuirhill, in the parish of Lesmahagow and county of Lanark, concluding for declarator;—"That there is no public right of way or servitude of road or passage between the points A and B shewn on the plan herewith produced, and leading from or near the point A on what was formerly the turnpike road from Carlisle to Glasgow, and is now the road from the village of Lesmahagow to Kirkmuirhill, to or near the point B on the new and existing public road from Glasgow to Carlisle, and that

The case turned upon the validity and effect of the order of the Statute Labour Road Trustees referred to in the summons, which was pronounced on the petition of the present pursuers, presented on 8th October 1868.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) "For some time down to the early part of the present century, there existed a public road or right of way along or near the said line A B over the pursuers' property; but the same had been for many years prior to 1868 discontinued and abandoned by the public. The said road was a statute labour road, and was under the care and management of the Statute Labour Trustees, who maintained the same as a statute labour road out of the funds under their care. The road in question was a road in the sense of the said 36th section * which had become superfluous and useless for many years prior to 1869, and had remained so down to that date."

The defenders answered;—(Ans. 4) "Explained that there exists a public footpath or right of passage along the said line A B. For more than forty years prior to 1868, and ever since, the public, especially the inhabitants

* The Act 47 Geo. III., c. xlv., entitled "An Act for amending an Act of the twelfth year of his present Majesty, for repairing and widening several roads through the county of Lanark, and for building a bridge over the River Clyde, at or near a place called The Howford, in the said county; and for making more effectual and converting the statute labour within the said county; and for repairing and regulating the roads within the same," by its 36th section enacted "That it shall be lawful for the trustees in any parish, or for any heritor or other person within the said county, conceiving themselves interested therein, to apply by petition to the annual ward meeting of trustees to have the direction of difficult or inconvenient roads altered and superfluous or useless roads shut up; and the said ward meeting shall thereupon name a committee of at least three trustees, one of whom shall be a Justice of the Peace for the said county, to inspect such roads, and report their opinion of what is proposed to a subsequent ward meeting; and the committee shall order the said petition to be intimated one calendar month before the meeting of such committee, for inspection of the proprietors of the grounds through which the roads are proposed to be carried, either personally or at their dwelling-places, if they reside within the said county, or otherwise to the possessors of the said grounds, and by advertisement upon the church doors of the parishes in which the said grounds lie, upon a Sunday, ten days at least before such meeting; and upon report made by the committee to the ward meeting they shall hear all parties interested and are empowered to order the direction of such roads to be altered and changed, and such superfluous roads to be shut up, providing that nothing herein contained shall be construed to confer on the said trustees a power to alter the course, or shut up any turnpike road . . . Provided always, that any person thinking himself aggrieved by the stopping up of such superfluous roads shall and may appeal against the same in the manner hereinafter mentioned."

The said public footpath or right of passage, which is of considerable width, never was a turnpike or statute labour road, and the said road trustees never exercised any superintendence over it prior to 1868, and they never expended money or labour on its maintenance." Hope Vere v. Young.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect of the procedure by the said road trustees, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The said road having been under the management of the road trustees, and having been duly closed, as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (3) The road in question having been maintained out of the funds under the hands of the road trustees, they were entitled to shut up the same. (6) The defenders not having right to use the road in question, interdict should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The road in question not having been within the jurisdiction or under the administration of said road trustees and justices, the proceedings founded on are ultra vires of said bodies. (2) The road in question being a public footpath upon which no public money had been expended, and which had not been under the management of the road trustees, the said road trustees and justices had no power to shut it up, and the proceedings founded on are ultra vires of said bodies. (3) In any case the road in question being a public footpath, the said road trustees and justices had no power to shut it up, and the proceedings founded on are ultra vires of said bodies.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—The origin of the road was unknown; there was no trace of its ever having been a footpath only. Before 1820 there was a continuation road from the point B to a place called Lochanbank (where there was a mill) on the Lanark and Strathaven Road, and the road in question with this continuation at that time was the most direct route from Lesmahagow to Lochanbank. A large part of the wheeled traffic using it consisted of carts passing between adjoining farms or connected with two coal-pits on the road, but there was evidence of its use for through traffic also. Mrs Peat, an old woman of 83, who had lived all her life in the neighbourhood, gave this evidence;—"I remember the funeral of Walter M'Ghie from the farm of Lochanbank. I think I was then about 7 years old. I saw the funeral start to go to Lesmahagow. I saw it go by the peat road. There was a hearse drawn by one horse, and it was a big funeral. The funeral party would all walk, as there were no coaches. (Q.) There were no gigs in those days? (A.) No, there were not many. I remember the wedding of my cousin, Mrs Donaldson of Netherhouse. I was best-maid on that occasion. I would be 13 or 14 years old at the time. The wedding party walked round by the peat road. I also remember the bride's flitting being taken that road in a cart. It was the regular road to Lesmahagow." There was other evidence to the same effect, though less specific.

The construction of the New Glasgow and Carlisle Road in 1820 opened a more direct route between Lesmahagow and Lochanbank, and from that time the utility of the road in question for purposes of through traffic almost entirely disappeared. The continuation portion from the point B to Lochanbank ceased to be used as a cart-road, and was ploughed up, with the exception of a footpath (over which the pursuers admitted that the public had acquired a right of way). The rest of the road (being that here in question) remained fit for wheeled traffic until 1835, and there was evidence of its occasional use by carts down, at all events, to 1829, and probably to 1835. In 1835 it was partly planted over with trees, and it thereafter ceased to be a thoroughfare for wheeled traffic, although one or two witnesses spoke to having seen carts on it at a later date. It was probably less affected as a footpath by the opening of the new road. The defenders adduced several witnesses who deponed that they were in the habit of using it as a short-cut between the two Glasgow and Carlisle roads, but, on the other hand, there was (after 1820) no centre of population, and few houses which were not better served by one or other of the regular turnpikes—Kirkmuirhill, to which the defenders belonged, being particularly so,—and there was a good deal of evidence which shewed that the road was much resorted to by children as a place of amusement, by persons who went to gather sticks, and by poachers.

The books of the Statute Labour Trustees shewed that on four or five occasions, between 1807 and 1820, small sums of £2 or £3 had been allocated to a road or roads called “Dr Tod’s Road” and the “Lochanbank Road.” Witnesses from the office of the clerk to the trustees deponed, that from the terms of the entries in the books, and from old maps and plans in the office, they were of opinion that the road in question was the only road in the district to which these names could apply. On the other hand, a number of witnesses for the defence, persons from the locality, and also some of the pursuers’ witnesses, deponed that the road in question was always called the “Peat Road” (a name which did not occur in the statute labour books), and that the “Lochanbank Road” and “Dr Tod’s Road” were other roads, which they specified. In any case the road, which was from 24 to 28 feet wide, and enclosed along either side partly by a hedge and partly by a feal dyke, shewed no signs of ever having been properly metalled. At the best it had been repaired by rough stones from the fields, or by coal refuse, and was in parts very soft and muddy in wet weather. The footpath was distinctly marked at the date of the proof, but, according to some of the pursuers’ witnesses it was of recent origin. Andrew Barr, aged 74, at one time tenant of a farm adjoining the road, gave this description of the road :—“It was just like any other kind of rough road. It was used at one time for toom carts that were going to Lochanbank, but not often for a full cart. It was a gey rough road. Everybody used it that was going that airt. It was kind of half-metalled, but gey rough. There were better roads and worse roads in the parish.”

In 1830 a similar petition to that of 1868 was presented to the Statute Labour Road Trustees, setting forth that the petitioners (the authors of the pursuers), “were desirous that an old road, leading from the old Glasgow and Carlisle Road, through the lands of Lochinbank and Birkwood to the Strathaven Road at Lochinbank in the parish of Lesmahagow, should be shut up, the road having become in such a state of disrepair that renders it of little or no use.” It did not appear that any proceedings were taken on this petition, for what reason the evidence did not disclose.

The procedure required by the Act duly followed on the petition of 1868. No objector appeared. The committee appointed to inspect reported,—“Inspected the road mentioned in the petition, and were satisfied that it has been discontinued as a public road for many years, and, indeed, has been abandoned by the public, there being a more convenient road running parallel to it a short distance to the north of it, and this road is now the one used by the public. No person appeared to object, and the committee beg to report that, in their opinion, the road mentioned in the petition should be shut up as useless, and discontinued as a public road.”

On 25th June 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor :—“Finds that there is a public footpath or road for foot-passengers along the line of road described in the conclusions of the summons ; that the Road Trustees have no power under or by virtue of the Act of Parliament libelled to shut up the said footpath; and that the defenders and all others are entitled to the free use of the said footpath or road for foot-passengers: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses," &c.*

Hope Vere v. Young.

* "OPINION.—The only difficulty in this case arises from the order of the Road Trustees for shutting up the road in question in 1868. There can be no doubt as to the actual use of the road by the public, either before or since that date. Prior to 1821, although it does not appear for how long a time, it had been used as a public road for carts and carriages. But in that year the new road from Carlisle to Glasgow was opened, and a portion of this new road which passed through the same district served the purposes of a public highway more conveniently than the road in question. Accordingly, since 1821 the public have abandoned all use of the latter road for any purpose except that of a public footpath. But they have continued to use it as a footpath, although for that purpose only, down to the present time. There is no real conflict of evidence as to this point—those of the pursuers' witnesses, who had the best opportunities for observation, being quite as emphatic in asserting the public use of a footpath as the witnesses for the defenders. If the only question, therefore, were whether the public had established a right of way for foot-passengers by continuous use for forty years and upwards, there can be no doubt that the defenders would be entitled to a verdict upon that issue.

"But it is said that the road was a statute labour road under the management of the Road Trustees, by whom it was shut up as superfluous in 1868, and that its use by foot-passengers is to be ascribed not to any separate or independent right in the public to a footpath, but to the more extensive public right which was extinguished by the order of the Road Trustees that the road should be shut up. It is true that people have still continued to use the road as a footpath notwithstanding the order of the trustees. But no amount of use since 1868 would either establish a new right in the public or keep alive any right which the trustees had power to determine. On the other hand, it is certain that the trustees had no power to shut up a footpath if the public had no higher right at the date of their order. This was decided in the cases of Pollock v. Thomson and Lord Blantyre v. Dickson, and the local Act relied upon by the pursuers gives no higher powers than the Acts which were in question in these cases.

"The question, therefore, comes to be, whether the road was in 1868 a public road for general purposes under the management of the trustees, which they had power to close. And I think the pursuers have failed to shew that at that date it was a public road in any sense, except that it was a road over which the public had a right of footpath. There is some evidence, although it is very scanty, that before 1820 the trustees treated it as a road under their management. The most material piece of evidence is that on one or two occasions before that year the Statute Labour Trustees expended certain small sums of money upon a road which may probably, although not certainly, be identified with the road in question. But assuming the identification to be complete, it does not follow that it was still a public road in 1868. There is nothing either in the Act of Parliament or in the minutes of trustees to shew how it came under their management, or what was the nature of the public right, if any, which justified their spending public money upon it. There is nothing to shew that it was made public by the operation of any Act of Parliament, or that the public had any right in it which was not dependent upon continued possession. But whatever may have been the previous use, it is admitted that for more than forty years before 1868 the public had not used the road for any purpose except as a public footpath only. If in that year, therefore, an action had been brought against the pursuers to declare a public right of way, they must have obtained a verdict except in so far as regards the footpath. And it appears to me that if the Road Trustees, instead of interposing to shut up the road on the application of the pursuers, had interfered adversely to the pursuers on the allegation of a

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—There could be no reasonable doubt that the road here was at one time used for public cart traffic—the precise date at which it ceased to be so used was another matter. Being a road of this character, it was a road within the jurisdiction of the Road Trustees whether they expended statute labour money on it or not. It was the character of the road, not the expenditure of statute labour money, which gave them jurisdiction. The fair result of the evidence, however, was that they did expend money on this road—not much, but still some. Having thus jurisdiction over the road at one time, had they lost it in 1868 when they pronounced the order to shut it up? It was said that it had ceased to be a cart-road by disuse as such for forty years prior to 1868. But there was evidence of its use by carts down to 1835, which, if it was accepted, was conclusive against that argument; and the circumstance that no proceedings followed on the petition of 1830 probably shewed that at that date it was still used by the public for all purposes. Even if the cart traffic had ceased at a date beyond the prescriptive period, the pursuers' legal position was unimpaired. The use of the road as a footpath only (on which the defenders founded) was sufficient to maintain the right of the public quoad omnia—at all events if the road remained capable of all the uses of a road, and here the road did not cease to be fit for cart and carriage traffic until 1835, when it was partly planted with trees. The proposition on the other side came to this, that while the public were losing non utendo the right of cart-road, and with that right the accessory and subordinate right of footpath, they were at the same time and by the same course of action acquiring an independent right of footpath with (as the present case well illustrated) totally different legal characteristics from the subordinate right. Such a position was entirely anomalous, for if challenged in the exercise of the right of footpath within the forty years, they could successfully plead the right of cart-road which they had not yet lost, and consequently (on the assumption of the other side) they would at the end of the forty years have acquired a right by prescriptive acts which it was absolutely out of the power of the person against whom the prescription was running to prevent. In short, the negative prescription had no application to the partial non-use of a road which had become public—it was not clear that it applied even to the total non-use. It might indeed be that if the road ceased to be fit for cart and carriage traffic, the public would lose their right to use it for such purposes after the lapse of forty years—if, for instance, in the present case, the road had been partially planted with trees in 1825 instead of 1835; but that would be by the operation, not of the negative, but of the positive prescription in favour of the proprietor of the solum. Even in that case it was doubtful whether the jurisdiction of the Road Trustees ceased merely because the road had become both de facto and de jure a footpath only. It might well be that once a road came within the jurisdiction of the trustees, it could not cease to be so as long as the road remained a public road for any purpose. The Lord Ordinary cited *Pollock v. Thomson*¹ and Lord Blantyre v. Dick- public right, and endeavoured to sell the ground under their statutory powers, or to have the road repaired or widened so as to afford accommodation for carts or carriages, the pursuers would have had no difficulty in resisting any such interference with their property. It is in vain, therefore, to ascribe the public use and enjoyment of the footpath to any higher right which the trustees had power to determine, because whatever may have been the earlier history of the road, and as to that we have very imperfect information, there has been no such right for more than forty years."

Prescription—Entail—Limited and unlimited title—Consolidation.—An entail, dated in 1715, comprised, inter alia, certain lands the dominium utile of which had been disposed by the entailer or his predecessors prior to the date of the entail, so that the entail only carried the superiority thereof. The dominium utile was acquired in 1721 by the next succeeding heir of entail, who took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, being a different destination from that contained in the entail. He was not infeft either under the entail or under the disposition. In 1765 the next heir was infeft upon the unexecuted precept in the conveyance of 1721, having previously served heir in general to the last heir. The next heir in 1780 made up a title under the entail, but no separate title to the said lands, which he possessed along with the entailed estate down to 1843, when he died.

Held that consolidation had not operated so as to bring the dominium utile of the said lands within the entail, and that a subsequent heir was therefore proprietor thereof in fee-simple.

Elibank v. Campbell, 12 S. 74, distinguished.

UNDER a deed of entail, dated 2d and recorded 30th July 1715, granted by David, first Earl of Glasgow, the lands of Kelburne and others, in the counties of Ayr and Bute, were entailed upon his son and the other heirs of entail therein mentioned. Prior to the entail part of the lands (Bellichevan and Culoch) had been disposed by the Earl or his predecessors, to be holden of the granter and his successors as superiors thereof, so that the conveyance in the deed of entail carried only the dominium directum of these lands. The dominium utile of these lands was acquired by Lord Boyle, the entailer's eldest son, afterwards second Earl of Glasgow, by disposition, dated 31st March 1721, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 11th January 1751, from James Boyle of Bellichevan, who then possessed the lands on apparenay. The disposition was in favour of Lord Boyle and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, not of the series of heirs set forth in the entail. Lord Boyle was never infeft on the disposition, but possessed the lands down to his death in 1741. In 1733 he had succeeded his father, David, under the deed of entail, but never took infeftment thereunder. In 1742 John, third Earl of Glasgow, son of the second Earl, exped a general service to his father, and he afterwards exped an instrument of sasine, dated 19th September and recorded 30th October 1765, following on the precept contained in the disposition of 1721 by James Boyle in favour of his father, and on the retour of his service as heir in general to his father.

The third Earl was succeeded in 1775 by his son George, the fourth Earl, who completed no separate title to Bellichevan and Culoch, but made up a title to the entailed lands by instrument of sasine, recorded 30th May 1780, and possessed the former lands along with the entailed estate down to his death in 1843. George, fourth Earl, was succeeded in 1843 by his son James, the fifth Earl. In 1853 the law-agent of Earl James, duly authorised by a commission granted in his favour by the Earl, executed a combined charter of confirmation of the disposition of 1721 and precept of clare constat, dated 5th May 1853. The charter of con-could not close a footpath, certainly not a road over which there was a right of footpath only,¹ nor, it was contended, did they, in closing a cart-road, close the footpath also; the policy of the road extended to cart-roads only, and in the only authority cited to the contrary—*Shearer's*² case—the title of the trustees was a right of property in the solum of the road; here their title (if they had any) was the use of the road by the public.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The pursuers of the present action seek to have it found that the road described in the conclusions of the summons is one over which there has been since 1869 no right of way either for carriage or for foot-passengers. The Lord Ordinary has found that so far as regards cart or carriage traffic the pursuers are entitled to prevail, but that as regards foot-passengers the decision must be in favour of the defenders, because for more than forty years prior to 1869 the road had been used for foot traffic, and consequently was not affected by the deliverance of the Justices by whom in 1869 the road was closed.

I have come to a different conclusion. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the road in question was a public road under the administration of the Justices for an unknown period prior to 1820. The proof by which this is brought out is not very abundant, but it seems to me to be enough to lead to this conclusion. The minutes of 1808 shew that the attention of the Justices was directed to roads in the parish, and subsequent entries, as interpreted by the evidence, shew that there were sums which were spent by the Justices upon this road, though its identification is less easily made out than might have been expected. There are also the proceedings of 1830, which were originated for the purpose of shutting up the road as one which, even at that time, was superfluous or useless. Putting all things together which are to be found in the proof, I have no hesitation in concurring with the views of the Lord Ordinary on this part of the case.

In 1820 there was opened a new portion of the Glasgow and Carlisle road which had for some time been in the course of formation, and from that time forward the traffic on the road in question, which previously had been a part of the Carlisle road, was very much diminished. But cart and carriage traffic continued to be upon this road, at anyrate, till 1835. Carts and carriages may have used this road even later, but that seems to be uncertain. They, however, were certainly there after 1829, and that is enough to prove that the road was an open road—a road in use—and therefore a road which remained under the administration of the Justices within forty years prior to 1869, when it was closed. All are agreed that the road was used by foot-passengers till 1869, but it was a road for carts and carriages as much as it was for foot-passengers, so far as right of use was concerned, and when the Justices in 1869 came to consider the application which was made to them under the local Act 47 Geo. III. c. 45, sec. 36, the only question they had to determine was whether the road in question, as a cart or carriage as well as a road for foot-passengers, was or was not superfluous or useless in the district! A petition by the heritors was presented to them. They appointed a committee; there was a report returned. Advertisements were made as directed by the statute, but none to oppose appeared, and the result was that the Justices being satisfied that the grounds of the application had been established, the road was closed. If the Justices had jurisdiction, then the defenders admit that their deliverance cannot be upset, and the facts being as has just been explained, it must, I think, be held that there was jurisdiction, and therefore that the present pursuers are entitled to prevail in this action. Hope Vere v.

Young.

Three decisions, not referred to at the debate, were brought under my notice by your Lordship in the chair while the case was under our consideration. One is The Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trustees v. Tennent, February 9, 1854, 16 D. 521. Another is Murray, &c. v. Arbuthnott, November 29, 1870, 9 Macph. 198; and the third M'Gavin v. M'Intyre & Company, June 12, 1874, 1 R. 1016. The question in those cases comes very near that which has to be decided here, but they do not actually touch it, and our judgment here is not to any extent fettered by anything that was said or done by the Court in those cases.

The first of the three cases was one in which a local Act authorised the trustees, when any part of the road was altered, to shut up such part as should be no longer of use, or where a toll might be evaded, but did not prescribe any form of procedure, and directed any parties aggrieved by shutting up the road to apply to the Quarter Sessions. In an application for interdict at the instance of the trustees against certain persons who persisted in using the road which had been shut up under the statute, and removing the obstructions placed by the trustees, the respondents pleaded immemorial possession, and that there was no written minute or resolution of the trustees against which an appeal could be taken; interdict was granted—the Court holding, upon the construction of the statute, that the road had been duly shut up by the trustees in the exercise of their statutory powers, and that the respondents were not entitled to found on their own illegal acts as constituting possession. This case, so far as it goes, is in favour rather of the pursuers than of the defenders. The road was shut up, but a part of it was subsequently used by the public, and what was decided was, that the trustees having jurisdiction, and the provisions of the statute having been observed, such use as there was could not, and did not, preserve the right of public way which had previously existed. In the present case there was no use taken of the road, which had been shut up after the deliverance of the Justices by which it was closed, but even if there had been, the decision just cited shews that such use would have been without avail. The trustees were within their competency, and as any use behaved to be an illegal use, the decision of the Justices could not thereby be wrought off or nullified.

The second of the decisions was of this nature. In 1824 the proprietor of grounds through which a public footpath ran presented a petition under the 21st section of the Edinburgh County Road Act to the Road Trustees for permission to alter the course of the path, and, on the new path being completed, to shut up the old path. A committee was appointed, and reported that the proposed alteration would be an improvement. The trustees then granted warrant to the proprietor to alter, and authorised him to shut up the old road as soon as the new line was completed. When the new line was made, the proprietor tried to exclude the public from the old road, but with only partial and varying success. In an action of declarator of right of way by the public it was held that the footpath had not been legally shut up, because, first, the 21st

No. 81. section of the Act referred to gives the trustees no power to shut up a footpath, and secondly, assuming that such a power was given, the necessary proceedings had not been followed. That case accordingly related exclusively to a footpath, but the present relates to a road for all manner of traffic. If there had been here a footpath independent of the carriage-way, what was done in Murray's case might be of some avail ; but so far as appears there was no footpath before the road as a whole was used by the public, or before the Justices assumed the administration, and consequently such a use as was taken by foot-passengers was only a use of the public road, and not the use of ground which was used as a footpath exclusively. The Justices, when they closed this road in 1869, closed it in its entirety. The issue upon which they decided was, whether the road as a whole, and taking the use of it by foot-passengers into account, was superfluous or useless ? They held that it was, and when the road was so closed, the right of footpath was as much extinguished as was that of all other kinds of traffic.

Hope Vere v.
Young.

The last of the three cases comes nearer the present in its circumstances than either of the other two, but still they are far apart. There a conveyance of a mill was granted by feu-contract in 1722, "with free ish and entry, and sufficient ways and passages of 12 foot breadth, besouth the lade of the said miln." These words were not repeated in any subsequent title. In 1872 the only road to the south of the mill-lade convenient to the mill was one under the management of the Statute Labour Road Trustees of the county. There was no evidence to shew at what period it had become a statute labour road. The trustees conveyed the solum of the road to the proprietor of the ground through which it passed under their statutory powers, receiving another road in substitution. In a petition for interdict presented by the proprietor of the solum of the road against the owner of the mill, it was held that a right of access in the line of the road was included in the grant of 1722 as a necessary adjunct of the mill, and that the Statute Labour Road Trustees had no power to interfere with it. Now, what was the ground of decision there is awaiting here. There is no proof that there was at any time any independent right of footway on the line of this road before it was a cart and carriage-road, and consequently the use of that road by foot-passengers was only the use of a public road under the administration and subject to the statutory powers of the Justices. When the road was shut up, the right of footway as well as to cart and carriage traffic was extinguished.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree in the opinion which has just been delivered, but some observations occur to me on the case generally, and also particularly, which I think it my duty to make.

The conclusions of the summons seem to me to require some attention. They are all in my judgment superfluous, and only tend to embarrass the case, with the exception of the first, which comprehends everything necessary to raise the question between the parties. It concludes for declarator that there is no public right of way or servitude of road or passage between the points A and B on the plan which was laid before us. "Servitude" is, of course, superfluous, because no servitude was ever alleged. The purpose of the action is really to have the right of public way or passage which the defenders contended for negatived, and to have the defenders interdicted from acting on the footing that there is such a public right of way. A declarator that any public right or right of way which formerly existed was duly and validly shut up by the Statute Labour Trustees is absolutely superfluous as a conclusion, although the circumstances connected with that shutting up are, for the reasons pointed out by Lord Craighill, very material in the consideration of the question whether there is a right of way or not. The road in question is, as I understand, admittedly, but is, at all events, clearly and certainly, upon the property of the pursuers. The solum is theirs. No other proprietors are suggested; public property in the solum is an impossibility by the law of Scotland; it is not said to be in the Crown; it is in the titles of the pursuers. It is their ground, and they are absolutely entitled to a declarator that there is no right of road along their property unless it be established affirmatively to the contrary that there is. As I have pointed out, their first conclusion is simply for a declarator that there is no right of public road along this part of their private property. The question is, whether or not the defenders have established that there is! I have expressed my view that the conclusions of the summons are altogether superfluous except the first, and I think I may say the same of the pleas in law for the pursuers. They are all superfluous except the last, which is,—“The defenders not having right to use the road in question, interdict should be granted as craved.” That would have comprehended the declarator, and so exhausted the case.

I may here observe that when I use the expression “road” in any remarks I have to make, I am to be understood as signifying “cart-road,” which I need not say means a road for all purposes. A cart-road comprehends all the other uses for which a road may exist. The other uses do not necessarily comprehend it—indeed they frequently do not. A drove-road, for example, does not extend in the matter of use to carts. If it is a cart-road, on the other hand, it is open to cattle, horses, and certainly to foot-passengers. By the expression “road,” then, I shall always mean cart-road or road for all purposes.

The case presented by the pursuers is that there was a public road at one time here, although there is none now—that it existed prior to 1869, but was shut up by the proper authority in that year. The case presented by the defenders, on the other hand, is that there never was a road. They say there was a footpath, but never a road. It is a curious defence prima facie, but when one examines it, it comes to that logically. They undertake to shew that there was a public footpath there, and that there is that public footpath now. To prove that is a necessary condition of their success in the action, but they must prove it by their own evidence, they cannot avail themselves of the pursuers’ averment, which they deny, that there was a public road, which the trustees shut up in 1869. Their case is that there was no such road which the trustees could shut up. They may, of course, take the pursuers’ admission that there was a public road with its qualification that that road was shut up in 1869, but if they reject the qualification they must prove their case by their own evidence without the aid of the pursuers’ admission.

The Lord Ordinary expresses the opinion that prior to 1821, although it does not appear for how long, the ground in question here had been used as a public road. I agree in thinking that that is proved, and therefore that the pursuers’ averment that this was a public road is in accordance with the evidence. I agree also with Lord Craighill that although after 1821 the use by carts was less than previously—the new Glasgow and Carlisle road having then been formed—it nevertheless did not cease, but continued at least down to 1829, and probably to 1835. Even before 1821 there was perhaps not very much. The nature of the locality sufficiently accounts for that. I do not think there was more than the traffic of the neighbouring farmers. There was a funeral from a house on one occasion, and there was a conveyance used by the members of a marriage party on another occasion. But there was more or less use of it by members of the public with carts, and I daresay if the memories of the people were searched, it would be found that hearses went along it more than once. After 1821 this use continued, although, as I have said, it was still less.

Now, in these circumstances, and with all that use of it, I am of opinion that this road was a statute labour road, with respect to which the statute labour trustees had a duty. I agree with Lord Craighill that there is evidence, although not very much, that in the performance of that duty they not only shut it up in 1869, but that they had expended a good deal of statute labour money upon it. If it was a public road, it was a statute labour road. By the law of Scotland all public roads which are not turnpike roads are statute labour roads. I have already pointed out that they are formed, as all public roads except turnpike roads are formed, upon private property. The solum remains the property of individuals upon private, personal, absolute titles. Turnpike roads are otherwise, but not all turnpike roads by any means. By the Turnpike Acts turnpike road trustees are empowered to purchase land in order to make roads, and when they do that, and have paid for the land, and got a title, the land is theirs and is vested in them, and if the road should come to be unnecessary by another road being substituted, or otherwise, they may sell the land, as in the case of any other property, but except in those cases where they have bought the ground, and have a heritable title, the roads are mere road ways over solum belonging to private individuals. And that is so with respect to all statute labour roads. A statute labour road is nothing more nor less than this, that there are trustees appointed to look after the interests of the public in the maintenance of that road. Such roads were formerly maintained by labour—statute labour—because the Justices were empowered by statute to call out the labourers and impose the duty on them. When the administration of the roads was entrusted to trustees they were empowered to lay on assessments in lieu of statute labour. Instead of calling out farmers and labourers to repair the roads, they imposed an assessment so far as they thought it necessary for the purpose, and with the produce of the assessment they themselves employed the labourers. Upon some roads they expended very little, and upon some none at all, the public use of them requiring only a little or nothing at all to be expended. They were nevertheless within the jurisdiction of the trustees. The use of the word “jurisdiction” is not very appropriate. All that is meant is that it was for the trustees to consider whether they required a road, and if so, what aids the road required out of the statute labour money. A corresponding power and a corresponding duty was given to them with respect to the shutting up of such roads,—was given by the Statute Labour Acts or by the local Acts applicable to particular districts or counties. They were empowered to shut up superfluous or useless roads, and that upon the application of people who were interested to have them shut up, if such people could satisfy the trustees, who were the guardians of the public interest in the matter, that such roads should be shut up. If they were satisfied that the road was superfluous or useless, those guardians of the public interest, after giving the necessary notices, and hearing any parties who might come forward with opposite views, were empowered to shut it up absolutely. If the road was superfluous or useless, or if another line of road was found to be more convenient, or at least equally convenient, and the public were satisfied to change the one for the other, the trustees were empowered to shut up the one in respect of the opening of the other. If another was not needed, and if the existing one was found to be unnecessary, the trustees were still empowered to shut it up absolutely. I think it was suggested that the trustees might shut up a public road with respect to all its uses except that of a footpath. I can find no trace of that exception in the statute. I think that when a public road is shut up, it is shut up for every purpose.

Hope Vere v.
Young.

Now, with regard to the history of this road—and it is necessary to consider that in considering the case made by the defenders here—we do not know its origin, except in so far as we can deduce that by inference from the evidence before us. It appears that this road was constructed just between two estates, the one half upon the land of the one estate, the property of Mr Tod, and the other half upon the land of the adjoining estate, belonging to Mr Hope Vere. It was constructed of a width varying from 24 to 26 feet, and it was fenced on either side by a feal dyke, and at some parts by a hedge. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that that road was thus made by those adjoining proprietors on their own properties for their own purposes. I think that it is an inference with reason and likelihood to support it—that a road on the boundary between two estates, one half upon the solum of the one, and the other half upon the solum of the other, 25 feet wide and duly fenced, was made by the proprietors on their own ground for their own use. I cannot resist that conclusion, nor can I doubt that the intention of these proprietors was to make a road, not a footpath. There is no suggestion, and no evidence, that they took the line of a footpath in making this road and fencing it in in this way. You might make a similar surmise with reference to any other such road in the kingdom.

The defenders, who are really pursuers of the issue, rely upon usage. The law of Scotland in regard to usage is difficult to administer, and I think that proprietors have perhaps suffered considerable hardship from the difficulties attending the administration of the law as it stands. A footpath, or any kind of a road, may be acquired by use; but then the use for forty years, or for time immemorial, must be proved to be such that the jury weighing the evidence shall impute to the proprietor that the use shewed an acknowledgment by him of the public right. Otherwise, use for any period you like is a matter of tolerance, and will not make a public right. The defenders' case is that the use by carts is to be imputed to tolerance, and the use by foot-passengers is to be imputed to right. I cannot assent to that for a moment. It reminds me of the argument in a case I remember very well. I was counsel for the defender. The pursuers contended that there was there a public footpath, or at least that they were proprietors or tenants or occupiers of an adjoining estate which had a right of servitude belonging to it. At the trial there was a great deal of evidence of use by the proprietor and tenants and occupants of the neighbouring estate, and also a great deal of evidence of use by strangers—members of the public as they are sometimes quaintly called—although the evidence of use by strangers was much less, probably owing to the fact that it was a footpath over a moor where not many strangers passed. The counsel for the pursuer, at the end of the evidence, and in addressing the jury, abandoned the claim to a public right, and asked only for a verdict on the issue of servitude. That immediately provoked the answer—You have led evidence that members of the public used this, endeavouring to support your contention that they did it as matter of right. But you are now constrained to abandon that, and to impute the use you have proved to tolerance and the goodwill of the proprietor, but much more likely is the use by his neighbours and friends upon the adjoining estate to be imputed to friendship. It would be more or less churlish to turn off a stranger crossing a moor, but doubly so to turn off those residing on the adjoining property. Therefore, if you impute the use by strangers to tolerance and goodwill, much more must you impute use by neighbours to tolerance and goodwill. That was my argument, and it was assented to by Lord Justice-Clerk Hope and by the jury. We had a verdict on both issues accordingly. So here I cannot see my way to impute the use of this road by carts to tolerance, and the use of it by foot-passengers to a right.

But what was the use by foot-passengers after all? They were chiefly children or poachers. There were no doubt neighbours passing along the road occasionally—people on the neighbouring farms. It was a short cut for some of the farms. There are some general words in the evidence to the effect that people were constantly travelling upon it, but one of the witnesses who gives such evidence says he has only been once upon the road for the last twenty-two years; and when you come to the details of the evidence you find the use to be of the most inconsiderable description. After the planting was put down in 1835, there was really no need for the road except for trespassers. I have noted some passages in the evidence. James Brown says,—“(Q.) What became of them? (that is, of the trees). (A.) Well, you cut one, and I cut one, and some other body cut one, just when they needed a thing of the kind. They were never quarrelled. We had no leave from anybody to do it.” Is presence there to be imputed to the right of the defenders? And in the same way he speaks of the road. “(Q.) Did you use to go along that road to your work frequently from Boghead? (A.) Yes, I have travelled it to my work from Boghead. I was going to and coming from Lochanbank. No man ever quarrelled me for going that road.” Then Janet Brown speaks to using the road almost every week. “The people whom I saw using it were going all airts, both ways.” John Brown says,—“There were trees upon the road when I was young. I cannot tell what became of them. (Q.) Did you ever cut any of them? (A.) Well, I have; I have seen other people cutting them.” Then James Brown says,—“There were trees that had been planted on the old peat road; I cut some of these because I was requiring them, and it was considered it was always a public place that belonged to no person, and when I saw any person take one, I thought I would do it too. There was no restriction, and they were not of much use.” In short, people wanted firewood, and the proprietor did not object. Some went there for that purpose, some to take advantage of a near cut, and some were in pursuit of rabbits, and the proprietor did not turn them away. I could not on that evidence have sustained the contention that a public road or a footpath existed here. I should have imputed it to goodwill and neighbourhood. Indeed, but for the case presented by the pursuer that this was a public road, I should have thought there was a real difficulty in proving publicity. I think it is proved that the use in respect of which he makes that admission was continued down to the year 1835, when the trees were planted, although the use was greatly diminished towards the end of that period. I am of opinion that in the exercise of their jurisdiction the trustees did well to shut up the road.

There is a question which crossed my mind more than once, namely, whether, if this was a public road, and the use of it by foot-passengers continued, the road could be held to have ceased to exist, and be held to have been withdrawn from No. 81. the jurisdiction of the Road Trustees, merely because no carts went along it although it remained open to them. After it was shut up and became impass- Jan. 28, 1887. Hope Vere v. able for carts, which, I agree with Lord Craighill, was not until after the '30s Young. commenced, that question would not arise. But so long as it was usable by carts, and was used in any of the ways in which a public road is usable, I should think that it was not withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the trustees—that it did not cease to be a public road. There are many public roads in the country upon which a cart is never seen—upon which they do not go. You may see foot-passengers upon them occasionally, but not carts, simply because they have no occasion to go. I should not say that such a road had ceased to be a road because it has ceased to be used by carts, one or more of the uses, short of carts, to which a road is subjected continuing, and it being open to carts, if they have occasion to go. But it is not necessary to decide that question here.

Upon these grounds, and upon those stated by Lord Craighill, I am of opinion that this judgment ought to be recalled, and decree pronounced in terms of that which I think is the only material conclusion of the action, that there is no public right of way over this road.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am sorry I have come to a different conclusion on the evidence in this case, and although I shall not detain your Lordships long by explaining the grounds on which I reach the result, yet I think it only respectful and right to say in a few sentences what my view on the proof and the law is.

This is an action by Mr Hope Vere for the purpose of having it declared that the public have no right of passage along the line of the road in question. I do not wonder that he found it necessary to have recourse to a declarator to that effect, because the reply which is made in the first instance is that the public have had the use of this road as a public right of way for foot-passengers at least from the beginning of the century, and probably a great deal longer. That is the defence. The first question is, How stands the fact? Of course we are driven to inference in regard to the earlier period of the road. But this is certain, that, from the time when carts and horses went along the road, which goes back to the beginning of the century, the public have had the use of this line of road, when they required it, for foot-passengers. The proof, I must own for myself, I should have thought absolutely conclusive upon that matter. I do not think it necessary to go into that proof in detail, because sitting as one of a jury to decide this matter of use or no use, I find the Lord Ordinary's view is as clear and distinct as it can be, and he had the great advantage of hearing the evidence. He says,—“Accordingly, since 1821 the public have abandoned all use of the latter road for any purpose except that of a public footpath. But they have continued to use it as a footpath, although for that purpose only down to the present time. There is no real conflict of evidence as to this point—those of the pursuers' witnesses, who had the best opportunities for observation, being quite as emphatic in asserting the public use of a footpath as the witnesses for the defenders. If the only question, therefore, were whether the public had established a right of way for foot-passengers by continuous use for forty years and upwards, there can be no doubt that the defenders would be entitled to a verdict upon that issue.” Therefore, I assume as a matter of fact from which the argument starts, that for that period, far exceeding the prescriptive period, the public have used that right of way. They did not use it by tolerance, at least I find no indication that such was the fact, and all presumption of law, as well as the conclusions to be derived from the proceedings are the other way. Before the new Glasgow and Carlisle Road was made there was a considerable district of country which had no direct communication with the old Glasgow and Carlisle Road excepting by means of the road in question. For carts and carriages it was useful as well as for a footpath. When the new Glasgow and Carlisle Road was made, and communication made more direct with the places to the south, the use of this road for wheeled vehicles and horses was of course to a large extent lessened, although its use for foot-passengers continued. There were many places of importance in that neighbourhood. There was the mill, for instance, for access to which they used, and have continued to use, the road in question.

Young.

The question therefore is, whether the Road Trustees had a right to shut up the footpath? I say nothing about the road for carriages and horses. I should not think it important to dispute that they might have a right to shut up the carriage-way. But, as I have said, the question really is, whether the undisturbed and undisputed right which the public has exercised for eighty years was rightly or wrongly interfered with in 1868 by the shutting up of the road? And that is a question of some difficulty even if the Road Trustees had professed to shut up the road or footpath. In the ordinary case, Statute Labour Trustees have no jurisdiction to do anything of that kind. A public footpath is not a statute labour road. Nor is it supported in any way whatever by these trustees. It is not in the least impossible that a right of way may exist for foot-passengers although the solum over which the footpath goes was once a public road for wheeled vehicles. That a footpath may subsist and continue although the solum had been that of a public road shut up by the Justices is certain. An appropriate illustration of this is to be found in a case which arose out of very similar circumstances under the same Act of Parliament. It is the case of The Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trustees, 16 D. 521, and in that case the Justices had, in 1820, shut up a public road in the immediate vicinity of that in question here. But the road continued to be used as a footpath, and in deciding that the road was well shut up as a public road, Lord Cowan, who was Lord Ordinary, said,—“There is no dispute about the road being public as regards foot-passengers, and the interdict craved does not apply to such use of it.” Therefore, there is no inconsistency in the right of footpath remaining along the track of a disused and closed statute labour road. I rather suspect that a great many statute labour roads were originally nothing but footways, coming gradually from their convenience to be used by cattle and horses, and ultimately coming to be adopted by the Statute Labour Road Trustees. Be that as it may, I imagine that, after eighty years’ use of this as a public footpath, it is out of the question to say, there being nothing else to shut up, that the trustees can interpose, and deprive the public of that footpath.

These are the views I entertain. I think the Lord Ordinary has dealt with the case very satisfactorily, and I certainly should have been better pleased to have adhered to his judgment.

Your Lordships recall the interlocutor, and decern in terms of the summons.

Company—Winding-up—Creditor's petition for judicial winding-up—Where assets in America.—A petition having been presented by a creditor for the judicial winding-up of a company, which was admittedly insolvent, and for the appointment of a liquidator, answers were lodged by the company and certain secured creditors stating that all its assets were in America, and that, it being the intention to have a receiver appointed there, the appointment of a liquidator in this country was unnecessary. The creditors, other than the petitioner, were all either directors or concerned in the management of the company. The Court granted the prayer of the petition.

THE SALEM (OREGON) CAPITOL FLOUR MILLS COMPANY, LIMITED, registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, and having its registered office in Scotland, was formed on 1st May 1884 to carry on the business of flour millers, &c., and to acquire the mills, warehouses, and other real and personal estate of the City of Salem Company of Oregon, situated at Salem, in the State of Oregon, U.S.A. 1st DIVISION.
B.

The Company was quite unsuccessful, and on 15th December 1886 a report was issued by its directors to the second annual general meeting, to be held on 23d December following, which stated as follows:—"Early in this year the directors resolved, in consequence of the condition of the trade, and the losses already apparent, to suspend operations, and confine the work to the realisation of the wheat and flour on hand. The mills were accordingly closed in June, and no new business has since been gone into."

After referring to the depreciation of the property and the business losses, the report further stated that these "will involve not only the share capital, but the creditors of the company will all suffer more or less, according as the properties realise a higher or lower price." The shareholders were accordingly asked to authorise the directors to proceed with the realisation and winding up, "as if the company were in liquidation." At the meeting on 23d December the report was unanimously adopted, and the shareholders granted authority to the directors to proceed with the winding up, "as if the company were in liquidation."

Ross Smyth & Company, corn merchants, Liverpool, who were creditors of the company to the extent of £2131, 6s. 2d., on 22d December presented a petition to the Court for a judicial winding-up, and the appointment of a liquidator, averring that the company was unable to pay its debts, within the meaning of the 79th section of the Companies Act, 1862.

Answers were lodged to this petition by the company and by William Stuart, Thomas Landale, and James Tait, directors and creditors of the company, in which they stated that there were now no assets of the company in this country, and that its whole property and assets in Oregon were hypothecated to the creditors there. In these circumstances, there were no assets with which a liquidator appointed in this country could deal, and they accordingly proposed that a receiver should be appointed in America, as the title of a Scottish liquidator would not be recognised in America, and he would not be appointed receiver. All the creditors in this country, with the exception of the petitioners, it was alleged, concurred in that course. They accordingly submitted that the petition should be dismissed, or that consideration of it should be superseded hoc statu.

It appeared that the other creditors in this country, other than the petitioners, were all either directors or concerned in its management, and their debts were more or less secured in America.

Smyth & Co.
v. Salem Flour
Mills Co.
Limited.

The respondents argued that the Court ought to give effect to the wishes of the creditors, founding upon the terms of the 91st section of the Companies Act, 1862.*¹ According to American law, a liquidator appointed in Scotland would not be recognised there.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The state of the case is that this company is in a state of insolvency. It is in a very bad condition indeed. Now, a creditor (and apparently the only independent creditor of the company, for all the others are connected with it) makes an application for a judicial winding-up. The company and the directors do not dispute the grounds on which the petition is presented, and they lay before the Court a report of the directors, of date 15th December 1886, which was considered at a meeting of the company on 23d December, and there it was agreed “to grant authority to the directors to proceed with the realisation of the properties and the winding up of the concern as if the company were in liquidation.” The issue therefore raised here is not whether the company is to be wound up, but whether the winding-up is to be conducted by the directors, or whether a liquidator shall be appointed by the Court. I have no doubt that the proper course for us to take is to make an order for winding up the company, and to appoint a judicial liquidator.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. It is conceded that the company is unable to pay its debts, and the petitioners are entitled to the order they crave ex debito justitiæ unless it be shewn either that the general voice of the creditors is against the application or that the refusal of the order will not prejudice the petitioners. I am not satisfied on this last point. The company is in a very peculiar position. It has resolved on winding up, and in these circumstances a creditor is entitled to say,—I desire that the winding-up shall be a judicial one, if for no other reason than that the effect would be to cut down preferences.

A number of cases were referred to in the argument, in which a winding-up was refused, but in all of these the company was carrying on its business, and maintained that it was best for all concerned that it should continue to do so. No case has been cited in which after a company has resolved to wind up, and a creditor has come asking that the company should be wound up judicially, the application has been refused. It is said that here the general voice of the creditors is opposed to the application, but all the other creditors are connected with the company, certain of them being directors who hold securities over the property of the company, and it may be the first duty of the liquidator would be to investigate their debts and securities. I have no doubt whatever that the application should be granted; even though an official receiver may be required in America, it is desirable that a liquidator representing the whole creditors should have a voice in the appointment. In every view I think the petitioners are entitled to have the winding-up placed in the hands of an official liquidator.

* The 91st section enacts,—“The Court may, as to all matters relating to the winding-up, have regard to the wishes of the creditors or contributories, as proved to it by any sufficient evidence.”

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion.—Held that a wife who had left her husband's house on account of his drunken violence, and gone to live with her father, was not thereby barred from instituting an action of divorce on the ground of desertion. Gow v. Gow.

THIS was an undefended action for divorce on the ground of desertion at the instance of Mrs Isabella Hill Peden or Gow, the wife of John Gow, designed as "blacksmith," sometime at Macbiehill, in the county of Peebles, and now residing at Millerhill, in the county of Midlothian. The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) thus narrated the circumstances of the case:—"The wife, who is the pursuer of the action, left her husband's house more than four years ago, and went to live with her father. The husband, a few weeks later, sold his furniture, and left the place where he resided. Up to the time of instituting the action he had not communicated with or made his address known to his wife. She alleges, and I considered it to be proved, that she left her home in consequence of her husband's intemperate habits, and his cruel behaviour to herself—behaviour which, in my opinion, would have entitled her to resist a demand for adherence, if such had been made by him."

His Lordship, by interlocutor of 11th January 1887, reported the case to the Second Division.*

After hearing counsel for the pursuer,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the evidence does not disclose any bar to the pursuer bringing an action of divorce. I do not think that the wife in going to her father's house in the circumstances deserted her husband; on the other hand, I think that the husband by taking up house by himself, and failing to communicate with her or to provide for her, has deserted her.

LORD YOUNG.—The Lord Ordinary has reported this case on a question of law; that question of law is so simple as this, whether the fact that a wife has

* "NOTE.— . . . The question arises, Is this constructive desertion by the husband? The inclination of my opinion is in the affirmative, because I see no real distinction between the cases of the man who drives his wife out of doors with blows, and the man who, with greater cunning, and possibly with the view of depriving her of her legal remedies, makes life intolerable to his spouse, and thus compels her to leave him. In the present case I think it is the husband who must be considered to have, in the words of the Scottish statute, 'diverted' from his wife. If the husband is the party originally to blame, there can be little doubt but that he is responsible for the continuance of the 'diversion' or estrangement during the four years that have elapsed, because during all that time he kept out of the way, and thus made it impossible that overtures of reconciliation should be addressed to him."

No. 83. justifiably taken refuge in her father's house from her husband's drunken violence is a legal impediment to her suing him afterwards for divorce on the ground of desertion. Whether he did desert her for a period of four years is a question of fact, and the evidence, I think, here is that he did wilfully desert her, and maliciously continue in desertion for four years. I think there is no legal impediment to her suing him for divorce on that ground.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the fact that the pursuer sought refuge for a time in her father's house from the cruel treatment of the defender does not constitute a bar to her action of divorce for desertion, and remit the same to his Lordship to proceed."

By minutes of September and December 1886, the Police Commissioners of the royal burgh of Linlithgow resolved to sell for £200, or to feu for a feu-duty of £10, 10s. to the town-council of the burgh a portion of the Fleshmarket, the property of the Police Commissioners, acquired under sec. 125 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862,* for which they had no use. On 5th January 1887, they presented a petition to the Court, setting forth the circumstances, and stating that though under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 161 and 373, they had power to discontinue the use of public washing-houses, drying-grounds, &c., and to sell the same, the Act did not contain any provisions authorising the sale of other property which was of no use to them. They therefore petitioned the Court for leave to carry out the proposed sale. The petitioner referred to the petition of Alexander Tait, clerk to the Commissioners of Police of Grangemouth, 1st July 1884 (not reported), in which warrant to sell the old Town Hall of Grangemouth by public roup had been granted. The Court having indicated an opinion that a sale by private bargain would be ultra vires of the Commissioners, the Commissioners thereupon craved and obtained leave to amend the prayer of the petition, to the effect of asking authority to put up the subjects described to public auction. This having been done, the Court granted the prayer of the petition as amended.

 Aberdeen Har-

Reparation—Road—Harbour Commissioners—Obligation to provide new and improved plant.—Harbour Commissioners, as empowered by their Acts of Parliament, laid down and maintained rails on the streets and quays adjoining the harbour. A horse crossing the rails on its way to a ship in the harbour was injured through its foot being caught in the space left between the rail and the causeway blocks for the flanges of waggon-wheels. The owner of the horse brought an action against the Harbour Commissioners, alleging that a new and improved description of rail, which would have rendered the accident unlikely, had been introduced since the rails were laid down, and pleading that it was the duty of the commissioners to have substituted such rails for those in use at the time of the accident. Held (dub. Lord Young) that although the new rails were on the whole of a safer description than the old, the Commissioners had not been negligent in continuing the use of the old, which were of the form common at the date when they were laid down. Defenders therefore assolvied.

THE ABERDEEN HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS, incorporated by Act of Parliament, were by their Acts authorised to lay down and maintain lines of rail along the streets and quays adjoining the harbour, and, in particular, under an Act passed in 1854, along the Waterloo Quay. The rails laid down were what are called bulb rails, i.e., the rails in ordinary use on railways, the sides of which are concave. The rails rested on longitudinal timber sleepers, and the roadway on each side of and between the rails was filled up with granite causeway blocks, with a space of about two inches between the rail and the blocks on the inside to allow the flange of the waggons to pass. No such space was left on the outside of the rails. The Harbour Commissioners in later years were in the habit of replacing the old rails as occasion offered by another description of rail, known as "box rail," which was in fact the rail in common use on street tramways. The sides of these rails were straight, not concave, and no space was left on either side between the causeway blocks and the rails, the flanges of the waggon wheels being accommodated by a vacant space running along the centre of the surface of the rail.

On 6th January 1886 a cart belonging to William Wisely, carter, Aberdeen, was employed in carrying maize to a vessel at the Queen's Jetty, and to do so had to be taken across the rails on the Waterloo Quay, at a point at which the bulb rails originally laid down still remained. In crossing one of the horse's hind feet was caught in the inside space between one of the rails and the causeway. The horse was thrown on its side, its foot being still held fast under the rail; and a part of the street had to be torn up before the foot could be extricated. Wisely brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against the Commissioners for damages on account of the injury sustained by the horse.

The question came to be whether the defenders were bound to substitute box rails for bulb rails in all parts of their system, or at least at the crossing at which the accident took place, the pursuers maintaining that the defenders were so bound, the defenders that they were not, as having exercised reasonable care and skill in the superintendence of the line of rails in question.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence was as follows:
 Bulb rails were the rails commonly in use in 1854, when those in question were laid down; subsequently box rails became the commoner in the case of street lines laid down for the first time. At the date of the proof the defenders had replaced with box rails about two miles of the five miles of which their system consisted. Carts were constantly crossing the rails in the harbour at various points. The pursuer proved that several accidents to horses had previously taken place there, though not exactly at the point here in question, where the cart traffic was comparatively small. Although box rails were on the whole safer than bulb rails as regards their liability to catch a horse's hoof, they presented a larger surface of iron, and so, according to some witnesses, made horses more likely to slip than bulb rails. The rails at the crossing were in good condition. The harbour engineer deponed that the Commissioners were substituting box for bulb rails because of the tendency of cart and carriage wheels when going along the street to get fixed in the flange spaces of the latter, and not because of the danger to horses crossing, of which witness stated he had never heard.

On 30th September 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident set forth in the petition happened in consequence of the negligence of the defenders; therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action," with expenses.

On 18th November the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on appeal, adhered. The pursuer appealed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It seems that the pursuer's servant in the ordinary course of his employment had occasion to cross the rails at a jetty within the Aberdeen Harbour in order to remove goods from a vessel which was moored alongside the jetty. The rails there laid were bulb rails, which simply means that the top of the rails has a flange projecting over either side, and placed in a certain relation to the causeway along which it is laid. The driver was not using the rails for his cart, he was simply crossing at right angles, and it seems that while the horse was crossing its foot got jammed between the causeway and the rail, with the consequence that the poor animal was severely injured. The case made against the Harbour Commissioners is simply this: That these bulb rails have been out of use for many years; that they are dangerous in the very respect which gave rise to this occurrence—their tendency to cause the feet of horses to get jammed—and accordingly that they have been abandoned in all places where the crossing of rails is likely to take place. That is perfectly true, and I do not think there is the least difference of opinion on that subject. There is another form of rail which came into use about ten years ago, by which the bulb rail was displaced and the danger to the feet of horses was materially diminished, if not made impossible. The box rail is a safer form of rail—I have no doubt whatever that the evidence proves that incontestably. But I do not think that leads us very far in the solution of the question. The main and fundamental part of the defence is that these rails when they were laid were perfectly safe, and that they are not less safe now than they were when they were laid; the question therefore is just this,—When certain improvements in mechanism are introduced which conduce to the greater safety of the public, are a public body such as these Harbour Commissioners bound at once to introduce the improved mechanism and abandon the former system, which, though safe enough when it first came into use, has been superseded by the safer method? I am of opinion that the nature of the facts here is not sufficient to sustain that contention in this case. I do not say that there is not some difficulty in the matter. The Harbour Commissioners knew perfectly well that the box rail was safer than the bulb rail at a place like this, as far as the mere crossing of horses is concerned. But, on the other hand, it seems to me that it is a matter to a certain extent in their own discretion. Both systems are in a certain degree dangerous to the traffic which has to cross the rails, but the liberty to lay down rails which must necessarily be to some extent dangerous is what their Act gives the Commissioners. It imposes on them the obligation of using that liberty in a way that is reasonably safe, and I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to shew that the system which was formerly the best in existence does not still continue to be reasonably safe. I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff.

No. 85.

Feb. 2, 1887.
Wiseley v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.

LORD YOUNG.—I have throughout considered this a difficult case. The defenders are a public body, on whom no personal liability is sought to be imposed, and who have really no personal interest in the matter except in so far as they may be desirous of having it said that they have acted according to their duty, and it is their duty to see that the rails which they maintain along the public streets and quays are kept in a condition that is reasonably safe for the carts going to the loading and unloading of the ships. Now, I confess I am not so satisfied as I should like to have been that they have done everything in their power to secure the safety of the public in this respect, but then that is a question which it is very difficult to determine. The particular complaint is that it was necessary to the safety of the public to have box rails—bulb rails having been shewn by experience to be unsafe. That comes to be so much a question of degree that there is great difficulty in determining the matter, because there is no proposition more certain than this, that no public body and no private individual is always bound to provide the safest known invention. Human affairs could not go on on that footing. Here the Harbour Commissioners tell us that they have considered the matter, and that they are advised that it is really a nice question which is the safer of the two—box rails or bulb rails—that the one is safer in one direction, the other in another direction. Probably, on the whole, the box rail is the safer, but the Commissioners have not been inattentive to their duty. It is a matter of opinion, and the two Sheriffs are of opinion that the accident did not result from any negligence on the part of the defenders. Your Lordship agrees in that opinion, and I understand that that is the view of my two brethren also. I therefore cannot presume to differ on such a matter, though I confess my own opinion is that it would be better if the Commissioners, in the interests of the public safety, were to expend so much money out of the harbour funds in making this quay safer by the substitution of box rails for bulb rails, for, as I have said, I think it would be made safer, though I have no knowledge of the subject beyond what I gather from the evidence before us.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK concurred with the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that on the occasion libelled, when a horse belonging to the pursuer was pulling a lorry loaded with grain across a line of rails at the harbour of Aberdeen, the property of the defenders, one of its hind feet slid into and became wedged in one of the rails, and was thereby injured; (2) that the said rails were laid down by the defenders under statutory authority, and are of the form and

DUNCAN M'LEAN & SONS, wholesale provision merchants, Glasgow, finding themselves in difficulties, on 18th December 1885 convened a meeting of their creditors, and offered a composition of 8s. in the £, payable by four specified instalments. This offer the creditors present accepted. Mrs M'Lean, the wife of Duncan M'Lean, one of the partners, along with the firm, signed promissory-notes for the third instalment of 2s. 6d. in the £, payable at six months. The firm's signature was written by her husband, but he did not sign as an individual.

Mrs M'Lean having been charged on one of the promissory-notes for £200 in favour of Angus Brothers, produce merchants, Glasgow, brought a suspension, pleading;—(2) The complainer as a married woman could not validly sign the promissory-note charged on, and the charge ought therefore to be suspended.

Angus Brothers pleaded;—(2) The said Mrs M'Lean being possessed of means and estate exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband at the date of granting said promissory-note and now, the said promissory-note constitutes a valid obligation against her and her estate.

On 20th November 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) suspended the charge, with expenses.

Angus Brothers reclaimed, and argued;—The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. 2,* gave a married woman power to grant an order for payments from the income of her moveable estate, and granting a bill was nothing more than that. Further, as section 2† must be interpreted by reference to section 1, the rents and produce of her heritable estate were in the same position. Then section 8‡ implied that although

* The Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1, subsec. 2, enacts, with reference to the whole moveable or personal estate of the wife,—“Any income of such estate shall be payable to the wife on her individual receipt or to her order, and to this extent the husband's right of administration shall be excluded; but the wife shall not be entitled to assign the prospective income thereof, or, unless with her husband's consent, to dispose of such estate.”

‡ Sec. 8 enacts,—“This Act shall not affect any contracts made or to be made between married persons before or during marriage, or the law relating to such contracts, or the law relating to donations between married persons, or to a wife's non-liability to diligence against her person, or any of the rights of married women under the recited Act (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 29).”

a wife's person could not be subject to diligence, her property might be. Further, under sec. 1, subsec. 2, she might contract to any extent with her husband's consent. These being a married woman's powers to contract, there came the Bills of Exchange Act, sec. 22, which declared that capacity to grant a bill was co-extensive with capacity to contract.*

Mrs M'Lean was not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—I think the judgment is quite right here. By the common law of Scotland a married woman who has separate estate is not entitled to grant, or rather is protected against granting, a bill of exchange as cautioner for a debt. The Married Women's Property Act, which was intended to give her further protection, has, it is argued, taken away the protection which she already had. I cannot assent to that argument. I am quite unable to put such a construction on the words of the Act. The Bills of Exchange Act was also referred to. In it the general principle is announced—is quite superfluously announced—that the power to grant a bill of exchange is co-extensive with the power to contract. That is just the common law, and consequently the Act leaves the question exactly where it was. I therefore think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

Expenses—Skilled witnesses—Judge's certificate—Notice—A. S., 15th July 1876.—The Act of Sederunt, 15th July 1876, provides that where it is found necessary to employ skilled persons to make investigations previous to a trial or proof in order to qualify them to give evidence thereat, such additional charges for the trouble and expense of such persons shall be allowed as may be fair and reasonable, "provided that the Judge who tries the cause shall, on a motion made to him either at the trial or proof or within eight days thereafter, . . . certify that it was a fit case for such additional allowance." Held (1) that this Act does not apply to causes in which the evidence is led before one of the Judges of a Division on a remit by the Division, and (2) that in such causes it is in the discretion of the Court to allow additional charges in respect of skilled witnesses on the motion for the approval of the Auditor's report.

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that notice that an application is to be made for a certificate for skilled witnesses need not be given to the opposite party.

In this case the Court, on 30th October 1884, on a reclaiming note against Lord Lee's judgment giving decree in favour of the pursuer, allowed the parties a proof before answer of their respective averments, and remitted to Lord Rutherford Clark to take the proof. The proof was led before Lord Rutherford Clark on 2d December 1884. On 20th March 1885 the pursuer, Lord Elphinstone, applied to Lord Rutherford Clark for a certificate for an additional allowance of expenses in respect of four skilled witnesses under the Act of Sederunt, 15th July 1876.* This application, which was made without notice to the defenders, and was heard in their absence, was granted on the same day. On 27th May the Court dismissed the action, with expenses, but, on appeal to the House of Lords, this judgment was reversed, the pursuer being found entitled to expenses and costs. The Auditor taxed the account of expenses at £309, 3s. 6d., but reserved for the consideration of the Court the sum of £85, 0s. 3d. (included in the said £309, 3s. 6d.), being the amount of the additional expenses of the four skilled witnesses already mentioned, the defenders having objected to this sum being allowed on the grounds (1) that the certificate of the Judge had not been granted within eight days of the trial or proof, as required by the Act of Sederunt, and (2) that the application for the certificate had been heard in the absence of the opposite party, and without notice.†

On 2d February 1887 the pursuer moved for the approval of the Auditor's report, and argued that the sum of £85, 0s. 3d. ought to be allowed. If the Act of Sederunt applied to the case of proofs taken on remit by one of the Judges of a Division, the hearing before the Division was to be held as part of "the trial or proof" in the sense of the Act, and consequently the certificate here had been granted timeously. But alternatively, the Act of Sederunt did not apply, and that left the question of allowing this item of expense to the discretion of the Court. The Court had such a discretion; this was an Act of Sederunt, not an Act of Parliament. The second objection was bad, as it was neither a provision of the Act of Sederunt, nor the practice, to require notice to be given to the other side of an application for a certificate for skilled witnesses.

Argued for the defender;—"The trial or proof" in the sense of the Act was either the leading of the evidence before the Judge appointed to take it, in which case the certificate here was bad because not timeously granted, or it was the hearing before the Division, in which case equally this certificate was bad, because a single Judge of a Division could not act for the Division. The Act was the only warrant for such a charge: therefore if the case was not within the Act the Court had no discre-

* The Act of Sederunt, 15th July 1876, entitled "For regulating the fees and charges of enrolled law-agents practising before the Supreme Courts of Scotland," in the table of fees thereto annexed, provides (under head V., "Jury Trials and Proofs," subhead iii., "Allowances to Witnesses," sec. 2), that "in cases where it is found necessary to employ professional or scientific persons, such as physicians, surgeons, chemists, engineers, land-surveyors, or accountants to make investigations previous to a trial or proof in order to qualify them to give evidence thereat, such additional charges for the trouble and expenses of such persons shall be allowed as may be considered fair and reasonable, provided that the Judge who tries the cause shall, on a motion made to him either at the trial or proof, or within eight days thereafter if in session, or, if in vacation, within the first eight days of the ensuing session, certify that it was a fit case for such additional allowance."

† In his report the Auditor stated,—". . . The terms of this rule are very precise, and, so far as my experience goes, it has been strictly applied. I may add that in cases where skilled witnesses are engaged the practice appears to be that the agents arrange for a meeting with the Judge, when they are heard on their respective applications for certificates, and (if necessary) against the crave of the opposite party in whole or in part."

tion, and must disallow the charge.¹ The second ground of objection was merely an example of the well-established rule of practice, that the opposite party was entitled to notice of all motions.

Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. Limited.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My impression is that we ought to allow the charges to which objection is here taken. There is no doubt that the provision of the Act of Sederunt has been applied, and applied strictly in more cases than one, but nevertheless the matter must be dealt with according to the fair and reasonable meaning of the words of the Act. The proof here was taken before one of our own number—before Lord Rutherford Clark—whose duty simply was to report the proof to the Court. It may be difficult to say whether, in such circumstances, the trial of the case takes place before the Judge who acts as the Commissioner of the Court to take the evidence, or before the Court which decides the cause on that evidence, for the question involves a consideration of the conduct of the parties and of the matters evolved in evidence at the time. Lord Rutherford Clark gave a certificate, but he did so after the lapse of the eight days mentioned in the Act of Sederunt, if these are to be counted from the termination of the proof, and not from the trial of the cause in the sense of the judgment of the Court. On the whole matter I find it so difficult to apply the strict words of the Act to the case of the proof taken by one of ourselves, that I am not disposed to give effect to the objections here.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. It is no doubt very fitting that the practice in ordinary proofs and jury trials should continue to follow the Act of Sederunt strictly. The question for the Judge is simply whether the evidence given by this or that witness before him is of such a character as to make it necessary or expedient that the witness should visit the locality which has given rise to the action in order to prepare himself for giving evidence at the proof. But there is no provision for the exact case which we have here. We must therefore consider this objection on its own merits, and I have no difficulty in holding that the charges which are here objected to should be allowed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. Looking to its terms I do not think that the Act of Sederunt applies here, and, accordingly, the question must be determined according to the view which the Court may take of these charges, and, for my own part, I am of opinion that these charges are charges which ought to be allowed. I cannot see that either the one party or the other will be prejudiced by our doing so. In regard to the second ground of objection, I do not think that notice was necessary. No doubt to give notice of motion by the one side to the other is convenient and proper, but I am not aware that there is any rule or practice in the Outer-House which makes such notice indispensable.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

ADAM MORRISON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Pearson—M'Lennan.
WALTER MONTGOMERIE NEILSON, Defender (Reclaimant).—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

Ultra vires—Jurisdiction—Volunteer—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65), secs. 24, 25, and 27.—The 24th section of the Volunteer Act, 1863, enacts that the officers and volunteers of a volunteer corps may from time to time make "rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps," which, when approved by Her Majesty through one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, "shall be binding on all persons." The 25th section enacts that "the right to sue for and recover" current subscriptions, arrears of subscriptions, and other money due to the corps "shall vest in the commanding officer for the time being. The 27th section enacts that "if any person belonging or having belonged to a volunteer corps neglects or refuses to pay any money subscribed or undertaken to be paid by him towards any of the funds or expenses of such corps, or due under the rules of such corps, and actually payable by him," such money shall (without prejudice to any other remedy) be recoverable as a penalty.

Held that the rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of a corps, made and approved in terms of the above enactments, may competently include rules providing for the payment of subscriptions by officers (both active and honorary) to the funds of the corps, and that such subscriptions so provided for may be recovered in a Court of law.

Statute—Statutory rules—Construction—Prospective or retrospective—Volunteer corps subscription—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65).—The rules of a volunteer corps, made in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, were dated 26th March 1885, and provided, inter alia, that subscriptions of members to the regimental funds should fall due on the 31st October in each year for the twelve months preceding; and that all members of the corps should be liable for the full year's subscription, provided they had been members of the corps for one calendar month in the year. Held (diss. Lord Young) that a subscription was due for the year ending 31st October 1885, although four months of that year had elapsed when the rules were made.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

ON 7th May 1886 Adam Morrison, of Gartloch, Lanarkshire, Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the 6th Regiment of Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteers, raised this action against Walter Montgomerie Neilson, of Queenshill, Kirkcudbright, Honorary Colonel of the same regiment, concluding for payment of £75 as the subscription due by the defender to the regimental funds for the year ending 31st October 1885, in accordance with certain rules alleged to have been made for the regiment in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, which "sum (as stated in cond. 4) fell due in terms of the said rules on 31st October 1885 for the twelve months preceding."

* The Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 65), enacts, sec. 24,—“The officers and volunteers belonging to a volunteer corps may from time to time make rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps, and may alter or repeal any such rules; but any such rules shall not have effect unless and until the commanding officer of the corps thinks fit to transmit the same to the lieutenant of the county to which the corps belongs—[By the Act 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 86, sec. 6, the intervention of the lieutenant of the county was abolished]—and such lieutenant thinks fit to submit the same for Her Majesty's approval, and such approval, signified through one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is notified by such lieutenant to the commanding officer of the corps, to be by him forthwith communicated to the corps; whereupon the rules so approved shall be binding on all persons.”

Section 25 enacts,—“All money subscribed by or to or for the use of a volunteer corps or administrative regiment, and all effects belonging to any such corps or regiment, or lawfully used by it, not being the property of any indi-

The rules founded on, which were dated 26th March 1885 (other rules No. 88. having been in force previously), provided, inter alia, as follows:—

"2. The corps shall consist of two classes,—(1) Enrolled members, consisting of efficient and non-efficient; and of (2) honorary members, including the honorary colonel and officers who retire, or have retired, with their rank and wish to continue members of the corps, the latter class contributing to the funds of the corps, but not being enrolled for service. Feb. 2, 1887. Morrison v. Neilson.

"3. All subscriptions shall fall due on the 31st of October in each year for the twelve months preceding. All members of either class shall be liable for the full year's subscription, provided they have been members for one calendar month in any one year.

"4. The annual subscription of officers, honorary officers, and honorary members shall be as follows, viz.:—

Lieut.-Colonel,	50	0	0
Captains,	10	0	0
Lieutenants,	7	10	0
Acting-Surgeon,	7	10	0

Honorary officers (except hon. colonel), one-half of the subscription of officers of their respective ranks on the active list.

Honorary members,	1	1	0
or one donation of	10	10	0"

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender being due and resting owing the vidual officer or volunteer or non-commissioned officer of the volunteer permanent staff belonging to the corps or regiment, and the exclusive right to sue for and recover current subscriptions, arrears of subscriptions, and other money due to the corps or regiment, and all lands acquired by the corps or regiment, shall vest in the commanding officer of the corps for the time being," &c.

Section 27 enacts,—“If any person belonging or having belonged to a volunteer corps or administrative regiment neglects or refuses to pay any money subscribed or undertaken to be paid by him towards any of the funds or expenses of such corps or regiment, or due under the rules of such corps, and actually payable by him, or to pay any fine incurred by him under the rules of such corps, such money or fine shall (without prejudice to any other remedy) be recoverable from him, with costs, at any time within twelve months after the same becomes due and payable as a penalty under this Act is recoverable, and when recovered shall be applied as part of the general fund of the corps or regiment.”

The War Office also issued “Regulations for the Volunteer Force”—(See Volunteer Act, 1863, sec. 16). Articles 447-449 of the Regulations for 1884 made provisions for “honorary members,” and, inter alia, that such members “will not be included in the muster-roll of the corps to which they belong”; that they “are not subject to military discipline, nor allowed to interfere with the military duties of the corps,” and that they “are not under any circumstances liable to be assembled for actual service.” [The Act of 1863, secs. 17 to 20, made provisions for the calling out of volunteers for active service.]

The Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1884, further provide (art. 495) that “in order to give legal force to the rules proposed by a volunteer force for the management of its property, finances, and civil affairs, they must be approved at a general meeting of the officers and other members of the corps, and submitted by the commanding officer” to the War Office for the approval of Her Majesty.”

The Regulations further gave a model set of rules for volunteer corps. By these model rules it was contemplated, inter alia, that honorary members should pay a “donation” or an “annual subscription” to the funds of the corps.

amount sued for, the pursuer, as commanding officer foresaid, is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defender denied he had ever consented to the rules being adopted, and stated that (Stat. 7) "Neither the said corps, nor the officers thereof, had any power or authority to pass or make the said last mentioned rules, and the same are ultra vires and illegal, especially in so far as they fix the subscription of the honorary colonel at £75, or bear, or are alleged to make the defender liable for a subscription of £75 per annum. The alleged subscription of £75 was not necessary for or imposed in order to benefit the regiment, but solely for the purpose of endeavouring to compel the defender to resign his rank by imposing a heavy fine upon him."

The defender pleaded;—(5) The alleged rules being ultra vires and illegal, the defender should be assolizied.

On 1st July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, on a true construction of the enactment contained in the Volunteer Act, 1863, that the power of making rules, subject to approval of Her Majesty on the advice of the Secretary of State, includes the determination of the sums to be contributed by officers of each rank towards the regimental fund: Finds that the defender's contribution has, in conformity with the said statutory power, been fixed at the sum of £75: That no cause has been shewn for inquiry into the procedure relative to said rules, and that the same are ex facie valid, being approved of by the War Office: Therefore decerns against the defender conform to the conclusions of the libel: Finds him liable in expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—I am quite clear that I must give decree in this case. I think I must take it as matter of general knowledge, of which the Court may take cognisance, that there is a regimental fund in connection with all the Queen's regiments, whether they are the regular forces or the volunteers, and that it is part of our military system that the officers are called upon to contribute according to a scale to this fund. If there were any doubt about this, information could easily be got from the War Office. But, being part of the public administration of the country, I think I am entitled to proceed upon the general knowledge which everyone is supposed to possess of these facts—that there is a regimental fund to which officers are liable to contribute. That being so, and the Volunteer Act empowering the members of the corps to make rules, subject to the approval of the Queen on the recommendation of her minister, I hold that there is a sufficient statutory authority to the persons designated to deal with this fund—to deal with it as a fund kept up in the manner that has already become matter of practice. Now, this is not the first occasion on which the officers of the corps in question have been assessed according to a scale for contributions to the regimental fund, because what is complained of is that the scale of contributions has been raised, and it is admitted that there has been a fund in time past. I think the defender, as I read the record, does not indeed dispute that there is such a fund, and that all the officers are to contribute to it. That being so, I do not see any good reason why rules should not be made regarding it, and approved by the War Office under the statutory power. If it could be shewn that under an erroneous interpretation of the statute the approval of the military authorities has been obtained to something for which they had no statutory authority, then a question for a Court of law would have arisen; but that has not been shewn to my satisfaction. I conceive that the regulation of the contributions to the fund is fairly within the scope of the statutory powers; and under the statute a discretion is vested, in the first instance, in the corps itself, and, secondly, in the War Office, in the form prescribed, to enact such rules. I do not think that this Court has any power to interfere with that discretion. It is a proper matter of administration by the Executive. I think we have no more power to interfere with the War Office than the War Office would have power to review a decision of the Court of Session. But the aid of the Court

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) If the sum here sued for was recoverable in a Court of law, that must be either because the defender had voluntarily agreed to pay it or because the regiment had the power to assess him compulsorily for it. He certainly had not agreed in express terms; the utmost that could be said against him, on the ground of agreement, was that he might have attended the regimental meeting at which (as was alleged) these subscriptions were imposed, and that his non-attendance was to be held as consent. But he had had no notice of this meeting—the rules were passed behind his back, and their true object was to impose a heavy fine on the defender in order to get him to retire. He was charged much more proportionately than other honorary officers. Even if he had been present when the rules were adopted, and had voted against the proposal, but had been out-voted, he had never agreed that the majority should have the power of imposing subscriptions on him, and to say that without any such agreement on his part the majority had that power was simply to say that they had the power of compulsory assessment. Now, such a power must be either statutory or in virtue of a crown grant, and it must be conferred expressly or at least by the clearest implication. The statute here founded on was the Volunteer Act, 1863, sections 24, 25, and 27. Section 24 certainly conferred no power to assess—it assumed the existence of regimental property, but said nothing about the mode of acquiring such property. Similarly, section 25 assumed the existence of “subscriptions,” but said nothing about their nature. Section 27 dealt first with “money subscribed or undertaken to be paid” by the volunteer—that plainly referred to subscriptions which the volunteer had voluntarily agreed to pay, and had nothing to do with assessment. The section also dealt with “money due under the rules of such corps, and actually payable by” the volunteer, but that simply referred back to section 24, and added nothing to it. The rules therefore dealt with a subject which was not within the scope of the three sections founded on. It might be said that the approval of the War Office made a difference. It was difficult to see how the approval of the War Office could alter the construction of an Act of Parliament, and bring within the scope of the Act what the Act itself did not include, or how it could make a contract for a man which he himself had not made, and it must do the one or the other if it was to have the effect of making this subscription recoverable in a Court of law. It might be that the War Office had the power of making such subscriptions a condition of holding the Queen’s commission in volunteer regiments. These subscriptions were essentially voluntary in their nature—alogous to subscriptions to a club—but then the regiment had not the power, which a club possessed, of expelling its members for non-payment, and the War Office therefore might agree that those members who would not pay should lose their commissions. That was the true remedy, if the pursuer had any, but it gave the defender an opportunity of shewing to the War Office authorities that the real object of these rules was to oblige him to retire, and of explaining the whole circumstances connected with their adoption. In any case, honorary officers could not be assessed compulsorily. They were not officers of the regiment in any real sense—they were not liable to be called out for active service. Their position was analogous to that of the colonel of a regiment in the regular army.

was the subscription for 1884-5, while the rules were not adopted till March 1885. Otherwise the rules would have a retrospective effect; but they did not bear expressly to be retrospective, and that was necessary. If the defender had retired in January 1885, he would, on such a construction, have been liable, although he had ceased to be an officer when the rules were adopted, and had no power to prevent their adoption.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The only reasonable construction of the Act of Parliament was that officers' subscriptions might be included in the rules of a volunteer corps, and might be recovered in a Court of law. That was certainly the view of the War Office, as their regulations shewed. The rules had been approved by the War Office, and the Court of Session could not get behind that approval on the ground of any informality. All the formalities, however, had been duly complied with here, and the defender, had he pleased, might have attended and voted when the rules were adopted. He had had as much notice as any other officer had had. He was entitled to take part in the meeting though an honorary officer, nor was there anything in the Act to exempt honorary officers from payment of subscriptions—they were officers of the corps. It was not the fact that a large subscription had been imposed on the defender with the view of compelling him to retire. It was not to be supposed that the War Office would pass rules which would have such an effect. (2) The subscription for the year ending October 1885 was in accordance with the rules to which the defender must be held to have given his assent. Rule 3 provided that those who had been members for one month in a year were liable for the year, and that rule must receive effect.¹ The defender fulfilled that condition. If he had ceased to be a member before March 1885, though after October 1884, that would have been a different case. He would not then have assented to the rule.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The pursuer of this action is Mr Morrison of Gartloch, Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the 6th Regiment of Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteers, and the defender is Mr Montgomerie Neilson, honorary Colonel of that regiment. The subject-matter of suit is the sum of £75 said to be due as the defender's annual subscription to the regimental funds for the year from 31st October 1884 to 31st October 1885. The ground of action is the rules of the regiment made in March 1885 by virtue of the 24th section of the Volunteer Act, 1863, for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps, duly approved by Her Majesty, as required by that statute. The second of these rules is:—"The corps shall consist of two classes—(1) enrolled members, consisting of efficient and non-efficient; and of (2) honorary members, including the honorary colonel and officers who retire, or have retired, with their rank, and wish to continue members of the corps, the latter class contributing to the funds of the corps, but not being enrolled for service"; the third,—“All subscriptions shall fall due on the 31st of October in each year for the twelve months preceding. All members of either class shall be liable for the full year's subscription, provided they have been members for one calendar month in any one year”; and the fourth,—“The annual subscription of officers, honorary officers, and honorary members shall be as follows, viz., honorary colonel, £75,” the annual subscriptions of other officers being in like manner particularised.

There are five pleas in law set forth in defence on the record, but that alone upon which argument is offered in support of the reclaiming note was the 5th, No. 88. which is as follows :—"The alleged rules being ultra vires and illegal, the defender should be assoilzied." The Lord Ordinary has repelled this plea, and ^{Feb. 2, 1887.} ^{Morrison v. Neilson.} decreed in favour of the pursuer. I concur in this judgment, and in the reasons for it which have been given by the Lord Ordinary. These appear to me to be perfectly satisfactory, and consequently little in addition requires to be said in explanation of my views of the case.

The formality of the rules is not disputed, all the statutory conditions required for efficacy having been fulfilled. The interpretation of the rules is not doubtful. Contributions or subscriptions, according to the language of the rules, are not mere free-will offerings which may be given or withheld at the officer's pleasure. On the contrary, they are presented as matters of obligation, and it is upon this view alone that the consideration and decision of the defender's fifth, which may be said in truth, so far as his pleadings on the record are concerned, to be his only plea, becomes necessary on the present occasion. It would be strange were it otherwise, for the volunteer forces are essentially self-supporting, and wholly unpaid, although Government arms the men, and contributes a certain sum towards the corporate expenditure. Provision must be made accordingly within the regiment itself for supplying its wants, and hence not merely the propriety but the necessity there is for raising funds by which this result may be accomplished. There is no hardship whatever in the arrangement, for the corps itself with the officers fixes what is to be paid. This is the plain import of the rules. Are these within the purview of the Volunteer Act, 1863? This mainly depends on the interpretation of the 24th section of that statute, which enacts that "the officers and volunteers belonging to a volunteer corps may from time to time make rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps, and may alter or repeal any such rules, but such rules shall not have effect unless and until the commanding officer of the corps thinks fit to transmit the same to the lieutenant of the county to which the corps belongs, and such lieutenant thinks fit to submit the same for Her Majesty's approval, and such approval, signified through one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, is notified by such lieutenant to the commanding officer of the corps, to be by him forthwith communicated to the corps, whereupon the rules so approved shall be binding on all persons." The rules in question were passed by the officers and volunteers belonging to the defender's regiment. They obtained Her Majesty's approval. They were transmitted to the officer commanding the regiment by the Secretary for War, the consequence being that rules so approved of and so transmitted are binding upon all persons. No enactment could be broader or more absolute. The rules having been passed, approved, and transmitted, everyone concerned is bound. The defender, even if others could, cannot say that he is exempted from their operation, because he is as good as named in the rules. The second rule provides, inter alia, that the honorary colonel and officers who retire or who have retired with their rank, and wish to continue members of the corps, shall be members, and shall contribute to the funds of the corps. This is not putting contribution in his option; it is making contribution a matter of obligation. What was said at the debate was that though by section 24 authority was given to make rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps, this does not imply authority to pass rules for raising money by making subscriptions matters of debt. This contention is, I think, erroneous. The raising of money is a necessity, and when there was power given to manage the finances and civil affairs of the corps—or, in other words, to provide for the requisite expenditure—it is only reasonable to hold that power was given to pass such rules as those which are the ground of action here. This has always been the recognised interpretation. The War Office acts upon it. Other volunteer regiments have acted upon it, and, so far as appears, the defender is the first person in his position who has resisted legal liability. But in truth the point is fixed by the closing words of the 24th section of the Volunteer Act, 1863, already quoted,—“The rules so approved shall be binding on all persons.” Therefore the £75 sued for is of necessity a debt due by the defender in terms of the 4th of these rules. There can be no opposite determination unless the statute is to be disregarded in the judgment to be pronounced.

In connection with section 24, section 25 of the same Act must be taken into view. This latter section enacts that “all money subscribed by or to or for the use of a volunteer corps,” “and all effects belonging to any such corps,” “and lawfully used by it, not being the property of any individual officer, or volunteer, or non-commissioned officer of the volunteer permanent staff belonging to the corps or regiment, and the exclusive right to sue for and recover current subscriptions, arrears of subscriptions, and other money due to the corps or regiment . . . shall vest in the commanding officer of the corps or regiment for the time being, and his successors in office, with power for him and his successors to sue, to make contracts and conveyances, and to do all other lawful things relating thereto.” Subscriptions, therefore, are things that may be sued for, which they could not be if for them the officers of the regiment particularised in the rules were not under legal liability. The two sections taken together made it quite clear. The sums mentioned in the rules are debts in the ordinary acceptance of the word, and may be sued for as such by the officer commanding the regiment. This 25th section is not necessary for the case of the pursuer, but it is very convenient.

The defender, however, urged at the debate that the rules in question could not be acted on to the effect of giving judgment against the defender, because that would be to give to the rules a retrospective operation. I was somewhat impressed with this consideration when it was first presented, but I have come without much difficulty to the conclusion that it must be overruled. The rules must receive effect. This is matter of statutory enactment, and accordingly, as rule 3 provides that all subscriptions shall fall due on the 31st of October in each year for the twelve months preceding, and that all members of either class shall be liable for the full year's subscription provided they have been members for one calendar month in any one year, and as the fact is that the defender has been a member of the corps and honorary colonel for more than one calendar month in the current year, his liability for his subscription of £75 must be held to be established.

On the whole matter, my opinion is that the decision of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK.—I agree in that opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—This is, I think, an unpleasant case. I put the question when the case was being argued whether any similar case had ever occurred, and I think the answer was that none ever had. It is therefore the first case of an officer of a volunteer corps and his brother officers getting upon such terms that an action is brought against him for his subscription to the corps. I should have thought, and past experience seems to prove it—if it be true that this is the first case of the kind—that subscriptions which are really due, whether in law or in honour and good feeling, are recoverable without resorting to a Court of law, and if not so recoverable that the corps had better go without them and without the officer. Because, in so far as subscriptions or any other payments stand upon the Queen's authority, they may be enforced against any officer who is contumacious in resisting that authority by the War Office, without anything so unseemly as an action in a Court of law.

But this case seems to have been brought, or at least defended, in order to determine a general question of law. The only defence which is here stated is, that the rule under which the subscription sued for is imposed is illegal. There is a statement to that effect, and the plea in law founded upon that statement is as follows:—"The alleged rules being ultra vires and illegal, the defender should be assoilzied." That is the fifth plea; the other pleas might as well be stated in any other case as in the present. That plea is stated, of course, in reference to the particular case in hand, and the action is brought to recover a subscription for the year from October 1884 to October 1885 as prescribed by these rules. I must concur with my brethren in holding that these rules are legal, and therefore binding. It is suggested—and I must say there is an unpleasant amount of plausibility in the suggestion—that the officers of the regiment, having not a good feeling towards their honorary Colonel, but rather the reverse, made the rules for the purpose—and only for the purpose—of introducing into them the provision that the honorary Colonel should pay a subscription of £75 a-year, which was represented to us as an altogether extravagant and unprecedented sum. I asked if there was any precedent for such a thing, and I got much the same answer as I did to the question whether there was a precedent for such an action; I was told there was none. The defender says that this was done behind his back, and without any notice to him, and it was, he says, to his surprise, and of course pain, that he found that such a proceeding had been so resorted to in order, as he believes, that he might be forced to resign. I should have wished that there had been less countenance given to this surmise as a probable one in itself from the actual facts of the case. But I concur with the Lord Ordinary—I understand it is also the opinion of your Lordships—that upon that question we cannot enter here. If the defender has really been ill-used, and taken advantage of in an unworthy manner, he ought to have recourse to the War Office authorities, who are perfectly competent to inquire into the matter, and if they see fit, to redress any such iniquity if such was perpetrated. It cannot be supposed that the War Office authorities would countenance any indirect attempt to forward the one side of a quarrel, the object of which was to get rid of the honorary Colonel of a regiment, and if the answer to any resort on the part of the officer to the War Office was this,—"This is all right, and as we intended, and there is precedent for it in other cases," then of course the honorary Colonel, irrespective of all those other matters, would be acting unworthily and contumaciously if he refused payment. And if he did refuse payment in such circumstances, there is a remedy without coming to a Court of law as I have already observed. But since the case is here, I agree that we cannot make an inquiry into that matter because we cannot give any redress so far as it is concerned. I concur in expressing the opinion that the rules are lawful and binding, and that the subscription, whether a voluntary subscription or a subscription due by the rules of the corps (by that I mean lawful and binding rules, as the rules in question are), may according to the Act of Parliament be recovered by action, and may even be recovered as a penalty may be recovered without prejudice to other claims and remedies. Therefore had I been of opinion that the rules applied to the subscription here sued for, I should have concurred entirely in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and with that which your Lordships are to pronounce.

But then the question arises, Do these rules apply to the year in question, the subscription for which is sued for? The year was that from 31st October 1884 to 31st October 1885, as I have already mentioned, and the subscription, as stated in cond. 4, fell due in terms of said rules on the 31st day of October 1885, for the twelve months preceding. Now, it is to be observed that the rules here relied on are dated 26th March 1885. According to the previous practice, and according to existing rules, subscriptions are annual. Subscriptions for the year begin and end on the 31st October. They are as much "annual" as rents would be, or are, in the general case; as much "annual" as rates would be, or are, in the general case. This, then, is a subscription for the year from 31st October 1884 to 31st October 1885. Does a rule made in March 1885 apply to that year? I am of opinion—and I confess very clearly of opinion—that it does not. If the rule had said so—that it shall apply to the current year, six months of which had passed—of course it would have to receive effect. But with respect to the question,—retrospective or only prospective operation,—I cannot read the rule otherwise than I would read an Act of Parliament. If an Act of Parliament passed in the month of March 1885 dealt with an annual tax or rate which ran from October to October, I think it too clear to be disputed that it would not apply to a tax for the current year, but that its operation and application would begin with the commencement of the following year. The tax for the year 1884-1885 stands upon another Act or upon no Act at all; it is just like a rate or tax for a current year standing upon a prior Act of Parliament after another Act has been passed. Any Act of Parliament for increasing or reducing an annual rate must be passed in a current year, for there is and can be no interval. I confess, therefore, that but for the opinion which your Lordships have expressed to the contrary, I should have felt no doubt or hesitation about it. Neither the rule, which by statute is imperative, nor the Act of Parliament is, I think, to be read as retrospective. If the Act or the rule relates to an annual tax, an annual burden, annual rent, or annual subscription, it applies to the tax, rent, burden, or subscription for the year immediately following the passing of the Act of Parliament or the making of the rule. The rule says,—“All subscriptions shall fall due on the 31st October in each year for the twelve months preceding.” Well, but the only twelve months which follow this rule—that is, which immediately follow it—begin in October 1885, which is the commencement of the first year after the passing of the Act. Take another month. If the rule had been passed in the month of August, or any month before October, would its operation have commenced in the preceding or the following month of October? The rule containing nothing on the subject, there can in my view be no doubt when its operation would commence. I must say that upon this point I have a very distinct and clear opinion.

Therefore, agreeing with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary upon the merits of the case, that the rule is binding and that the subscription under the rule is a debt recoverable by action, I differ upon the other point, being of opinion that the rule founded on has no application to the annual subscription which is here sued for.

Road—Assessment—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), sec. 54.—Section 54 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, enacts, that the amount required for the purposes of the Act "shall be levied by the local authority at such rates as may be necessary for the purpose, by an assessment to be imposed and levied on all lands and heritages within the burgh, and such assessment shall be paid, except as otherwise expressly provided, one half by the proprietor and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the lands and heritages on which such assessments are imposed." Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that under this enactment the commissioners were to levy from the individual owners and occupiers such equal rate per pound as would produce the aggregate sum required, and that the principle of Galloway v. Nicolson, March 19, 1875, 2 R. 650, under which the aggregate sum required would have been divided into two equal parts, and the one part levied from the owners as a class, and the other from the occupiers as a class, did not apply.

Road—Assessment—Exemption—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), secs. 54, 55, and 86—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 110), secs. 87, 88, and 89.—Under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, assessments are levied from the occupiers of lands and heritages, and from the owners of subjects let at a rent under £4 in place of the occupiers (but subject to deduction of one-fourth), and the 89th section makes provision for a deduction from the assessment where premises have been unoccupied for part of the year.

Under the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, an assessment on lands and heritages falls to be paid one half by the owner and the other half by the occupier, and by its 86th section the Act provides that "the assessments authorised by this Act shall be subject to like exemptions and restrictions as are applicable to the said police assessment."

Held, on a construction of the foregoing and relative provisions of the above Acts, that the occupiers of houses within a burgh, under the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, are entitled to the exemptions provided to occupiers by the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, but that the exemptions were inapplicable to an assessment imposed on owners as such.

Held further, that the 86th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, in giving the local authority power to relieve occupiers of lands and heritages under the annual value of £4 on the ground of poverty, was not inconsistent with and did not supersede the power given under the 88th section of the General Police and Improvement Act to remit payment of the assessment under the Roads and Bridges Act on the ground of poverty irrespective of the amount of rent.

THIS was a special case presented on 25th October 1886 by (1) Alex-^{2d} Division.

and had been since Whitsunday 1885, wholly unlet and unoccupied, as second parties; and (3) Richard Russell and another, occupiers of premises within the said burgh, as third parties, to have the opinion and judgment of the Court on certain questions arising under the sections of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, quoted below.*

* The following were the provisions of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), referred to in the case:—

Sec. 64.—“The commissioners shall, in such manner as to them shall seem best for the police purposes of this Act, estimate, assess, levy, and apply the sums of money hereby authorised to be raised for the police purposes of this Act. . . .”

Sec. 84.—“The commissioners “shall assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh, according to the Valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland, subject to the exceptions hereinafter provided, in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act, in so far as the same may have been adopted, and for the purposes to which the police assessment authorised by any Act in force in such burgh at the time of such adoption might have been applied, . . . and such assessment shall, for the purposes of this Act, be called the police assessment.”

Sec. 87.—“The commissioners shall assess the owners in place of the occupiers of all lands or premises let at a rent under £4, and levy such assessment from such owners; but the commissioners shall allow to such owners a deduction from such assessment equal to one-fourth of the amount thereof. . . .”

Sec. 88.—“The commissioners may, on the ground of the poverty or inability to pay of any person liable in the police assessment under this Act, remit, in whole or in part, payment of said assessment by such person, in such manner as the commissioners shall in their discretion think just and reasonable, but upon no other account whatsoever.”

Sec. 89.—“The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises, but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year, and owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year shall, themselves as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient.”

The following were the provisions of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), founded on:—

Sec. 54.—“The amount required for carrying out the provisions of this Act within any burgh, or by the local authority thereof, where there is no rate or assessment now levied, wholly or partly for the maintenance and repair of streets or roads within the same, shall be levied by the burgh local authority at such rates as may be necessary for the purpose, by an assessment to be imposed and levied on all lands and heritages within the burgh; and such assessment shall be paid, except as otherwise expressly provided, one half by the proprietor and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the lands and heritages on which such assessments are imposed, unless where the name of the tenant or occupier is not set forth in the Valuation-roll, in which case the whole of the assessment imposed on such lands and heritages may be levied from and paid by the proprietor, who shall be entitled to recover half thereof from the tenant or occupier.”

Sec. 55 made provision for the adoption of sec. 54 in burghs in which the assessment for streets and roads had hitherto been levied under any local or general Act.

Sec. 86.—“The local authority of any burgh shall, in the imposing, levying and recovering of the assessments authorised by this Act, possess the whole powers, rights, and remedies in force for the time being within such burgh.”

The burgh of Govan was constituted in 1864 under the General Police No. 89. Act, 1862, by which the Police Commissioners, inter alia, had charge of the maintenance and repair of the roads, streets, and sewers in the burgh, but after the passing of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, the method of assessment provided by the 54th section of that Act was duly adopted by the burgh.

Feb. 3, 1887.
Govan Police
Commissioners v.
Armour.

The questions stated in the case were :—“(1) Are the Police Commissioners of Govan, in levying and imposing assessments under the 54th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, subjected by the 86th section of that Act to any of the exemptions and restrictions contained in sections 87, 88, and 89 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862? And if so, (2) Are occupiers within burgh entitled under the Roads and Bridges Act to the same exemptions as they were under the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act? (3) Are owners of unlet and unoccupied houses within burgh entitled to the exemptions and deductions provided for in the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act? (4) Do the terms of the 86th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, giving the local authority power to relieve occupiers of lands or heritages under the annual value of £4 as appearing in the Valuation-roll, limit or derogate from the power given under the 88th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, whereby the Commissioners are empowered to remit in whole or in part payment of assessment in the case of any person, irrespective of the amount of rent, on the ground of poverty or inability to pay assessment? (5) Is it legal for the Commissioners, as the local authority, to exact from owners more than one-half of the assessment requiring to be raised for the purposes of the Roads and Bridges Act (exclusive of monies required for payment of road debts),—that is to say, suppose they require to raise a sum of £5000, can they assess or exact from owners more than £2500?”

It was conceded at the hearing that the first question was stated too generally to entitle the parties to an answer.

On the second and third questions the first party maintained the negative answers, contending, in particular, that the deductions referred to in the 89th section of the Police Act had reference merely to the case of occupiers of lands or premises, upon whom alone by that Act the assessment was authorised to be levied, and that, as the Commissioners had assessed in virtue of the 54th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, the 86th section of that Act did not affect them at all, or, if it did, it compelled or entitled them to allow deductions under the 89th section of the Police Act to occupiers alone, and not to owners of unlet or unoccupied with reference to the imposing, levying, and recovering of the police assessment, or if there be no police assessment, any other assessment or rate levied by the local authority within such burgh; and the assessments authorised by this Act shall be subject to like exemptions and restrictions as are applicable to the said police assessment or other assessment or rate, and may be collected either separately or along therewith. The whole amount of the assessments authorised by this Act may be levied on and recovered from the tenant or occupier, who, on payment and on production of a receipt therefor by the collector, shall be entitled to deduct one-half of the amount, or in the case of assessments for payment of debt and interest thereon, the whole amount thereof, from the rent payable to the proprietor; and all such assessments shall, in the case of bankruptcy or insolvency, be preferable to all debts of a private nature due by the person assessed; provided that it shall be lawful for the local authority to relieve from assessment the occupiers of lands or heritages under the annual value of £4, as appearing on the Valuation-roll, on ground of poverty.”

houses. The second parties, who had been assessed in respect of their properties in the share of the assessment under the 54th section of the Roads and Bridges Act imposed on proprietors (but not in the share imposed on occupiers), and had been refused any deduction on the ground of unlet premises, maintained the affirmative answer to the third question, contending that by the Police Act the whole burden of assessment was laid upon occupiers, with a power as contained in the 88th section to the Commissioners to remit assessment in whole or in part on the ground of poverty or inability to pay, and with power as contained in the 89th section to the Commissioners to grant deduction from assessment for any period during which any lands or premises should not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year; that under the Roads and Bridges Act owners and occupiers together took the place of occupiers under the earlier Act, and that consequently the Commissioners, in imposing assessments under the Roads and Bridges Act upon owners, were bound to exempt owners of property unlet for the year during which the assessment was levied, on the ground that such owners were, under the 86th section of the last mentioned Act, entitled to the like exemptions and restrictions as were applicable to the assessments levied under the Police Act. The third parties maintained the affirmative answer to the second question, contending that they were still entitled, under the recited Acts, to the exemptions from assessments which they enjoyed prior to the adoption of the Roads and Bridges Act, under sections 87, 88, and 89 of the Police Act.¹

The first party maintained the affirmative, and the other parties the negative answer to the fourth question.

On the fifth question the second parties maintained, on the authority of Galloway v. Nicolson,² decided with reference to corresponding provisions in the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, that under the 54th section of the Roads and Bridges Act the amount required by the burgh for the maintenance of roads, &c. in each year was to be divided into two equal parts, one of which was to be levied from the owners as a class, and the other from the occupiers as a class, the result being that the occupiers individually would pay more than the owners individually if a large number of houses in the burgh were unoccupied. The first party maintained, on the other hand, that Galloway v. Nicolson did not apply, as it was there held on the construction of the provision in the Poor-Law Act, that the "assessment" which was to be divided equally between owners and occupants was the total sum required by the parochial board; but that the words of the Act here were different, and that their true construction was the equitable one, viz., that the "assessment" which was to be divided between the proprietor and the occupier was the rate imposed on each subject individually; in the case of unoccupied houses the occupier's half remaining unpaid, and going to swell the nominal sum required for the purposes of the Act.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This special case is brought by the Commissioners of the burgh of Govan. The questions that are raised in it are of considerable importance as regards the administration of public authorities under the Roads and Bridges Act, and also under the General Police Act of 1862. The difficulty that has arisen has been caused mainly by the number of tenements and premises within the district of the Commissioners which are at present unlet, and the question substantially relates to the manner in which the assessment which is laid on the annual value of lands and heritages within the burgh—half being directed to be collected from the owners and the other half from the occupiers—is to be imposed in such circumstances. No. 89.

Govan Police
Commissioners v.
Armour.

There are some other questions stated in the case which I shall speak of immediately, but in the meantime I shall express my opinion on the fifth question, which is to this effect,—“Is it legal for the Commissioners, as the local authority, to exact from owners more than one-half of the assessment required to be raised for the purposes of the Roads and Bridges Act (exclusive of the moneys required for the payment of the road debts)—that is to say, suppose they require to raise the sum of five thousand pounds, can they assess or exact from owners more than two thousand five hundred pounds?” Now, it is plain that there cannot be an occupant liable in assessment unless the premises are occupied, and where premises are not let I am of opinion that that has simply the effect of diminishing the number of contributors who are to be assessed under the statute, seeing that the assessment is laid upon the actual occupiers. I think that the Commissioners of Police must determine how much, in the first place, they require to raise, and, in the second place, what amount of assessment laid on in terms of the statute will produce the sum they require. And if the area from which that sum is to be levied is diminished by reason of there being fewer occupiers, through the houses being unlet, the rate per pound must be proportionally increased alike, I think, in the case of actual occupiers and of owners. The result of that no doubt is, that the owners will pay more than if the premises had been all occupied, but so also will the actual occupants. But I do not think that that is really an element which enters into the question. If so much a pound is levied on the actual occupants and so much on the owners, that will give the amount that the Commissioners require, and I think that is what they are entitled and bound to do.

In regard to the other questions I do not think there is any material difficulty. The first question is, I think, too generally put, because it is not necessary for us to solve an abstract question as to whether the Police Commissioners are subjected to any of the exemptions or restrictions there referred to. It is enough for us to answer the specific questions which follow, the first of which is,—“Are occupiers within burgh entitled under the Roads and Bridges Act to the same exemptions as they were under the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act?” My opinion is that they are. The next question is in these terms :—“Are owners of unlet and unoccupied houses within burgh entitled to the exemptions and restrictions provided for in the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act?” I do not think that in regard to that question they are, because the assessment is laid on, one half on owners, and one half on occupiers. The third question is—“Do the terms of the 86th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, giving the local authority power to relieve occupiers of lands or heritages under the annual value of £4 as appearing in the Valuation-roll, limit or derogate from the power given under the 88th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, whereby the Commissioners are empowered to remit, in whole or in part, payment of the assessment in the case of any person, irrespective of the amount of rent, on the ground of poverty or inability to pay

No. 89. the assessment!" I do not think that these provisions are inconsistent with each other. My opinion is, that the Commissioners may give parties assessed the benefit of the exemptions without any inconsistency. I therefore propose that we should answer these questions to the effect I have indicated, finding it unnecessary to give an answer to the first, but answering the second in the negative, the third and fourth in the affirmative, and giving a special answer to the fifth.

Feb. 3, 1887.
Govan Police
Commissioners v.
Armour.

LORD YOUNG.—I am substantially of the same opinion. The only question here which the parties are interested that we should answer, and which I should have been disposed to answer—for we are not bound to answer any question which parties may choose to put—is the fifth. That is an interesting question, and after the decision of the First Division in 1875 upon a similar question under the Poor-Law Act, I must acknowledge that it is one of difficulty also. It is that decision alone which makes me regard the question as one of difficulty. If the words here had been the same as in the Poor-Law Act, it would probably have been our duty to follow that decision; or if we thought seriously that the question ought to be reconsidered, then to request the aid of our brethren, or of some of them. But the words here are different, and I am not prepared, as at present advised, to carry that judgment any further than it goes upon the precise words which were then under the consideration of the Court.

The question which we have here turns upon the words of the 54th section of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, the question being whether the sum which the Commissioners resolve has to be raised by assessment must be divided into two parts or moieties, and the one moiety laid on owners, and the other moiety laid upon occupiers; or whether an assessment at the rate per pound resolved upon as sufficient to raise the money which is required levied and imposed upon each individual tenement, has to be paid one half by the owner of the tenement and the other half by the occupier, if there is an occupier. I certainly prefer the latter view, as leading not only to the more equitable, but to the only equitable result. For the result to which it leads is this—that the same rate per pound is laid upon owners and upon occupiers without distinction. If it is 6d. per pound upon the owner then it is 6d. per pound upon the occupier if there is one—if there is no occupier there can be no assessment upon the occupier. What it leads to is perfect equality, which, I think, was intended to be brought about. The result of the other view, which was given effect to by the First Division in the case under the Poor-Law Act, is this—that if you have more owners than occupiers—that is to say, if some premises are unlet and unoccupied—then there must be a larger rate per pound imposed on occupiers than on owners. The only failure that can occur is in the case of occupiers. A tenement may be untenanted or unlet, or unoccupied, but a tenement can be without an owner. To put a case by way of illustration—imagine it does not occur in practice in such a marked way; but suppose you have twice as many owners as occupiers. If each class is to produce the same amount of money, you must impose upon the occupiers double the rate than you impose upon the owners. Now, that is prima facie unjust and inequitable. I do not lay out of view the consideration that the landlords of unlet tenements are more or less suffering, although it also is not to be forgotten that the fact that their premises are unlet may be entirely attributable to themselves—they may be with a view to their own profit. It may be with a view to the more pro-able use of their premises in the following year that their premises are unlet, or it may be owing to many other considerations. But the result of the view I have stated is what I have indicated. I quite follow the reasoning upon which our brethren of the First Division arrived at the conclusion that the money resolved to be raised by assessment must be divided into two halves, and one half raised from the owners, however numerous they may be, and the other half raised from the occupiers, however few they may be. I quite follow that reasoning, but I shrink from the result, and I should not be indisposed, if an opportunity occurs, to have that judgment reconsidered. The words here, however, are different. The assessment is to be imposed and levied on all lands and heritages,—that is to say, the amount required for carrying out the different provisions of the Act is to be raised by assessment on all lands and heritages. I do not think the amount is to be divided into two parts, and the one half imposed on owners and the other half on occupiers. The amount to be raised by assessment is the amount required for carrying out the provisions of the Act in the particular burgh or district—taking the illustration put in the question, the sum of £5000. But the amount to be raised is not the assessment; it is that for which the assessment requires to be imposed. The rate of assessment may be greatly more proportionately than the amount required to be raised. Indeed, it must be so, because in raising an assessment you have to take into account sums which must be given off by way of relief. You must take into account inability to pay, fraudulent evasions, and so on. And, as your Lordship has pointed out, one of the events to be thus contemplated is that premises will be unlet and that there will be no occupier. Using your judgment, you resolve what amount you will require to assess for in order to produce, after all the contingencies which I have mentioned are allowed for, the sum which is actually required. The assessment imposed and levied is therefore, I think, the sum imposed and levied on the individual tenements. Neither the sum which you have resolved upon as that which you require nor the sum for which you think it right to assess in order to raise what you require, is the assessment. It is what you impose and levy on each individual tenement. The assessment is not levied and imposed on a parish or burgh; it is levied and imposed on each individual property, and that is to be paid one half by the occupier and the other half by the owner. The owner can never be required to pay more than the half. If there is no occupier, then that half goes unpaid, but that, as I have said, is one of the contingencies which must be taken into account in determining the amount to be levied for in order to produce the sum required. The deficiency caused by want of occupation is made up by the owners and occupiers who pay, but the same rate per pound is payable by each individual according to the value of the tenement which he is owning or occupying. I therefore arrive—I confess without any reasonable difficulty except that which is suggested by the decision I have mentioned—at the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived, that the assessment imposed and levied on each tenement is to be divided into two equal parts, one part to be paid by the owner, and the other by the occupier, if there be an occupier.

Now, I should rather have thought that an answer to the other questions might have been avoided. The question as to the levying of assessment from the owner of unlet property in respect of the occupant's share seems to me to occasion no difficulty. Clause 86 of the Road Act authorises the whole assessment to be levied from the occupier if the Commissioners find it convenient,

No. 89. the occupier, where there is one, having his relief against the owner to the extent of the owner's share. I do not think, however, that the owner is bound in any case to pay the occupier's assessment, but the question as to his liability is, in my opinion, exhausted by what I have already said.

With respect to the exemptions on the ground of poverty, there is a most comprehensive power given to the assessing body to make those exemptions. By the Police Act they may exempt on the ground of poverty in any case. In the Road Act there is authority given to exempt on the ground of poverty where the rent is under £4. There is also authority given there to assess the whole assessment upon the owner in similar cases, i.e., in cases where the name of the tenant or occupier is not set forth in the Valuation-roll; and again, the Police Act directs owners to be assessed subject to deduction, where premises are let at a rent under £4. I should have thought, however, that the provisions in the Road Act were sufficient in themselves for all practical purposes, one half of the assessment being, as I have said, laid upon the owner, and the other half upon the occupier. If there is any permission to levy the whole upon the owner, leaving him to recover from the occupier, where that is found convenient, still there is an absolute power to remit the amount on the ground of poverty wherever the Commissioners see cause. I must say, however, that though these are my views, I would have preferred to let the other questions go unanswered, and to have given an answer only to that which is the really interesting question here.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the views which have been presented by your Lordship and by Lord Young. I rather think it will be well to answer all the questions, and as regards all the questions, the answers suggested by your Lordship are, I think, appropriate to the law of the case.

The only matter on which I have any difficulty in giving an affirmative answer is that which is suggested by the terms of the second question. What is there asked is this,—“Are occupiers within burgh entitled under the Roads and Bridges Act to the same exemptions as they were under the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act?” Now, the word “occupiers,” as here used, comprehends all occupiers whatever may be the size of the houses which they occupy, and whatever may be the rents paid for those houses, but the 87th section of the Police Act, which is the Act there referred to, provides that “the Commissioners shall assess the owners in place of the occupiers of all lands or premises let at a rent under £4, and levy such assessment from such owners, but the Commissioners shall allow to such owners a deduction from such assessment equal to one-fourth of the amount thereof.” Now, the General Police and Improvement Act did not impose an assessment on the lands and heritages, one half to be paid by the owners and one half by the occupiers. On the contrary, the occupiers, and the occupiers only, unless in exceptional circumstances, for which provision was made, were to pay the whole. The 87th section provides that where the rent was less than £4 the occupiers were not to pay at all. The landlord was there to come in their place, and the landlord was to pay the assessment which, if the rent had been more than £4, would have been paid by the occupier,—the landlord getting, in consideration for the fact that he was paying something not properly his own, an abatement of one-fourth of the sum paid. In terms that section is inapplicable to the arrangement made in the Roads and Bridges Act. But when we look at clause 86 of the Roads and Bridges Act I think practically the same result is obtained. No. 89.

 The Roads and Bridges Act provides that whatever the size of the house, and however small the rent paid may be, the occupier is to be put down as one of Feb. 3, 1887.
 the two parties by whom the assessment is to be borne, and the landlord is the Govan Police other. Now, the relief or exemption of the occupier cannot be procured in the Commissioners v. way provided for by the General Police and Improvement Act. For what we Armour. find at the close of section 86 of the Roads and Bridges Act is this,—“Provided that it shall be lawful for the local authority to relieve from assessment the occupiers of lands or heritages under the value of £4, as appearing on the Valuation-roll, on the ground of poverty.” Now, if this clause is to be read as obligatory on the Commissioners the same result ensues as would have ensued suppose the terms of this statute had been the same, for although the occupier is, in terms of the Roads and Bridges Act, to be put down as one of the parties on whom the assessment is to be levied, yet there is this power given to the Commissioners of making as complete exemption as that which was secured under the arrangement of the General Police Act. It is a discretionary power which is conferred on the Commissioners. If they see fit they may exempt parties from payment on the ground of poverty. They have to learn what the circumstances are, and act according to their discretion. That is a thing which seems to me quite clear. In the case of the other Act there was no option.
 Parties under a certain rent had a right to be exempted. It was incumbent on those having the administration of that Act to make the exemption. Now, the proviso in the Roads and Bridges Act, to which I have referred, seems to me to amount to pretty much the same thing. Reading it as matter of obligation, the Commissioners are bound to come to the same conclusion—the conclusion, namely, that as all under £4 rent were exempted by the General Police and Improvement Act, so the occupant of a house the rent of which is less than £4, as entered in the Valuation-roll, is entitled to exemption, which would put him in the same position. That seems to me to bring us to the same conclusion as your Lordship has suggested in the answer you have mentioned.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The only difficulty I have is with respect to the fifth question. I confess I do not see any sound distinction between the case under the Poor-Law Statute and this case. I think we are bound to follow that decision. At the same time I am not sorry that your Lordships have seen your way to reach a more equitable result.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the special case, answer the second question in the affirmative, and the third and fourth in the negative; as regards the fifth question, they are of opinion that in the circumstances stated the Commissioners are entitled to levy from the actual owners and occupiers severally liable such equal rate per pound as will produce the aggregate sum required for the purposes of the assessment: Find and declare accordingly, and find it unnecessary to answer the first question, and decern.”

JOHN M'INTYRE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Appellants).—M'Kechmie—Salvesen.

Lease—Partial destruction of subject by fire—Abatement—Retention of rent—Liquid and illiquid.—Held that a tenant is not bound to pay the full rent if, during possession, through no fault of his own, he loses the beneficial enjoyment of part of the subject let, and that his claim to abatement may be stated by way of defence to an action for payment of the full rent.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
M.

In January 1886 William Campbell Muir of Inistrynich, Argyllshire, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire against John M'Intyre and others, tenants of the farm of Hayfield, on the estate of Inistrynich, praying, inter alia, for payment of the sum of £25, 7s. 6d., being the balance of the half year's rent for the farm due at Martinmas 1885.

The pursuer averred that the rent of the farm was £300 per annum, and that the balance of £25, 7s. 6d. above mentioned still remained unpaid.

The defenders answered that "the subjects of let have been greatly diminished in value and materially reduced through a fire which took place upon 26th October 1885, whereby the entire range of office-houses at Hayfield, as well as the ploughman's house and the shepherd's house, were completely destroyed. The defenders have a just right to a deduction of more than the sum of £25, 7s. 6d. here claimed in respect of the reduced value, and they have formally given notice that, in respect of damnum fatale to the subject of lease, they now hold the contract as terminated."

The pursuer denied the statement, and averred further, that the fire was caused by carelessness on the part of the tenant.

The defenders further averred that they had used the farm mainly as a grazing farm, but that owing to the fire destroying their ingathered crops and the offices, they could no longer keep up their stock of cattle. They therefore maintained that they were entitled to terminate the lease as at Whitsunday 1886, and that they were entitled to a deduction from the rent for the current year in proportion to the diminished value of the subject of the lease. They offered to consign the £25, 7s. 6d. sued for in the hands of the Clerk of Court.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(2) The defenders being justly due and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £25, 7s. 6d., being the sum second concluded for, the pursuer is entitled to decree therefor, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded ;—(3) The defenders having been deprived to a material extent of the use of the subject contracted for, they are entitled to terminate the lease as at Whitsunday first, and they are also entitled to a deduction from the current year's rent of a larger amount than the arrears now sued for.

On 5th July the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) pronounced an interlocutor, in which he, inter alia, granted decree against the defenders for £25, 7s. 6d.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Irvine), who, on 28th September, dismissed the appeal, "reserving to the defenders any claim for abatement of rent which may be competent to them on the ground of their not having the full use of the premises, and decerns." *

* "NOTE.—(After a statement of the branches of the prayer)—The main question, therefore, arises on the second, which resolves into a plea of compensation or set-off for damage done by a fire, by which a portion of the farm buildings was destroyed. That claim, in the form in which it is pre-

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defenders ;—They did not deny that if the claim was one for compensation they would have to bring another action for the purpose of constituting it, but their plea was that part of the rent was not due, in respect they did not get the whole subject let to them. They were entitled to a reduction of rent, and the only question came to be what amount of reduction they were entitled to.¹ There was authority for the proposition that where a tenant did not get the whole subject let he need not constitute his claim in a separate action, but might keep back the rent at least to the extent to which he had suffered.² The case was distinguishable from that of Drybrough.³ There the claim was one of damages, because the landlord did not keep the subjects in repair, while here the whole rent was asked for a part of the subject.

Argued for the pursuer ;—He admitted that when possession was not given of an essential part of a subject let the tenant was entitled to plead that in answer to a claim for the full rent, but when something happened after possession had been given of the whole subject then the tenant must constitute his claim.⁴ The proper course for the tenants would have been to have given up the lease at once,⁴ and that they did not do. The tenants' claim was simply of the nature of a claim for damages.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The present appeal is brought for the purpose of reviewing that part of the Sheriff's interlocutor which decerns for the balance of the rent. The tenant resists the demand for this balance on the ground that in October 1885 a fire took place, which had the effect of destroying almost the whole accommodation on the farm for housing cattle and horses, and he explains that as the farm was stocked with a large quantity of Highland cattle of a particular breed he is left in a state of destitution as regards accommodation for his cattle, and has suffered very great loss through the fire. The landlord has resented, is disputed by the pursuer, and it appears to the Sheriff that it is so disputed on good grounds in law. Few legal principles are more clearly established than this, that a liquid demand for rent cannot be met by an illiquid claim for damages. It is only to 'debts de liquido ad liquidum instantly verified be writ or aith of the partie' that the old Scots Act, 1592, c. 141 (Act Parl. 1592, c. 61, vol. iii. p. 573), gives the benefit of being admitted by way of exception, nor can the maxim apply that 'things which can at once be rendered liquid are held as liquid,' for the existence, as well as the amount of the claim, is contested by the landlord—(See Drybrough v. Drybrough, May 21, 1874, 1 Bettie, 909). This and the kindred subject of retention of rent are treated of by Mr Hunter, L. & T., vol. i. p. 281, et seq.

"Of course it may be that the defenders have a claim for abatement, for not having the full use of the premises. As remarked by Lord Redesdale in Bayne v. Walker (1815), 3 Dow, 233,—'The justice of the matter amounts to no more than this, that the tenant should have an allowance equal to the diminution in the value of the subject by the loss of the house during the term.' But this loss must, in the opinion of the Sheriff, be constituted in the usual way."

not offered to reinstate the premises or to restore the steading, and the tenant in those circumstances maintains that he is entitled to an abatement on the half year's rent, which amounts to £150, and of which he has paid the whole except the sum of £25, 7s. 6d. The Sheriff says that that resolves itself into a plea of compensation, and as the amount of damages is illiquid and unascertained it is not competent to plead it in answer to a demand for rent.

Now, if I were of opinion that this demand was one for compensation I should agree in the conclusion to which the Sheriffs have come, but I do not think that this demand for abatement is of the nature of a claim for compensation; it is a plea that the rent to a certain extent is not due; and if that is the nature of the claim it furnishes a direct answer to the view of the Sheriff. The landlord cannot recover that part of the rent which is not due. The question, therefore, comes to be whether there is here ground for abatement, for I think that while the Sheriff has proceeded on the technical ground that the tenant cannot here plead compensation the landlord goes also on the ground that there is no abatement due, and says further that a claim for abatement is not the proper remedy, as the law does not recognise such a claim, but only gives the tenant a claim for damage. Now, if he is right, the claim of damages would certainly require to be constituted, and would not be pleadable in this action; but it is quite settled in law that an abatement is to be allowed if a tenant loses the beneficial enjoyment of any part of the subject let to him either through the fault of the landlord or through some unforeseen calamity which the tenant was not able to prevent. There are many examples of this in the books. One is the case of an urban tenement which was injured by the fall of an adjoining tenement, and there the landlord not having undertaken to reinstate the tenement an abatement of the rent was allowed. That is the case of Hamilton, 1667, M. 10,121. There is another case, Deans v. Abercromby in 1681, M. 10,122, where a tenement was occupied by different tenants, and belonged to different proprietors. The proprietor of the upper floor unroofed the tenement, and the tenant of the lower floor, who held of a different proprietor, claimed an abatement on the ground that his stock-in-trade (he was a vintner) had been injured during the execution of the repairs. He, too, was found entitled to an abatement of his rent. There are various other cases collected in the Dictionary, but at last we come down to the year 1778, when we have a very instructive record of a judgment of the Court,—“Although the tenant is allowed an abatement of rent where any part of the subject perishes by unforeseen accident, the Lords found that a tenant who had merely the use of a well was not on account of its failure entitled to any deduction.”—Factor on Sharp's subjects v. Lord Monboddo, M. 10,134. The judgment there was against the tenant, who claimed an abatement for the failure of a well, but the doctrine I have stated was there distinctly recognised.

In more recent times occurs the case of Yeaman v. Gilruth in 1792, Hume's Dec. 783. There an abatement was given because there had been a mistake between the parties as to the measurement of the subjects conveyed. Again, in the case of Brown v. Brown, Feb. 23, 1826, 4 S. 489, the landlord took a small portion of the farm he had let and gave it to the trustees of a road, who wanted it for the purpose of their trust. There, too, the form of the remedy given to the tenant was an abatement.

It is thus, I think, quite established that where, through no fault of his own, a tenant loses part of the subject let to him, he is entitled to an abatement of his rent,—that is to say, he ceases to be the debtor of his landlord to the extent to which he is entitled to an abatement. If that be so, it seems to follow as a matter of course that that right can be pleaded in answer to a demand for rent. Of course, if the damage done to the subject is so great that it entirely puts an end to the demand for rent, that is a good answer for the tenant to the landlord's demand for rent, and I do not see why it is not an equally good answer where only a portion of the subject is destroyed.

No. 90.

Muir v.
M'Intyre.

I am therefore sorry to say that with all my respect for the Sheriff of Argyleshire I am bound to differ from him here, and to hold, first, that there is a good claim for an abatement, and, secondly, that it is competent to plead that claim as a defence in this action. What is to be the amount of the abatement is a different question, but I think that out of a rent of £300 an abatement of £25 in the half year is hardly too much.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. The simple question we have to deal with is whether in the circumstances the tenant of this farm is now in a position to be called on to pay his full rent. It is admitted that with the exception of the dwelling-house all—or very nearly all—the buildings on the farm were destroyed by fire in October, and that through no fault of the tenant. I agree that according to law, and following many authorities, a tenant in such circumstances is entitled to an abatement of his rent. That is distinctly laid down in the cases your Lordship has referred to, and I therefore agree that the tenant here is entitled to some abatement of his rent; what that abatement is to be must be settled afterwards.

LORD SHAND.—If the tenant's claim could be regarded as one for damages I should agree with the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute that the claim could not be made in this action, but it is not a claim of that kind. It would, I think, be most inequitable if the landlord could exact his full rent from the tenant who has been deprived of a large part of the subject let to him through no fault of his own. The position of the landlord is that he can no longer continue to give possession of the whole subject which he agreed to let. The principle on which the tenant is entitled to an abatement is founded on the highest equity, and I know no ground for holding that that claim must be constituted in another action. That being so, and having regard to authority, I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the Sheriff's interlocutor should be recalled.

LORD ADAM.—The question is whether the tenants are entitled to an abatement of their rent. The Sheriff does not hold that they are not entitled to any abatement, for he reserves to the defenders any claims for abatement they may have on the ground of their not having full use of the premises. But he says,—"Few legal principles are more clearly established than this, that a liquid demand for rent cannot be met by an illiquid claim for damages." Now, I quite agree in that, but I may remark that there is no room for a demand for damages, for no wrong has been done by anyone, and the claim made is not of that nature. The claim here is a claim for abatement, and if it is clear that the tenant is entitled to an abatement, it follows that the claim of the landlord for rent is no more liquid than the claim of the tenant for abatement, for taking the claim as one for abatement, it is obvious that if abatement is due the whole rent is not due. What the Sheriff ought to have done was to ascertain what amount of abatement was due, and I think it was impossible for him to decern for the whole rent, and to allow the tenant to bring a separate action for his abatement.

That a tenant in the circumstances here is entitled to an abatement is quite settled by authority. I shall say no more on that subject than to refer to two cases not mentioned by your Lordship, viz., The York Building Company v. Adams, 1741, M. 10,127, where damage was done in some coal works by a hurricane, and it was found that the tenant was entitled to an abatement; and Campbell v. Watt, 1795, Hume, 788, where an abatement in the rent for an inn was granted because the landlord of the inn had set up another at a short distance. Looking at these cases, I have no hesitation in concurring.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor complained of, and remitted to the Sheriff to allow parties a proof of their respective averments.

Held that the action of reduction was incompetent under sec. 17 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867.*

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

ON 26th April 1886 Robert Pringle, butter merchant, Ireland, raised an action in the Debts Recovery Court at Glasgow against James Robertson senior and his son, James Robertson junior, concluding for payment of the sum of £12, 5s. 10d., being the amount of an account for goods alleged to have been sold by him to the defenders, or one or other of them, on the order of James Robertson junior, who kept a grocer's shop in Glasgow.

James Robertson junior did not enter appearance in the case, but James Robertson senior lodged defences, in which he denied liability on the ground that he had nothing to do with the business which his son carried on.

On 14th August 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the goods in the account sued for were supplied on the credit of the defender James Robertson: Finds that the other defender James Robertson junior acted simply as his father's manager in carrying on the shop for which the goods were supplied: Finds that the defender James Robertson junior has lodged no defences to this action; therefore finds them jointly and severally liable in the sum sued for."

In his note to this interlocutor the Sheriff-substitute narrated the procedure which had taken place as follows:—"Proof was led in the case at two diets, viz., 1st June and 14th June. At the first diet the father was not represented by an agent, but at the second he was. The proof was closed at the second diet, and avizandum made. The father's agent made no request to be allowed to lead more proof, but he asked for a continuation of the cause for the special purpose of considering whether he would raise an action of declarator in the Court of Session, in order to have the question of the father's liability determined in that Court. I continued the case upon two occasions for that special purpose, and at the last diet the agent appeared with six witnesses and proposed to examine them. I refused to allow the examination, because the proof had been closed on 14th June, avizandum had been made, and judgment would thereupon have been pronounced but for the special request of the agent to be allowed time to consider about raising an action of declarator." Robertson v. Pringle.

No application was made to the Sheriff-substitute that a note of the evidence led should be taken, and no such note was taken.

The defender James Robertson senior appealed to the Sheriff (Berry), who, on 25th October 1886, adhered.

On 20th November 1886 James Robertson senior raised an action in the Court of Session against, inter alios, James Robertson junior, and the trustee under a trust-deed he had granted for behoof of his creditors, and Robert Pringle (the pursuer in the Sheriff Court action), in which he concluded for declarator that the business formerly carried on by his son did not belong to the pursuer in any manner of way, but solely to his son for his own behoof, and for reduction of the decree of the Sheriff-substitute of date 14th August 1886, and of the Sheriff of date 25th October 1886.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 6) "At the first diet of proof the pursuer appeared on his own behalf. No request was made to the Sheriff to take notes of the evidence. The diet of proof was adjourned for further evidence for the defender Pringle. Mr Martin, solicitor, appeared for Robertson senior at the second diet of proof on 7th June 1886, when some evidence was led on behalf of the said Robert Pringle, defender. . . . After some evidence for the pursuer, the case was again continued till 14th June for further evidence for the said Robert Pringle. At this diet the Sheriff-substitute appears to have made a marking on the roll of cases, making avizandum. On said 14th June 1886 further evidence was led for the said Robert Pringle, and the case continued. Next day—15th June 1886—evidence was led for the said Robert Pringle, his agent having then produced certain letters alleged to have been written by him. Mr Martin thereupon moved the Sheriff-substitute that instead of proceeding with the evidence the case should be continued, with the view of enabling him to raise an action of declarator at the pursuer's instance in the Court of Session, for the purpose of determining the question of liability for the whole liabilities of the said business, and his Lordship granted the motion. The Sheriff-substitute at a subsequent diet suggested that Mr Martin should ascertain whether the other creditors of the said James Robertson junior had acceded to the trust-deed, and if so, he thought the pursuer might just allow the case to proceed. After consideration, Mr Martin being of opinion that he was able to rebut the evidence led for the said Robert Pringle, did not proceed with the proposed action of declarator, but asked the Sheriff to fix a diet for hearing the evidence. The Sheriff-substitute accordingly fixed the 9th of July, at three o'clock afternoon. Mr Martin and his client accordingly attended at the said diet with seven witnesses. The agent for the said Robert Pringle thereupon objected to any evidence being led for the defence, but the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the lateness of the hour, fixed a new diet for that purpose on the 27th July 1886. Mr Martin again attended with the witnesses for the present pursuer at the diet so fixed, but the agent for the said Robert Pringle pointed out to the Sheriff-substitute that he had made avizandum at a previous diet, whereupon his Lordship held that no evidence could then be led for the present pursuer, notwithstanding the fact that the Sheriff-substitute had specially fixed the diet for that purpose. The Sheriff-substitute then asked Mr Martin to debate the case for the pursuer, but this he declined to do. The Sheriff-substitute again made avizandum." (Cond. 8) "The procedure in said debts recovery action was grossly irregular, unjust, and illegal, in consequence of the Sheriff-substitute, after having made avizandum, allowing the pursuer (the present defender Robert Pringle) to lead further evidence, and thereafter refusing to allow the defender (the present pursuer) to lead evidence in defence. The pursuer was thus denied the justice he was entitled to, and was deprived of the opportunity of leading evidence to rebut that which had been led for the said Robert Pringle, and to prove (which he was quite prepared to do) that the business in question did not belong to him, and that he was not a partner therein with his said son. In these circumstances, the pursuer is entitled to have said judgment or decree of the Sheriff-substitute and said interlocutor or decree of the Sheriff reduced as craved."

The defender Mr Pringle pleaded, inter alia;—(2) This action is incompetent.

On 11th January 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences as defences against satisfying the production, reserving them quoad ultra: Assigns this day eight days as a term for satisfying the production, and grants warrant to and ordains the Sheriff-clerk of Lanarkshire at Glasgow to transmit the decrees and interlocutors pronounced in the debts recovery action libelled, with the summons, note of pleas, and numbers of procedure, or certified copies thereof."*

On 12th January the Lord Ordinary granted leave to reclaim.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was incompetent under section 17 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867. By that Act (sec. 10), it was not competent to appeal against a judgment of the Sheriff, so far as findings in fact pronounced by him were concerned, unless where either party had, "in the manner above provided (sec. 9), required the Sheriff to take a note of the evidence," and if that were not done "the said findings shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to review by any Court whatever." There was no such application made here, and therefore the condition precedent had not been carried out.¹ It was said that evidence had been here improperly rejected by the Sheriff-substitute, but he was entitled to reject any evidence he thought proper. Under the 17th section of the Act of 1867, reduction of such a decree as this was expressly forbidden. In that Act there was no section corresponding to section 31 of the Small Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41), where it was provided that a person aggrieved might appeal a judgment under that Act on the ground of wilful deviation in point of form on the part of the Sheriff, or if he have "prevented substantial justice" from being done. But even under that statute the Court had dismissed a reduction of a decree, on the ground that the appeal was to the Circuit Court, and that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction.² Even where a question of law could be brought

* "NOTE.—As the grounds of reduction alleged appear to be (at least in part) that the interlocutors and decrees challenged were pronounced by the Sheriff in disregard of the provisions of the statute, and not under the authority thereof, I think it necessary that the proceedings should be produced, and that the proper course is to pronounce an interlocutor, such as was pronounced in the first branch of the case of M'Millan v. The Free Church of Scotland (22 D. 290). It was suggested by me at the time the record was closed on these preliminary defences that the production might be satisfied under reservation, but the suggestion was not adopted."

under the Act of 1867 to the Court of Session the only way of doing so under the statute was by way of appeal. The case of *Murchie*¹ was not a case of a reduction of a decree granted by a Sheriff under the Small Debt Act, but the reduction of an extract decree in which the sum concerned for by the Sheriff had been altered by the Sheriff-clerk. It really did not fall under the statute at all.

Robertson v.

Argued for the pursuer;—This was not merely a case of irregularity in the procedure in the Sheriff Court, but was a denial of justice. In such a case the only remedy was reduction, and that course had been allowed in the case of Murchie.¹ That case was under the Small Debt Act, but the section as regarded exclusion of reduction was substantially the same in the two statutes. The Sheriff had done injustice by excluding evidence which was tendered (and according to the pursuer's statement timeously tendered), an act for which there was no authority in the statute. On that view of the case there was ground for saying that the judgment was not pronounced "under the authority of this Act" in terms of sec. 17 of the Act of 1867.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has repelled the defences against satisfying the production, reserving them quoad ultra. One of the defences is that "this action is incompetent," and I think that that defence ought to be disposed of before the production is satisfied, or before requiring the defender to take a day for doing so, for if the case is incompetent the defender is not bound to take any step at all towards doing so.

The question therefore comes to be, is the action incompetent on the ground that it is excluded by the 17th section of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, which provides that "No interlocutor, judgment, order, or decree, pronounced under the authority of this Act, shall be subject to reduction, advocacy, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of diligence, except as herein provided, on any ground whatever"? The exception referred to in that section of course refers to the mode of appealing against decrees pronounced under the authority of the Act and in the way provided by the foregoing sections. The course there provided has not been adopted by the pursuer in this case; on the contrary he has allowed his opportunity to go by without availing himself of it. What redress he might have got if he had brought an appeal in ordinary form, it is needless to inquire. It might perhaps have been limited by the fact that he did not require that the evidence taken before the Sheriff-substitute should be noted, for he might have found a difficulty in getting leave to lead fresh evidence, unless the Court had before it a note of what had already been led. That, however, is not the question here. The question is, can we say that this reduction is competent when the statute says that no reduction of a decree is to be allowed on any ground whatever? The words of the section I have read are quite as strong as those of the corresponding section of the Small Debt Act, 1 Vict. chap. 41, sec. 30, yet in various cases that section has been applied where the circumstances were stronger than they are here. The complaint here is that the Sheriff-substitute refused to allow the pursuer to examine witnesses, and the Sheriff on appeal adhered. Now, in the first case which occurred under the Small Debt Act, viz., Graham v. M'Kay (7 D. 515), the question arose under the strongest imaginable circumstances. The objection there was to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff—it was alleged that the defender was not subject to his jurisdiction at all. The Sheriff repelled that objection, and the Court of Session refused to inquire whether he had jurisdiction or not, because of the words of exclusion in the statute. Again, in the case of Lennon v. Tully (6 R. 1253) the allegation was that the execution of the summons had been illegal, and that the defender had no knowledge of the citation until the time had expired for appearing; yet there the Court held themselves bound to refuse a reduction because their jurisdiction was excluded by the Small Debt Act, 1837.

Now, if we apply that rule to the present case, there seems to me to be no doubt that the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong in refusing to sustain the plea of incompetency here. The Court is not entitled to look at this decree of the Sheriff, and consequently to require the defender to satisfy the production is most idle, for the production when satisfied could not be looked at. I think, therefore, that we ought to recall the interlocutor, sustain the plea of incompetency, and dismiss the action.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor complained against, sustained the defender's second plea in law, and dismissed the action.

Cardross Parochial Board.

WILLIAM S. PATERSON (Inspector of Poor of Cardross Parish), Defender (Reclaimers).—Jameson—Younger.

Poor—Assessment—Classification—Railway—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 36.—A classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates, under section 36 of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, in order to be legal, must be exhaustive.

In 1846 a parochial board, with the approval of the Board of Supervision, adopted a classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates into "(1) lands let for farming, (2) houses let as dwelling-houses and shops," the former being assessed at one-sixth of their value, the latter at their full value. At that date there were no railways in the parish, but a railway was constructed in 1850. It was assessed in Class II. at its full value, and continued to be so assessed without objection until 1886. Held, in a declarator at the instance of the railway company against the parochial board, (1) that while the Court had no jurisdiction to set aside a classification on the ground that it was inequitable, or to order a parochial board to adopt a new classification, it had jurisdiction to declare a classification to be invalid on the ground that it was not exhaustive of the lands and heritages in the parish; (2) that the classification in question was invalid on that ground, in respect that it did not, according to the ordinary meaning of its language, provide a place for railways, and was not shewn to have been approved by the Board of Supervision as implying anything else than its ordinary meaning; (3) that the pursuers were not barred by mora and acquiescence from having it declared that the classification was an invalid classification; and (4) that until a legal and valid classification had been adopted and approved, they were entitled to interdict against the parochial board levying from them as occupants higher rates than were imposed on any other occupant of lands and heritages in the parish.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that under the statute the power of the Board of Supervision in regard to classification is limited to the approving or disapproving of classifications proposed by parochial boards.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
I.

At a meeting of the Parochial Board of Cardross, on 21st May 1846, it was resolved that the assessment for the relief of the poor under the Poor-Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1845, should be imposed according to the first mode of assessment provided by section 34 of that Act, viz., one half upon owners and the other half upon tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages in the parish; and it was further resolved that as regarded the tenant's or occupant's half there should be a classification of the lands and heritages, under section 36 of the Act,* into "Class I., lands let for farming; Class II., houses let as dwelling-houses or shops," the assessment of the first class to be on one-sixth of the annual rents of the lands and houses let along with them; of the second class, on the full annual rent.

This classification was approved by the Board of Supervision on 29th May 1846.

There was at that date no railway in Cardross, and although the Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction Railway Company had, in November 1845, given parliamentary notice that application would be made to Parliament for power to make a railway through the parish, when the classification was adopted that company was not incorporated, and possessed no heritable property in the parish. Its line was opened about five years afterwards, and was afterwards extended under the authority of subsequent Acts of Parliament, and ultimately the undertaking was amalgamated with the North British Railway Company.

From the time of the construction of its line down to 1886, the railway company was assessed for its occupiers' rates under Class II. of the above classification—at the full value of its heritable property—but in March 1886 the company brought this action against the inspector of the parish, concluding for declarator "that the following classification of lands and heritages in the said parish, viz., 'Class I., lands let for farming; Class II., houses let as dwelling-houses or shops,' which was adopted by the parochial board of said parish, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, on or about the 29th May 1846, is not now a legal and valid classification under the 36th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, in respect it does not comprehend or include the whole lands and heritages in the said parish"; for declarator that "unless and until a legal and valid classification of the whole lands and heritages in the said parish, distinguishing the same into two or more separate classes according to the purposes for which they are used and occupied, has been adopted by the said parochial board, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, in accordance with the 36th section of the said Act, the said parochial board are not entitled to impose on the pursuers, or levy from them as tenants or occupants of lands and heritages within the said parish, any assessment at a higher rate than is imposed by the said parochial board for the same period on the tenants and occupants of any other lands and heritages within the said parish"; and for interdict against the parochial board levying such higher rate until a valid classification should have been adopted. There was also an alternative declaratory conclusion (which, looking to the way in which the case was decided, need not be farther referred to) to the effect that if the classification was legal the pursuers' property ought to be included in Class I.

The pursuers' contention was, that since the introduction of the railway

 In defence the parochial board pleaded;—2. The said classification having been made by the Parochial Board of Cardross, with concurrence of the Board of Supervision, in terms of the statute, and being a legal and valid classification, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. 4. The said classification falls to be interpreted by the practice following thereon, by the intention and understanding of all parties interested at the time it was made and approved as aforesaid, and by the construction put upon it by all parties interested, including the pursuers, since the date thereof down to the present time. 5. The said classification, interpreted as aforesaid, is a valid and legal classification, in respect that it proceeds upon the reasonable principle of separating all lands and heritages in the parish into two distinct classes—(1) lands let for farming, and (2) all other lands and heritages. 6. Said classification and mode of assessment having been in force in said parish since 1846, and the pursuers and their predecessors having been assessed in terms thereof without objection, they are barred by homologation, acquiescence, and mora from insisting in the present action.

A proof was allowed. The evidence disclosed the facts already narrated, in so far as they had been in dispute. It further appeared that at the date of the classification there were in the parish of Cardross a quarry, lime-works, a shipbuilding-yard, dye-works, chemical-works, and an iron-foundry. All these subjects were then assessed, like the railway, in class II, at their full value, and continued to be so assessed without objection. It also appeared that in consequence of the introduction of railways many parochial boards, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, altered the classification which they had previously adopted, and that in December 1868 the Board of Supervision issued the explanatory circular referred to by the Lord Ordinary, infra, p. 481, which, as regarded the principles of classification approved by the board, was to the same effect as the minute of the board quoted infra, p. 482.

On 1st July the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that there is no legal classification, as under the 36th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, now in force in the parish of Cardross, of the tenants or occupiers of lands and heritages liable to be assessed for poor-rates: Therefore finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons: Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges in terms of the conclusion to that effect, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses: Allows,” &c. *

* “OPINION.— . . . The classification of the parish of Cardross was professed to be made in virtue of the 36th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act. That classification is simply as follows:—‘Class I.—Lands let for farming; Class II.—Houses let as dwelling-houses or shops. The rate on Class I. to be at the rate of one-sixth of the annual rent of the lands and houses let along with it, and the rate on Class II. on the whole annual rent.’

“This classification was made in 1846, and was approved by the Board of Supervision, and has remained unaltered ever since, although attempts have been made to get it altered. The Board of Supervision approved of it at a time when that board had very little experience in regard to the matter of classification; and they would certainly not sanction at the present day a classification so inequitable as this. Their later practice was to classify lands and heritages into four classes—(1) dwelling-houses; (2) shops and manufactories; (3) railways, fishings, canals, and quarries; (4) agricultural subjects. The first of these classes paid at the full rate, the second at two-thirds, the third at one-half, and the fourth at one-fourth. Therefore dwelling-houses paying 1s. per £ of assessment, the second class would only pay 8d., the third 6d., and agricultural subjects only 3d.

"In 1846, when the classification for the parish of Cardross was approved, no railway went through the parish, and the omission of any mention in 1846 in the classification of railways is thus accounted for. It is made matter of admission by the parties that the Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction Railway Company had given parliamentary notice, in November 1845, that an application would be made to Parliament for power to make a railway through Cardross. But no such railway was in existence when the classification was made in 1846, and the railway company had at that time no heritable property in the parish. The adherence to the classification, and the refusal to take means to change it, now that a railway runs through the parish, are based upon considerations of pecuniary advantage, which can scarcely be called fair dealing.

"The assessment imposed upon the railway is upon the whole annual rent, and the company are brought in under Class II. Having got such a classification with reference to so wealthy a parishioner as the railway company, the parochial board are very unwilling to let go their hold. They know perfectly well that if they made any change upon the classification the Board of Supervision would not approve of a classification which made railways assessable at the same rate as dwelling-houses; and they know that the Board of Supervision has no initiative power in this matter, and cannot compel them to take action, so as to remedy a most inequitable classification. Nor can this Court do so. But this Court can declare whether or not there has been a classification within the meaning of the statute.

"The ground upon which I hold that there has been here no legal classification is this, that properties liable to assessment have not been classified—such as railways, fishings, quarries, limeworks, dyeworks, chemical works; and there are all such properties within the parish. An improper classification of this sort does not fulfil the purpose of the statute, and it was ultra vires of the Parochial Board to make it, and of the Board of Supervision to sanction it.

"The principles upon which classification ought to be made were very ill understood by the parochial boards; and hence, in the year 1868, Sir John McNeill, the chairman of the Board of Supervision, at the request of the legal members of the board (Mr Edward Gordon, Mr Schank Cook, and myself), drew out the instructive explanatory circular, of date 10th December 1868, which has been put in evidence, and which, in regard at least to the parish of Cardross, seems to have failed in its intended effect. It was laid upon the table of the Parochial Board, the inspector states, and there it lies still—a dead letter. Its advice, with the explanations which accompanied it, were more successful with other parochial boards, who had got illegal classifications sanctioned in the early days of the Board of Supervision, and who gave concurrence to modification and amendment. But, notwithstanding this, one of the reforms still needed (when there is an amendment of the Poor-Law Acts) will be the giving to the Board of Supervision the power of enforcing equitable classifications,—instead of the mere negative power of amendment and disapproval which they at present possess, and this only in the case where application is made to them by a parochial board. The individual ratepayer is helpless. His appeals to the Board of Supervision were answered, and must always be (until an Amendment Act be passed), in the same way: 'We have no power to help you.'

"The parochial board bring the railways under the head of 'Houses let as dwelling-houses or shops.' But this is to do inadmissible violence to the English language, and for which there is no justification whatever in the circumstances arguments having been mainly directed to the question whether the Board of Supervision could competently withdraw its concurrence to a classification which had become inapplicable, the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer, direct the process to be laid before the Board of Supervision, and request the board to inform the Court whether they continue to concur in the classification complained of as in their opinion just and equitable."

The hearing was then resumed.

Argued for the defender;—The classification here was an equitable and intelligible one. Its intention was to give partial exemption to farmers, and to assess everyone else at the full value of their properties. Whether equitable or not, it had been duly adopted and approved, and the Court had no jurisdiction to inquire into its equity. Further, it was a valid and legal classification. It was said not to be exhaustive, but though the natural meaning of its language might not cover the case of railways, of the case. A railway is neither a dwelling-house nor a shop. No doubt an arbitrary and non-natural meaning may be attached to a word; but if that be intended, there must be a clause de interpretatione verborum. It may be allowed to a man to use his own glossary, provided he furnishes the translation; or to write in a cipher, provided he furnishes the key to it. He may declare that by 'houses' he means 'railways,' and by 'lands let for farming' he means 'dyeworks.' But unless this be done by way of glossary, a Court of law must give to words the meaning which they commonly bear; and therefore the only conclusion I can come to is, that there is no existing legal classification in the parish of Cardross, and that, therefore, this case must be dealt with on the footing that none such exists.

"Now, the result of this must be, of course, that all property shall pay at the full rate, under deductions allowed by section 37 of the Poor-Law Act. Consequently, farmers must pay at the same rate as all other ratepayers—a result also very inequitable, but which is the consequence of the non-existence of a legal classification. But the imposing such liability on farmers will have the good effect of very speedily forcing the parochial board to adopt a classification more in accordance with justice than the existing one.

"I am unable to adopt the contention of the railway company (which is sought to be given effect to in the alternative conclusion of the summons), viz., that 'railways' come under the first class of 'Lands let for farming.' That contention is just as absurd and untenable as the contention of the parochial board, that they come under the second class of 'Houses let as dwelling-houses or shops.'"

* "The board beg very respectfully to state that they have been in use to regard the duty devolved on them by the Poor-Law Act, in the matter of assessments, as of a judicial character, and have not considered it consistent with their statutory duty to determine as to any classification submitted to them by a parochial board without affording to the parties, supporting or opposing the classification submitted, an opportunity of being heard thereon. They therefore regret that they are unable to give the Court a definite answer to the question put to them in the remit, as by doing so they might be held to have prejudged the question, if it were hereafter to be submitted to them in the manner contemplated by the statute.

"Subject to this explanation, the board have to state that they have been in the habit of approving of classifications as just and equitable in which railways have been placed in a class between houses and shops on the one hand, and agricultural lands on the other. But they have not adopted any inflexible rule to the effect that railways must always be so classed, and would consider it their duty to have regard to the whole circumstances of a parish in each particular case."

that language had received a conventional meaning through usage, which was a competent interpreter in such a case.¹ No. 92.

Argued for the pursuers ;—If the later practice of the Board of Supervision was to be taken as a test this classification was plainly inequitable, and, further, it was an illegal classification, because it was not exhaustive. The illegality was either ab initio (for dyeworks, &c. had equally no place in it) or supervening. In either case there had been a failure in statutory duty, and no amount of use could justify that. The action was competent, for though the Court could not compel a parochial board to adopt a new classification, they could declare an existing classification to be illegal.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Poor-Law Act was passed in 1845, and it seems that in 1846 the parochial board of Cardross had before them the question of classifying the lands and heritages in the parish under the 36th section of the Act, with the view of imposing a graduated scale of rates. Under the classification which they resolved upon they included, on the one hand, houses,—that is to say, houses let for dwelling-houses or shops,—and, on the other hand, land, by which they intended land devoted to agricultural purposes. They did not propose that their classification should comprehend any other branches. This classification was duly reported to the Board of Supervision, and I think we must read the interposition of the Board of Supervision as an assent to the classification so proposed. Since the year 1846 an important line of railway has been constructed through the parish, and the question which we have now to consider is, whether the classification which the parochial board have adopted does or does not apply to the rateability of that trading concern, for that is what it is. It is said on the part of the railway company that the classification does not and cannot apply to their line, in the first place, because the line did not exist at the time the classification was resolved upon ; and, in the second place, equitably, because it is said to lay upon the railway company an amount of burden entirely inequitable in itself, and which could not by possibility have been contemplated at the time the classification was made. Now, I do not think that there can be any dispute that the classification is of this inequitable character. The parochial board, however, had the remedy in their own hands, for they could have resolved upon another classification which would apply, and apply equitably, to the railway company, who occupy a large portion of land in the parish. The parochial board when applied to declined to take that course, and the Board of Supervision, who have a supereminent jurisdiction to give or refuse their assent to classifications which may be proposed by parochial boards, are of opinion that they are not entitled to take any initiative in this matter, and that their control over parochial boards is on this point limited to that power of giving or refusing their assent to classifications, which the statute confers on them. On the whole I am inclined to think that the Board of Supervision are right in taking that view of their functions. We, however, asked the board what their opinion was on such a question as we have here to consider, and they apparently indicate that if a proposal were made to them to classify the subjects in this parish now they would be inclined to rate the railway in a class midway between houses and agricultural lands.

No. 92. I am clearly of opinion that this is not a classification which is applicable to this railway. It has no place for railways, and I think it is the plain duty of the parochial board to revise the classification, and to adjust it on a more equitable scale. I cannot see that there is any difficulty in coming to this result, because the classification at the time when it was adopted could not apply to railways, as there were none then in the parish, although it may have been suited to the other subjects in their existing condition. Therefore, without going further into the matter, I am for affirming the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The parochial board may find their own way out of the difficulty. They may revise the classification, and get the concurrence of the Board of Supervision to the revised one.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Cardross Parochial Board.

LORD YOUNG.—The question which the Lord Ordinary has decided by the interlocutor reclaimed against is, whether or not the classification of lands and heritages in this parish adopted on 29th May 1846 is a legal classification under the statute. The Lord Ordinary has found that it is not, and I think rightly. He is of opinion, and I agree with him and with your Lordship, that a classification in order to be good under the statute must be exhaustive. That, indeed, was admitted at the bar. It must be such as to include the whole lands in respect of the occupation of which the statutory assessment is imposed. It cannot be partial, and must be comprehensive, and so comprehensive as to be exhaustive. Now, the Lord Ordinary's decree imports no more than the assumption that a classification of the lands and heritages in this parish into, first, lands let for farming, and, secondly, houses let as dwelling-houses, is not an exhaustive classification. I think that is a sound assumption. I do not think it applies to railways, or to anything except lands let for farming, or houses let for dwelling-houses or shops. These are the words used in the statutory determination and direction of the Board of Supervision, or rather in the determination and direction of the parochial board which they submitted to the Board of Supervision in 1846 for approval, and they are the words of which the Board of Supervision then approved. The only ground on which it is sought to defend the classification as rightly made, so as to comprehend railways and be exhaustive of all other lands and heritages in the parish, is by reading the words "houses let for shops or dwellings" as comprehending railways, shootings, quarries—everything, in short, except land let for agricultural purposes. Now, I cannot so read these words, and with respect to the board having hitherto been in use to impose assessments on the occupiers of shootings, quarries, fishings, and the like, without any objection being made, I can only attribute that to the ease with which taxes are levied, and the willingness of people to submit rather than raise questions. If the question were raised, whether shootings, quarries, or fishings are either lands let for farming or houses let for dwelling-houses or shops, I cannot imagine that there would be any doubt about the answer, any more than about the answer to the question which we have here, whether railways are houses let for dwelling-houses or shops. I cannot say that I have any difficulty about the usage. It is not a usage between contracting parties, shewing what they meant by the contract. It is a usage between a taxing body and persons submitting to the imposition of the tax. That is not a sort of usage which would incline me to attribute to language a meaning so foreign to its ordinary meaning as that for which the parochial board here contend. But I do not need to go into that. The classification must be approved of by the Board of Supervision, but they had only the language of the classification, not the usage, before them to approve of, and I must hold that their approval was limited to the ordinary and proper meaning of the words of the classification of which they expressed their approval.

I am therefore of opinion that this classification is bad, and must be declared to be so, as the Lord Ordinary has done. The result no doubt is that there will be no classification at all in the parish, and that all lands and heritages will be assessed on their full value alike. That has not been found in practice to be desirable, because it has not been found to be equitable. I do not for a moment doubt therefore that the parochial board will set about making a new classification which will be exhaustive, and that they will name railways and the other subjects with a view to separate rating. That will be placed before the Board of Supervision for their approval; until that is done there is no classification, and the equal rating must continue, but after these two authorities have approved of a classification which is exhaustive of the subjects in the parish, this Court has nothing to do with the equity of it.

HAMILTON WATER-WORKS COMMISSIONERS, Respondents.

No. 93.

Feb. 22, 1887.
Allan v.
Hamilton
Water-Works
Commissioners.

Revenue—Income-tax—Burgh water-works.—The Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners, by local Act, were empowered (1) to charge a “domestic water-rate on all premises within the town which were supplied with water; (2) to levy a “public water-rate” upon all premises within the town whether supplied with water or not; and (3) to sell water for other than domestic uses at such rates as should be agreed upon. The Commissioners annually made up a tariff of charges for supply under this head. It was further provided that the supply for domestic use should not be held to include a supply “for railway purposes or for public baths, or for public establishments.”

The barracks, which were within burgh, did not pay the domestic rate, but paid for water supplied to them according to measurement at the tariff rate. Held (following The Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Miller, 13 R. 489), that the payment thus derived was profit, and liable to assessment for income-tax under schedule D,—dis. Lord Shand, who held that the barracks were entitled to be supplied at the domestic rate, and that the fact of the other method of supply and payment having been adopted in lieu thereof did not alter the character of the payment so as to make it liable to assessment as profit.

THE HAMILTON WATER-WORKS COMMISSIONERS were empowered by 1st Division. M. the Hamilton Water-Works Act, 1854, to supply the town of Hamilton with water, and to impose (sec. 31) a rate not exceeding sixpence in the pound, known as the “domestic water-rate,” upon the annual value of the premises supplied with water; and (sec. 42) a rate, called “the public water-rate,” not exceeding sixpence in the pound, “upon all dwelling-houses and parts of dwelling-houses occupied as separate dwellings, and buildings used as dwelling-houses, inns, hotels, and taverns, and all shops, warehouses, offices, manufactories, and other

No. 93. premises used for trade, manufacture, or business, situated within the limits of this Act, including the office-houses, yards, and pertinents of the same.”
 Feb. 22, 1887. Allan v. Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners.

By sec. 33 it was provided that the supply of water for domestic use “shall not be held to include a supply of water for railway purposes or for public baths, or for public establishments,” and by sec. 34 that “it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to supply any corporation, or company, or person with water for other than domestic use at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon.” Such supplies were given and charged according to a tariff and scale made up yearly and published by the Commissioners. Among other rates in the tariff or scale published by the Water Commissioners for the year to Whitsunday 1885, was a charge of £1, 15s. for each hundred thousand gallons of water supplied to persons who were charged with the public water-rate, and a charge of £3, 10s. for the like quantity of water where the person supplied was not charged with that rate. In these cases, where payment was made according to the quantity of water supplied, the domestic rate was not levied.

Hamilton Barracks, belonging to the Crown, were within the burgh boundaries, and were supplied with water, the quantity being measured by meter, and charged for at the tariff-scale of £3, 10s. per every 100,000 gallons consumed. The amount paid for the year to May 1885 was £396.

The Water Commissioners were charged with income-tax on a surplus revenue of £567 (in which was included this sum of £396), as the amount of profit arising from the supply of water by meter and agreement.

The Water Commissioners appealed to the Income-Tax Commissioners against this assessment on £567, and contended that it ought to be reduced by the amount of surplus revenue accruing from the above mentioned payment of £396 for water supplied to the barracks. They maintained that the payment being in lieu of both the “public water-rate” and the “domestic rate,” should be treated as if it had been actually levied in the form of rates.

They argued that such a payment did not fall under the principle laid down in the case of the Glasgow Water Commissioners, Jan. 22, 1886, 13 R. 489, which was that if the proprietors of a water supply undertaking went beyond their statutory obligations and sold the water, the profits derived from such sale were chargeable to income-tax. This was not the case of the supply to Hamilton Barracks. They were under an obligation to give a supply, the barracks being situated within the limits of the Hamilton Water-Works Act.

The Surveyor of Taxes maintained that the case of the supply to Hamilton Barracks was clearly ruled by the principle laid down in the Glasgow case. He argued that while the Glasgow Water Commissioners were strictly within their statutory obligations in supplying water to the suburbs and other places “within the limits of the Act,” the whole revenue, except that derived from “compulsory rates” levied within the municipal boundaries, was held to be revenue from which profits might accrue. This revenue included non-compulsory rates levied beyond the municipal boundaries, and all trade charges and charges for meter supplies, as well within as without the municipality.

The Income-Tax Commissioners were of opinion that the decision of the Court in the case cited by the Surveyor did not apply, as the sum of £396 really represented the statutory rates; and they accordingly reduced the assessment.

The Surveyor of Taxes took a case for the opinion of the Court of No. 93. Exchequer.

The Hamilton Commissioners were not represented at the hearing.

Allan v.
Hamilton
Water-Works
Commissioners.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me impossible to distinguish this case from the second branch of the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works case. We have an Act of Parliament authorising the Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners to supply the town with water, and there are two rates which they are entitled to levy according to the nature of the premises charged with the rate. The first is a rate of 6d. a-pound, which is called the domestic water-rate, and the second is a rate called the public water-rate, which is levied upon all premises within the town, whether they are supplied with water or not. As regards the public rate, it has no bearing upon the present question. The domestic rate is a rate charged upon the annual value of premises which are supplied with water, and the occupier or owner of the premises is by section 31 "to request the Commissioners to supply him with water," and if he makes such request, then he is entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic use, and the Commissioners are bound to give that supply at the fixed rate of 6d. per pound upon the annual value of the premises. But then it is enacted by section 33 of the statute that "the supply of water for domestic use shall not be held to include a supply of water for railway purposes, or for public baths, or for public establishments, or for cattle, or for horses, or washing carriages when such horses or carriages are kept for hire or by a dealer, or for any trade, manufacture, or business whatsoever." And section 34 provides that "it shall be lawful to the Commissioners to supply any corporation or company or person with water for other than domestic use, at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the Commissioners and the corporation or company or person desirous of having such supply of water, and the rates so agreed upon shall be recoverable in the same manner as any other rates under this Act."

Now, although the payment that is to be made for this supply of water under section 34 is called a rate, that is rather an unfortunate term to use, because the section confounds the payment with the annual rates or the payments upon annual value which receive effect in the domestic rate. The thing which is called a rate is really the price of water sold, because the payment is levied according to the quantity of water received and used.

Now, that being so, the question in the present case is whether the water supplied to the barracks at Hamilton is properly charged for under the 33d and 34th sections, and so forms a source of profit within the meaning of the case which I have just referred to. It is quite possible that if the barracks had made an application under section 31 to have a domestic supply they might have been entitled to have it. I cannot tell. That question is not before us, but it is very possible, I think, that the barracks may properly be held to be a public establishment within the meaning of section 33. Be that as it may, however,—whether they would be entitled under the statute to a domestic supply, or whether under section 33 they are excluded from demanding a domestic supply,—the state of the fact is that as between the barracks, or the public authorities representing the barracks, and the Water-Works Commissioners, the existing arrangement is that the barracks buy the water under sections 33 and 34, and do not pay a domestic rate. Now, in that state of the facts, we must take it that that is the proper mode of charging, and if

No. 93. that be so, then the principle of the Glasgow Water-Works case is directly applicable, and must be applied in this case; and therefore I am of opinion
 Feb. 22, 1887. that the Commissioners are wrong, and that their judgment ought to be Allan v. reversed.
 Hamilton
 Water-Works Commissioners.

LORD SHAND.—I regret that we have not had the benefit of an argument from the respondents in this case, for, I confess, I have very considerable difficulty about it. I understand your Lordships are agreed in the view which your Lordship has now expressed, and accordingly, my opinion is of little moment, but the difficulty I have lies here. The distinction between the Glasgow case and the present is this, that in the Glasgow case it was clear that all the water sold, which was said to be the subject of profit made, was water given to persons who clearly were not entitled to it as for domestic purposes. They were all in trade, and it was for the purposes of trade that they were entitled to make arrangements to get water and did get it. In this case it is not supplied for purposes of trade. Section 33 of the Hamilton Water-Works Act provides that the supply of water for domestic use “shall not be held to include a supply of water for railway purposes, or for public baths, or for public establishments, or for cattle, or for horses, or washing carriages, when such horses or carriages are kept for hire or by a dealer, or for any trade, manufacture, or business whatever.” That, I take it, is meant to fulfil the same purpose as the clause of the Glasgow Act,—it is meant to provide that water is not to be given for trade purposes or uses under the head of domestic use. And accordingly, if this had been a case where parties were not entitled to water for domestic uses, as the Glasgow case was, I should have been clear with your Lordship that the judgment of the Commissioners should be reversed, but it is because I am not satisfied of that that I have a different opinion. I think the barracks are just as much entitled to water for domestic use as any large establishment or house where a great many people reside. And accordingly the view which the Commissioners have taken is this: They say that having considered the question, they “were of opinion that the decision of the Court in the case cited by the surveyor did not apply, as the above-mentioned sum of £396 really represented the statutory rates,”—that is to say, as I understand it, the payment represented an alternative way in which the barracks paid for the water, which they were entitled to get under the domestic rate, but which they wished to take and arrange to pay for in another way.

It is quite true that as matter of fact the water is paid for by meter, but that does not satisfy me that the Commissioners are making profit by the sale of it. If the barracks were entitled to get their water supplied under the domestic rate, then they are simply taking this alternative mode of reaching the sum they have to pay for the water so taken, and in that case I am not satisfied that the Commissioners are really making profit by it.

Accordingly, upon that distinction between the two cases, I do not feel able to concur with your Lordships in reversing the decision, but it is better that it should be decided now, and having stated the ground of my difference of opinion, I have nothing further to add.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and do not share Lord Shand's doubts. It appears to me that the only case we have to deal with is the case of the Hamilton Barracks, which in point of fact are supplied, and pay for the water by meter. It is said that the Crown, or whoever represents the Hamilton Barracks, may be entitled to have water for domestic use under an earlier clause of the statute, and that if they so obtained it they would not be liable. How that may be I cannot in the least tell. Whether the barracks would or would not be entitled to make a demand on the Commissioners to be supplied with water as they are now, and to be assessed only at the domestic rate, I have not the least notion. That is not the question before us, for we know in point of fact that they are not so supplied. On the contrary, they are supplied under a different section, which says that the supply of water for domestic use "shall not be held to include a supply of water for railway purposes, or for public baths, or for public establishments," and that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to supply any corporation or company or person with water for other than domestic use at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon. Now, the representatives of Hamilton Barracks have agreed with the Water-Works Commissioners that they shall be supplied with water on certain terms and conditions. It follows that it was entirely optional on the part of the barracks whether they would take it on such terms and conditions or not. If they were not satisfied with the terms and conditions, they need not have taken the water. Therefore it is not compulsory, but it is entirely a voluntary contract between the two parties. In other words, the fact simply appears to me to be that the Water Commissioners are selling water to the Hamilton Barracks at certain rates and on certain conditions. It humbly appears to me that the circumstances are exactly the same as we had to deal with in the Glasgow case. I cannot assume on the facts stated here, that the Hamilton Barracks would have a right to get the water at the domestic rate, and treat the case upon that footing. I assume that they know their right, and that if they had that right they would have exercised it. But they have not done so. They have entered into an entirely voluntary agreement with the Commissioners to buy water from them at certain specified rates. That is the only case we have to deal with; and it is no hardship on the Hamilton Barracks to take it in this way, for this reason, that they may use the water not only for domestic purposes, but for public and general purposes without paying any more for domestic use, because they are not charged for domestic use. The price they pay covers that.

That being so, I think this is purely the case of a sale of water by the Water Commissioners to the Hamilton Barracks on the terms agreed on between them, and the case therefore distinctly falls, in my view, under the Glasgow case.

LORD MURRAY was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT accordingly reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and sustained the assessment.

Partnership—Joint adventure—Constitution of contract.—Correspondence which was held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) not to constitute a contract of joint adventure, in respect it contained no termini habiles for determining the duration of the contract or its essential conditions.

Partnership—Joint adventure—Ish of contract.—Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that a contract of joint adventure, unless there be something special in its nature, is terminable at the will of either party, if that be exercised in good faith and at a seasonable time.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

W. J. YOUNG, on 3d March 1886, took out a patent for "improvements in commodes or closets for indoor use." Not having any capital, he entered into negotiations with Andrew Dougans, an ironmonger in Glasgow, with a view to having his patent worked. These gentlemen during 1885-6 had many meetings on the subject, and a long correspondence took place between them. Models of the closet were made and fitted up, various small alterations were introduced into the original design, and specimens were exhibited at the Edinburgh International Exhibition under the name of Young's Patent.

In April 1886 Mr Dougans declined to assist the patentee farther in promoting the sale of his closet, and upon that, on 14th July 1886, the patentee brought an action against Dougans for damages for breach of contract, concluding for £100. The contract which he said had been broken was thus described by him,—“In or about the month of July 1885 the pursuer and defender entered upon a joint adventure for obtaining the said patent and for working the same under the name of ‘Young's Patent Earth Closet Company,’ and it was arranged that the defender should provide the capital necessary for the proper conduct of the business, as an equivalent on his side for the value of the pursuer's invention. The profits of the undertaking were to be divided equally.”

He further averred that the defender now repudiated his obligations in connection with the joint adventure, and refused to fulfil his part, and to furnish any funds for carrying on the said joint adventure.

The defender denied that there had been any contract of joint adventure. He stated,—(Stat. 3) “About the beginning of July 1885, negotiations were opened by the pursuer for a sale of his patent to the defender, or for a joint adventure between them for working the patent, the capital to be supplied by the defender. No concluded agreement, however, was ever come to, and no term of endurance for the joint adventure was ever mentioned. Pending the negotiations for a joint adventure, various experiments were made with a view of perfecting the commode and reducing the expense of manufacture, which had been found largely to exceed the limit indicated by the defender,” viz., £2. “. . . . The result of the experiments was to shew, both to the defender and the said David Dougans, that the commode was unsaleable through defective construction, and that it could not, in any case, be made in oak, so as to allow of its being sold at a price of 40s. . . . In these circumstances, the defender, about the middle of April 1886, resolved not to proceed any further with the matter, and he at once intimated his decision to the pursuer.” (Stat. 4) “The experiments for the manufacture of the commodes, as above stated, were made with the view of ascertaining whether the pursuer's patent would satisfy the conditions upon which alone the defender believed it could be made a success. The defender does not admit liability for the expense of said experiments, but he is, and has all along been, willing to bear the whole expense incurred by the pursuer pending the said negotiations in connection with said experiments and the exhibition of the said commodore, so far as sanctioned by the defender. The defender has in point of fact paid the greater portion of that expense already."

Young v.
Dougans.

The defender pleaded;—(3) There being no concluded contract of joint adventure between the parties, the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (4) Separatim, No term of endurance having been specified, the alleged partnership was terminable at will, and the defender was therefore entitled to withdraw from the same.

A proof was taken. The chief evidence was in the correspondence of the parties. On 7th July 1885 Young wrote to Dougans,—“On considering your alternate proposals about the working of my commode, permit me to put the following questions:—

“A joint venture—what does it mean? Will it be necessary to value my patent? If so, how much value do you put upon it? It has lost me money, and as you are willing to join me in putting it into the market, it is worth something. Then please explain what position I will occupy in carrying out this proposal? Will my time be required? If so, when, and on what terms? If time not required, then how am I to be satisfied as to profits and working expense?

“Are Bennet & Co. to be manufacturers? If so, on what terms?

“Are A. Dougans & Sons to be sole agents, and on what terms?

“Under what name is our joint adventure to be placed?

“Is this adventure to be for the United Kingdom and Ireland, or only for Scotland? If for the United Kingdom, then who is to be agents and manufacturer?

“These questions being answered, I will be in a better position to decide which of the two ways I will prefer.”

Dougans replied,—“1. Joint venture means fair division of profits.

“2. Value of patent—my undertaking to provide capital for proper conduct of business would be equivalent.

“3. How much value? Same as above.

“4. Position in carrying out proposal of joint venture—have no fixed idea on this. Have you any?

“5. Your time required—not necessary after getting a fair start.

“6. As to profits, how known—books of the company will shew this.

“7. Are B. & Company to make all—certainly not, if a cheaper can be had.

“8. Are A. D. & Sons to be sole agents—not agents if to be partners in joint venture.

“9. Name carried on under—Young’s Patent Earth Closet Company, or—

“10. If for U. K. or—certainly appoint agents or advertise.”

On 6th August 1885 Young wrote to Dougans:—“Dear Sir,—I am willing to go on with you in a joint venture with my commode on the terms you name, viz.,—You to provide all funds for the proper conduct of the business to enable us to execute orders, print circulars, advertise, exhibit, appoint agents throughout the United Kingdom and Ireland, and otherwise bring the article prominently before the public, all of which is to be held as equivalent to my patent. Profits to be equally divided between us. The name of company to be ‘Young’s Patent Dry Closet Company.’ A set of books to be kept for the company.

“Commodore at first to be contracted for.

“My position, I think, should be bookkeeper and manager under your surveillance.”

On 8th August Young wrote again:—“Considering the stage of our negotiations, also of my finances, I think it proper to let you know that I am urgently in need of £100.

Young v.
Dougans.

"This has arisen partly from my being ill the whole of last summer, and partly from business not paying, and possibly from my being too much taken up with this patent and outlays connected therewith. Will you give me your name for this sum on the security of my share of the patent? I hope that you will see your way to do so, as I want to get clear of a few troublesome accounts before joining you in this adventure. As I said yesterday, if you deal generously with me now, I am willing to put the whole patent on the same terms."

Dougans replied on the 10th :—"Your favour of 8th inst. to hand. In reply I cannot agree to your request."

"I will be willing to carry out all I have promised to do in putting your commode before the trade, and provide funds, &c., for doing so, but I would not be warranted in its present stage complying with yours now replied to."

On 20th February 1886 Young wrote :—"I have been expecting a letter from you every day this last week, saying whether you are now satisfied with the commode and patent. Surely we are losing time, especially in view of the Exhibition. Your immediate attention will oblige."

On 23d February he wrote again :—"You must now appoint agents, and advertise, or write me your mind on what I will do in this way. We must now make commodores for sale as well as Exhibition. I am ready to give my whole time to this matter at a reasonable salary for a year, and will be glad to assist you otherwise, if you can make me of service. . . . P.S.—Name my salary for the first year, as you know I cannot work for nothing."

On 2d March Dougans replied :—"Your letters were duly received and considered. I have no fault to find with your desire to have the commode brought before the public, but I differ with you as to how it is to be done. It certainly cannot be by making them in dozens with no apparent present outlet. . . . Only thing to make at present is samples for Edinburgh, and they could be put in hands at once. As for employing you on salary, that does not appear at present advisable, because there is nothing actually to attend to. Were you to secure orders in Greenock, where you are personally known, that would be a start, and would probably lay the basis of what you desire."

After a long correspondence Dougans wrote on 10th April 1886 :—"As to your arrangements for either going or being with them during the Exhibition, I fear that must be left for yourself to decide, as my time now will be so fully occupied by my own business that I will not be able to separate myself from it. Since my son's leaving I have had fully two months' constant travelling, and if I have learned anything when out it is this, that if my connection is to be profitably maintained I must give it my personal attention."

"When you first named your closets to me both my sons were with me, and I had the desire then to push it in the form so often talked over with you; but this secession of those who could have wrought it under my direction has so completely changed my personal position that I am compelled to say it is quite out of my power to take further active steps in promoting their sale."

"I dare say from former letters you are prepared for this decision, one, I can assure you, very reluctantly come to. I trust, therefore, that you will be able to arrange with a more suitable party, one who could devote his whole time and means to pushing what I still think a decided want in Scotland."

The Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 17th December 1886, pronounced this interlocutor :—"Finds that the defender, in the month of August 1885, entered into a joint adventure with the pursuer, whereby, in consideration of his obtaining an equal share in a private 'commode,' upon a plan designed by the pursuer, the defender agreed to join him in putting the said 'commode' before the trade, and to provide funds, &c., for doing so: Finds that the defender wrongfully failed to implement his part of said agreement of joint adventure, and on 18th April 1886, wrongfully and in breach of said agreement, withdrew from the same, to the loss and damage of the pursuer: Assesses the damage at the sum of £100 sterling, for which sum decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons." *

Young v.
Dougana.

* "OPINION.—1. I think it proved by the correspondence (brought to a point in the pursuer's letter of 6th August 1885), and by the proceedings which followed, that the defender agreed to enter into a joint adventure with the pursuer with regard to a 'commode' upon a plan designed by him, and for which he obtained acceptance of a provisional specification; and it appears to me that the terms of the adventure are sufficiently and satisfactorily explained. The defender's letter of 10th August 1885 contains an acknowledgment that he had promised to join the pursuer in putting the 'commode' before the trade, and to provide funds, &c., for doing so. His subsequent actings confirm this view, and in my opinion the defender's attempt now to represent this agreement as having been subject to conditions which were not fulfilled is not supported by the evidence. He had sufficient opportunities of considering these matters before he agreed to join the pursuer in the adventure. His letters shew that to the end he professed to consider the 'commode' a 'good thing,' deserving of success; and that he broke off from the pursuer, not on account of any failure on the pursuer's part to fulfil his part of the agreement, but on account of want of time to attend to the matter. Even in his letter of 10th April 1886, the defender speaks of the pursuer's 'commode' as being 'a decided want in Scotland.'

"The defender may, no doubt, be able to shew that he had a sufficient ground for putting an end to the joint adventure. That is a separate question. But he was not entitled to keep the pursuer bound to him from August 1885 to April 1886, and then to break off merely because it did not suit his convenience to go on. I think that there was a concluded agreement, by which he acquired right to an equal share of the pursuer's patent, and became bound to join the pursuer in working it, at least to the extent of giving it a fair trial in the market.

"2. As to the alleged breach of agreement, there is no question that, by the letter of 10th April, the defender announced his resolution not to go on. The question is, whether his breaking off at that time was wrongful, or was done under circumstances which entitled him to put an end to the joint adventure? It is not doubtful that circumstances may arise in the course of carrying on a joint adventure which justify one of the adventurers in refusing to go farther. In the case of Miller v. Walker (3 R. 242), which was cited by the pursuer's counsel, the rule was stated by the Lord President as follows:—'The general rule is that one of two joint adventurers is entitled to put an end to the joint adventure if it comes to be attended with greater risk than when the contract was entered into, or if there be no reasonable belief that profit will be made for either party.' In applying that rule to the present case, it is necessary to keep in view that, though the agreement was for no definite period of time, it was for a definite purpose, and contemplated a reasonable endeavour on the part of the defender, jointly with the pursuer, to place the article in the market.

"I am of opinion that at the time when he broke off the defender had not made a sufficient endeavour to fulfil his part of the agreement, and that nothing had occurred to justify him in putting an end to the adventure. He knew all along that the pursuer had not the means himself of pushing his invention, or even of presenting it in the market. He acknowledges, in the letter by which he announced his withdrawal, that the article was what he called 'a decided want in Scotland.' He had frequently been applied to by the pursuer to arrange and carry out some course of action; and the correspondence, particularly after

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—In the first place, there were no such termini habiles in the letters relied upon as to constitute a contract upon which a decree for specific implement could follow, and if there was no contract capable of specific implement there could be no foundation for a claim of damages for breach.¹ “A contract which cannot be enforced by specific implement, in so far as regards its form and substance, is no contract at all, and cannot form the ground of an action of damages.”² The defender might be liable for any loss incurred by the pursuer by way of outlay, as in the Melville Monument case,³ but he was not liable in damages for breach. But, in the second place, even if there was a contract, there was no term of endurance provided; yet there must be some term, for the defender was not to go on ad infinitum spending money in advertisements and experiments. The contract was either bad for want of a term, as had been held,⁴ or it was a partnership-at-will and dissoluble when either party pleased, provided always there was good faith.⁵ A joint adventure was merely a limited partnership,⁶ there was no distinction between them as regarded this matter of dissolution. In the case of Miller,⁷ relied on by the Lord Ordinary, there was a guarantee which implied an obligation to work for a period of years. The case of *Reade v. Bentley*⁸ was not contradictory of the doctrine of a partnership dissoluble at will, but merely affirmed that there must be nothing unfair in the selection of the time for dissolution.

The pursuer argued;—This was a joint adventure, and not a partnership; if it had been the latter, it would have been bad for want of a term. The endurance of the former was to be regulated by the nature of the work to be done under the contract, and could not be thrown over unless it became more risky or burdensome than it had been at first.⁷ Where the purpose of the contract was fixed the Court might settle what the term should be, and there was some indication in the correspondence that the term was to be a year. But here the defender had not fulfilled his obligation of bringing the article into the market.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—After giving the evidence careful consideration, I am confirmed in my impression that there was no concluded contract between the parties. But it may quite well be that, though there was no contract for a joint adventure, the defender was willing to bear the expense of experimenting with the machine to determine what its value was likely to be, and this he has very frankly undertaken to bear. There is certainly no formal contract, but no doubt a contract may be spelt out of letters and constituted in that way, but I find nothing in the terms of the letters or in the circumstances under which they were written to warrant me in saying that any contract was so constituted. Two important matters were never settled, viz., the cost of the machine and the precise nature of the mechanism.

December 1885, affords proof of the defender's dilatory conduct and his unwillingness (notwithstanding inquiries about the article) to concur in the expense necessary to put the article before the trade. . . .

It is said that on 6th August a letter was written by the pursuer, which is said in point of fact to have constituted the contract. But that letter does not profess to constitute a contract; it is an offer, and an offer made after certain preliminary negotiations have taken place. Its terms are important. They are,—“Dear Sir,—I am willing to go on with you in a joint venture with my commode on the terms you name.” Then he specifies the terms, and adds,—“My position, I think, should be bookkeeper and manager under your surveillance.”

In that last sentence he refers to certain scroll replies which Mr Dougans had made in answer to questions by Mr Young. These queries and replies illustrate what I have been saying. Mr Young asks,—“Then please explain what position I will occupy in carrying out this proposal? Will my time be required? If so, when and on what terms? If time not required, then how am I to be satisfied as to profits and working expense?” The answer is,—“Position in carrying out proposal of joint venture—have no fixed idea on this. Have you any?” There is certainly no contract there. There is a mere statement that the pursuer is willing to go on “on the terms you name.” There is an incomplete contract, part of the tentative negotiations in which parties were engaged, and which might result in constituting a contract, but on which parties had come to no agreement on certain essentials of the contract. In the next letter, dated 8th August 1885, also from Mr Young, he asks the defender for £100 as a loan on the security “of my share of the patent.” He says,—“I hope that you will see your way to do so, as I want to get clear of a few troublesome accounts before joining you in this adventure.” When he got an answer on the 10th August it was to the effect,—“I decline to give you an advance.” The defender no doubt says,—“I will be willing to carry out all I have promised to do in putting your commode before the trade, and provide funds, &c., for doing so,” but that is not an answer to the letter of 6th August.

I do not go further into the case. The defender seems to have been willing to bear all the preliminary expenses in a friendly spirit, but it is one thing to make a contract for an indefinite partnership, and quite another to bear the liability for the expense of initiatory proceedings.

I think, then, that there was no contract of joint adventure, but even if it were otherwise, I think that when one man contributes an invention, and another all the expense, the contract could not endure longer than the pleasure of both parties; either of them should have the power of determining it. That is consistent with the Roman law on the subject (Dig. xvii. 2, 1, and 4, 1), and Pothier lays it down distinctly that any one of the partners can dissolve the partnership by giving notice to his partners if the renunciation is made in good faith, and is not made at an unseasonable time—(Pothier on Partnership, Tudor's translation, p. 109). On these two considerations, good faith and good time, the whole law hangs. It is quite true that something may hinge on the nature of the joint adventure. But there is nothing of the kind here; in the

(His Lordship then intimated his opinion that the pursuer was entitled to a sum of £40, in respect of outlays made by him in developing his invention.)

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree. The Lord Ordinary has held that there was proof of a contract, where I think no contract has been proved. It is remarkable that no consistent case is presented as to the period when the contract was entered into. On the record he says July 1885, but he refers to no writing, and one would therefore infer that when the record was closed his view was that the contract depended for its constitution on verbal communings between the parties. But that is not the view which he now takes, he rather stands on the letters of 6th and 10th August. But these letters do not constitute a contract, and their very terms shew how unsettled the matter was in the opinion of all concerned. The price of the articles is not mentioned, parties had not made up their minds how the business is to be carried on, or whether the articles were to be made by the partners or bought by them from others, and it was not known then what they could be got for in the market. A contract is said to be entered into without either party knowing the conditions of the contract or their prospects of success!

I look upon these letters as more an "instrument of negotiation," and in using that expression I use the words of Lord Selborne in the case of Fowler v. Mackenzie (April 17, 1874, 11 S. L. R. 485). These letters are no more contracts than many letters which go before, and a number which came after them. I need only refer to one, dated 20th February 1886. That which is said in that letter is this,—“I have been expecting a letter from you every day this last week, saying whether you are now satisfied with the commode and patent. Surely we are losing time, especially in view of the Exhibition. Your immediate attention will oblige.” That letter is asking him to make up his mind, not to enter upon the work. He is to make up his mind whether there is to be an agreement or not between the parties, and therefore it is that I say that these are rather letters written in the course of negotiation, and not in any sense a contract. That they may contain words of obligation is nothing, for that element was present in the case to which I have referred, where nevertheless Lord Selborne described the document as “an instrument of negotiation.”

In contracts like this it is of the greatest importance that there should be a term for the purpose of protecting both parties, and for determining how far they are to conduct experiments, and how far they are to go in pushing the invention. On that ground, also, I think these letters cannot be described as a contract on the ground stated by Mr Bell in his Commentaries (ii. 523).

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It seems to me that the pursuer has failed in every view of the case. He has brought an action for the purpose of recovering damages for breach of contract. The contract on which he founds is a contract of joint adventure, and the alleged breach is that the defender in April 1886 wrongously withdrew from that joint adventure.

Now, of course, all liabilities incurred so long as the defender remained a member of the joint adventure he is still liable for, but as debts, not as damages. It follows that it is impossible for us to take into account the liabilities incurred during the subsistence of the joint adventure in an action for damages.

But I do not see on the evidence that the pursuer has sustained any damage. No. 94.
 If I were to affirm that there was a contract, and that the defender was in breach of it, I do not see how I could affirm that he has sustained anything but nominal damages. Feb. 23, 1887.
 Young v. Dougana.

But I agree with your Lordships in thinking that there was no contract made for a joint adventure; there was nothing more than an agreement by the defender to pay such expenses as to enable parties to determine whether this invention was an article which they might afterwards join in manufacturing.

On both of these grounds I think that the pursuer is not entitled to decree at all, but the defender has acted very well in saying that the action may be used for determining the liability of the defender for certain outlays, but I am not disposed to agree that so much is due on that head as your Lordship proposes.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, ordained the defender to make payment of £40 to the pursuer (by way of recouping him for outlays for experiments, &c.), and quoad ultra assolized the defender.

Proof—Evidence Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict. c. 27), secs. 3, 4—Recalling witness.—Opinions that it is incompetent to recall a witness to be examined as to statements alleged to have been made by him since he was examined as a witness in contradiction of the evidence he then gave.

 against his wife, a servant, Christina Fairbairn, who had lived with Mrs. Lord Fraser.
 Begg, was examined as a witness for the pursuer. She was examined on 15th July 1886. After the pursuer had closed his proof, and most of the defender's proof had been led, the proof was adjourned and was resumed on the 16th October. Before the close of the defender's proof the following motions were made to the Lord Ordinary, as noted in the notes of evidence:—"Counsel for defender moved the Lord Ordinary to be allowed to recall the witness Christina Fairbairn in order to prove through her that she stated to her sister, Mrs Margaret Fairbairn or Whitson, with whom she was living at the time at Dunbar, on the evening of the day on which she gave evidence, that her evidence against Mrs Begg was false, that she knew nothing whatever against Mrs Begg, and that the charges against her were not true; also that three or four weeks thereafter, at 14 Pipe Street, Portobello, in the house of Mrs Mary Clark or Fairbairn, she made a similar statement to Mrs Fairbairn, her aunt." The Lord Ordinary refused the motion. "Counsel for defender moved the Lord Ordinary to recall the same witness, Christina Fairbairn, to prove a statement made by her to Mrs Mary Clark or Fairbairn before giving evidence, and the second day after being examined by Alexander Macdonald (a detective employed for Dr Begg), to the effect that she knew nothing against Mrs Begg, and that false charges were being got up against her; and also that she repeated the same statement to Mrs Fairbairn or Whitson a day or two before her examination in the cause. Counsel stated that he Begg v. Begg.

The Lord Ordinary having given decree of divorce, the defender reclaimed against his judgment, and renewed her motions, citing the cases of *Hoey*¹ and Robertson,² and referring to the Evidence Act of 1852.*

The pursuer opposed the motion, and argued that if such a motion were to be granted it was impossible to see where it was to stop; there would be no end to the recall of witnesses to qualify their evidence.

The Court heard the case on the merits, and in delivering their opinions upon the merits remarked upon the motions that had been made as follows:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the Lord Ordinary took the right course. With regard to the statements made by the witness after her examination, I must say I know of no precedent for her recall.

With regard to the statements made by her before her examination, if there is a distinct and specific averment of them, I think her recall would probably be competent under the provisions of the Evidence Act. But the allegations here are not sufficiently specific as regards the precise words said to have been used, or as regards the time and place of their use. As regards the time, we have no doubt the words "a day or two before her examination in the cause," but then the motion is lacking in detail of place and of the words said to have been spoken, and I am unwilling, three months after her evidence was originally taken, to open up her evidence on so meagre a statement.

I have thought it right to indicate my opinion on this question, as it was fully argued before us, although it is not necessary for the decision of the case. But, like the Lord Ordinary, I find in the evidence a basis for my opinion, which is in favour of the pursuer, without any reference to Christina Fairbairn's evidence.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After intimating that he would lay Christina Fairbairn's evidence aside)—It is obvious that there is a very material distinction requiring to be taken between these two motions. The first refers to things said by Christina after her examination as a witness. I think—although, dealing with the case as I am doing, it is not necessary to indicate an opinion—that the matter of that motion is not covered by the statute. It refers to matters occurring after the examination was closed, and I do not think that matters of this kind can be introduced under the cover of that section. The idea that under the provisions of that section you can bring back a witness to speak to things which occurred after her examination is an idea that cannot be entertained.

Sec. 4.—"It shall be competent to the presiding Judge or other person before whom any trial or proof shall proceed, on the motion of either party, to permit any witness who shall have been examined in the course of such trial or proof to be recalled."

I am disposed, however, to hold a different opinion as to the second motion, No. 95.
 although, if judgment had to be given allowing Christina to be recalled, a more precise specification might well have been required. I say no more, and it was Feb. 25, 1887.
 not necessary that I should have said so much. Begg v. Begg.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—There is a motion before us on the part of the defender to recall the witness Christina Fairbairn for further examination, and that motion may be taken as divided into two parts. The first is that she should be examined as to statements made by her before she was examined as a witness; the second is that she should be examined as to statements made by her after she was examined.

The motion, as I understand it, is made under the Evidence Act of 1852. I am clearly of opinion that that Act gives no warrant whatever for the second part of the motion, that part which refers to the statements made after her examination. The purpose of the Act was, shortly stated, to enlarge the subject-matter of cross-examination, but that could not possibly be held to apply to statements made after examination. These are outwith the Act altogether. If a motion is made to recall a witness to unsay what she had already said, that is a different matter, and as to it I give no opinion.

As to the other motion, it stands in quite a different position, and I think it is sufficiently detailed to allow us to grant it; if it is necessary to give an opinion upon it, I am of opinion that the defender is entitled to recall the witness for that purpose. That being my opinion, the only condition on which I can consent to dispose of the case as it stands is that Christina Fairbairn's evidence should be laid aside altogether. I do lay it aside.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

On the evidence, apart from that of Christina Fairbairn, all their Lordships were of opinion that the pursuer's case was proved, and they therefore adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

line through striking his head against the arch of a bridge that crossed the railway. The accident had happened as he was leaning over the side of his engine to see if the brakes, which were old-fashioned brakes, were working.

The averments as to fault were as follows:—(Cond. 4) "The death of the said Andrew M'Ghie was caused by the fault of the defenders in having the said bridge dangerously and unusually narrow. Had it been of the ordinary width the accident would not have happened. Further, the defenders were to blame in not warning their servants, and among others the said Andrew M'Ghie, of the undue and unusual narrowness of the said bridge. It was quite easy for them to have given such warning, and since the accident they have in fact done so. By their rules it is provided that engine-drivers before commencing their day's work must ascertain from the notices posted for their guidance if there be anything requiring their special attention on those parts of the line over which they have to work. Had a notice of the dangerous condition of the said bridge been posted as indicated in the said rule, it would have been seen by the said Andrew M'Ghie, and the accident would have been avoided." There was no averment as to the length of time the driver had been in the service of the company, or as to his knowledge of this part of the line. (Cond. 5) "The bridge before mentioned is about twenty-two feet two inches wide, and the space between the outside rail of the line on which the deceased's engine was running and the stone-work of the bridge is three feet and one-half of an inch, but, after deduction of the space which the engine overlaps the rails, there is barely two feet between the engine and the stone-work of the bridge. The bridge in question is thus to the extent of over four inches too narrow for the limits of safety, as defined in the Schedule of Important Requirements, issued as a memorandum by the Board of Trade in December 1885 (being six months previous to the accident), and which is herewith produced and referred to. It is believed and averred that the said bridge was one of the earliest constructed railway bridges in Scotland. It was constructed for a single mineral line wrought by horses, and is wholly unsuitable and dangerously narrow for a double line of railway worked by steam, which the line in question for many years past has been. It is averred that the bridge is greatly narrower than any other in the United Kingdom used for a double line of railway."

The pursuers appealed for jury trial. The defenders objected to any issue being allowed, on the ground that there was no relevant averment of fault. The bridge was an old bridge, and therefore well known to all the company's servants. All danger could have been avoided by a little care, and the danger could not be said to exist for a careful man, since, on the pursuers' own averment, four inches additional width was all that could possibly have been required. The requirements of the Board of Trade had reference only to new lines; that body had no jurisdiction to revise existing works.

Argued for the pursuers;—The requirements of the Board of Trade were a very good index of what was reasonably safe. This bridge was not only old-fashioned, but had been built for a tramway, not for a railway at all.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is nothing like a relevant case here. The bridge may be narrow and dangerous, but the driver who met his death under it was well acquainted with it. He projected his head further than was safe, but I can find no relevant allegation of fault on the part of the company. They were not bound to pull down the bridge and build it anew.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

Miller's Trustees.

Process—Petition—Competency of presenting petition to the Inner-House.—

A petition by beneficiaries under a trust-deed for advances out of the trust-funds rested alternatively upon the nobile officium of the Court and the provisions of the Trusts Act, 1867, is competently presented in the Inner-House.

Trust—Nobile officium—Advances out of income directed to be accumulated.

—Circumstances in which the Court authorised advances to be made out of the income of trust-funds directed to be accumulated, being of opinion that it was highly expedient, if not necessary, for the maintenance and education of the beneficiaries that such advances should be made.

A trustor in his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to accumulate the income of certain funds for behoof of the children of a married daughter till they should reach majority, and pay over to each as they reached majority their share of the capital and accumulations. In the event of the children's father dying before all or any of the children, then, but only in that event, the trustees were empowered to pay to the mother, or to lay out at their own discretion, such part of the income as they might consider right in the maintenance and education of the children.

The trustor, in his daughter's marriage-contract, had provided her in the income of a sum of £10,000, the capital of which she had power to appoint among her children. The whole income of the daughter and her husband was £380 per annum. They had three children, whose shares, including accumulations, of the fund directed to be accumulated, were estimated at upwards of £5000 each. They had also a contingent right in a sum of about £8000 provided to an aunt, their right being under the same restrictions as those attaching to the funds directed to be accumulated. The children, a boy and two girls, aged twelve, six, and five, with their father, presented a petition to the Court, asking the Court to sanction the payment of £90, £60, and £50 per annum out of the income to them respectively. The trustees stated that in their opinion it was desirable the authority should be granted. The boy had been nominated as a naval cadet, and it was impossible for him to provide an outfit for himself and meet the necessary expenses without obtaining an advance. One of the other children was extremely delicate, having had an attack of infantile paralysis, while the youngest was also delicate, requiring much attention. This the mother was unable to give, as she had become nearly blind. The Court granted the petition.

THE late John Miller of Leithen, C.E., by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to hold and administer a certain heritable property and a sum of £2500, the total value of the subject to be held being £4000, for the children of his daughter, Mrs Jessie Webster, wife of John Webster, Esq., who might be alive at his death, equally among them, with power to them to sell the heritable property at their own discretion.

He also directed his trustees, "with the exception under-mentioned, yearly to receive and accumulate and invest for behoof of the said children respectively the annual income, interest or proceeds of their shares of the said freehold property and sum above mentioned, and on the said children respectively attaining majority, to pay and make over to them respectively not only their equal shares of the said freehold property and of the said principal sum above mentioned, but also any income, interest, or proceeds that may have been accumulated in respect of their said shares, and in the event of any of the said children surviving me but predeceasing majority the share of such predeceasing child shall accresce and belong to his or her surviving brothers and sisters equally among them; but I hereby declare, notwithstanding what is above written, that in the event of the said John Webster predeceasing me, or on his death if he shall survive me but predecease the majority of all or any of the said children, then my trustees shall have power to pay to the said Jessie Miller or Webster, or in the event of the death of the said Jessie Miller or Webster, whether before or after the death of the said John Webster, to lay out at their own discretion, for behoof of the said children respectively, the whole or such part or portion as they may think right of the income, interest, or proceeds of the shares of the said children, for the education, maintenance, and upbringing of the said children respectively, aye and until they respectively attain majority, but that always only after the death of the said John Webster."

Mr Miller also directed his trustees to hold a fourth of the value of the plate, books, &c., and a fourth of the residue of his estate for the same children, in the same way, and under the same conditions.

By Mrs Webster's marriage-contract Mr Miller had bound himself to provide, and did provide, a sum of £10,000 to trustees for the liferent use of Mrs Webster, to be paid to her children on her death in such shares as she should appoint. Mr and Mrs Webster's children also took a contingent interest in a sum of about £8000 provided to their aunt, Miss Isabella Miller, by her father's settlement, but under the same restrictions as the sum directly provided to them.

Mr and Mrs Webster had a son, John Alexander, born in November 1874, a daughter, Mary, born in December 1880, and a daughter, Isobel, born in November 1881.

These three children and their father presented a petition to the Court craving the Court to authorise, direct, and appoint the trustees to pay over to the father for behoof of the children so much of the free annual income and produce of the estate provided for the children by Mr Miller as the Court might think sufficient for their proper maintenance and education, or alternatively, to grant authority to pay out of the capital of the fund under the 7th section of the Trusts Act of 1867 a sum of £90 per annum for the son, £60 for Mary, and £50 for Isobel.

In support of the petition they stated that the whole income of Mr and Mrs Webster from every source was £380 per annum; that their son John had been nominated to a naval cadetship; that the outfit for a cadet costs £40, the charge for board, &c. on a training-ship £70 per annum, while books, &c., exclusive of travelling expenses, would cost £20 per annum. Mr Webster's income, it was stated, was insufficient to meet these charges, and therefore unless advances could be made to him this opportunity might be lost.

Mary, the elder daughter, was, it was stated, extremely delicate, and required constantly expensive medical treatment and attendance. The youngest daughter was delicate in the chest.

Mrs Webster's eyesight, which had been failing for some years, was now almost entirely lost. She could not therefore herself give all the attention to her children that they needed. The education of the two younger children, it was pointed out, would now require to be provided for.

The trustees lodged answers, in which they stated,—“The trustees agree with the petitioners as to the reasonableness of the amounts of the proposed annual payments to the children, and they are further of opinion that it would be greatly for the benefit of the children themselves that the proposed payments should be made. Having regard, however, to the terms of the trust-deed, they are advised that they cannot make the proposed annual payments except under the authority of the Court; and in the interest of the beneficiaries they respectfully submit that it is desirable that such authority should be granted." Webster v.

Miller's Trustees.

An application had been presented in December 1883 by the children of another daughter, Mrs Thomson, in somewhat similar circumstances. The trustees opposed the application there, and it was refused. See the report of it of date 22d December 1883, 11 R. 401.*

At the hearing a question was raised by the Court as to the competency of presenting such a petition to the Inner-House.

The petitioners argued;—The petition came competently before the Inner-House, for it was in the main an application to the nobile officium of the Court,¹ and if it had been presented, for the sake of its second alternative, in the Outer-House, the Lord Ordinary could not have dealt with the first alternative. On the merits, counsel, after stating the facts, and pointing out the high expediency, if not the necessity, of granting the application, had referred to the case of Latta,² when the Court intimated that they were satisfied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am inclined to think that this is a reasonable proposal, and that there is nothing to prevent us from exercising the power which we possess. As to the matter of competency, I see nothing to hinder us from dealing with the petition.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree. The former case, as it was represented to us, was a case entirely dependent on the circumstances there presented. It is not the same case as the present, and, indeed, I am far from saying that, if Mr Thomson's children were coming back to us now, their application might not, in the light of all that we now know, be granted.*

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Authorise, direct, and appoint" the trustees "to pay over to the petitioner John Webster, as administrator-in-law, and for behoof of the petitioners," his children, "out of the free annual income and produce of the sums of money and shares of residue provided to them by the said John Miller in his trust-disposition and settlement, the following sums of money, viz.:—(1) The sum of £90 sterling for behoof of the said John Alexander Webster, . . . continuing the said payment for the period of four years; (2) the sum of £60 for behoof of the said Mary Elise Webster, . . . continuing the said payment for the period of five years; and (3) the sum of £50 for behoof of the said Isobel Kennedy Webster, continuing the said payment for the period of six years," &c.

Process—Judicial sale—Storage of goods pending litigation.—Where a trustee on a sequestrated estate incurred expense in storing goods till it should be ascertained whether they belonged to the bankrupt estate, held, on its being found that they did not belong to it, that the owner was not bound to repay to the trustee the cost of storage, as the latter should have applied for a warrant to sell them.

M.

JOHN INGRAM WILSON, baker in Aberdeen, was sequestrated on 5th January 1884. Wilson's business and stock and plant had formerly belonged to William Alexander Fraser, Wilson being his foreman. Certain creditors who had supplied furnishings for a new bakery, and a tenement of dwelling-houses in course of erection by Wilson, alleged that the transference of the business and stock and plant to Wilson was merely simulate, and that Fraser was truly the owner of the business and stock and plant, and that the dwelling-houses also were being erected as a building speculation really by him, though in name of Wilson as feuar from him. In an action raised by an assignee of these creditors, in November 1884, against Fraser and the trustee on Wilson's sequestrated estate for payment of the sums due by them, decree was given in absence, and in a suspension raised in January 1885 by Fraser, who alleged that he was not the principal in the transactions, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 14th July 1885, repelled the reasons of suspension, finding that Fraser had given the orders as to the buildings, and that the goods had been supplied on his credit. This judgment became final.

Alexander Stronach junior, who had been appointed trustee on Wilson's estate on 31st January 1885, had been sisted some time thereafter as a party to the suspension. At Whitsunday 1885 (while the suspension was pending in the Court of Session) Stronach had removed the articles in question, which were lying partly in the unfinished buildings and partly in the outhouses of the bakery (the possession of which required to be given up at that time), to premises which he took for the purpose of storage at a rent of £7 per month.

In January 1886 Wilson's trustee raised an action of declarator in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against John Macqueen Barr, accountant, Glasgow, the trustee on the estate of Fraser, who was sequestrated in November 1885, to have it declared that the articles furnished as above mentioned were his exclusive property.

In June 1886, while this action, which had been carried by appeal to the Court of Session, was still in dependence, Wilson's trustee presented a note to the Court craving warrant to sell these articles, and to consign the proceeds. Warrant was granted and the goods sold, the nett proceeds of the sale being £262, 12s. 10d.

On 17th December 1886 the Court held that it had been decided in the suspension that the goods belonged to Fraser, and sustained the plea of res judicata stated for the defender, Fraser's trustee, assoilzied him from the conclusions of the action, and granted warrant to him to uplift the consigned money. The question was subsequently raised whether the pursuer was entitled to the storage rent he had paid for the goods from Whitsunday 1885 to the date of sale. The defender now presented a note to the Court praying for warrant to uplift the whole of the consigned sum.

Wilson's trustee maintained that the articles required to be removed at Whitsunday 1885 for the purposes of preservation, as they could not be left with safety in the unfinished tenement, and his right of possession of the bakery terminated at that term, and that he was then in a position of great difficulty, as Fraser, who was not sequestrated for seven months thereafter, repudiated all right to the goods, though his trustee had now taken a different view. That he had acted in perfect bona fides, and had been obliged to pay out of his own pocket the sum ordered to be consigned.

Wilson's Trust-tee v. Fraser's Trustee.

The defender argued that it had been conclusively settled that he was entitled to the property of the articles, and that the expense of storage must be borne by the party who had incurred it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The goods in question were sold in the course of the process before us in June of last year, and it has now been determined conclusively that the proper owner is Barr, the trustee for Fraser. The consequence is that he has applied for payment to him of the consigned price of the goods, subject to deduction of expenses. Mr Stronach contends that besides the expenses of the sale he is entitled to deduct a sum of £115, 10s. 10d., being the amount of storage rent, and the expense of removal of the articles from the premises into which they had been delivered by the tradesmen who furnished them, amounting in all to the sum I have mentioned. That is rather an unusual kind of deduction to claim from the price of goods realised by judicial sale. The only proper deduction is the expense of the sale. The way in which Mr Stronach proposes to justify this deduction is by saying that he found himself in great difficulty at Whitsunday 1885, and had no alternative but to remove these goods from the premises formerly belonging to Wilson, and to store them at a high rent. I am not disposed to impugn severely Mr Stronach's bona fides, but it is necessary to see the position in which he was placed in order to see whether he had any justification. He was trustee for the creditors of Wilson, and represented the creditors, and was maintaining their interest. He was quite aware that there was doubt, to say the least, as to who was properly the party who had ordered the goods, and on whose credit they had been furnished. He knew quite well that it was alleged, and not improbable, that the arrangement between Fraser and Wilson was a fraudulent proceeding altogether, and that Fraser was the true owner of the goods furnished. He had at least this amount of knowledge, that there was great doubt to whom the goods belonged. He had it in his power, from there being a pending litigation at that time, to apply for a judicial sale of these goods. If he was confident that the goods belonged to Wilson I cannot understand the course that he took. Surely if he was confident of that the proper course was to sell and realise the goods and divide the money among the creditors. If, on the other hand, he saw that there was a very serious dispute, surely nothing but judicial sale could be a discreet course in the circumstances. But of all things to do, to store goods of the kind and bulk of these goods for an indefinite period was the most indiscreet and expensive course that could have been followed. We have it stated in the answers that the materials were very bulky and numerous, and he says that the premises which he took at £4 per month were 86 feet long and 30 feet broad. He says,—“These premises are built of stone and slated, and are thoroughly water-tight, and all the ironmongery and other perishable goods were stored in them. When the goods were being removed it was found that the said space was not sufficient. There was a large quantity of flooring, and the respondent was obliged to lease from Messrs Garvie a covered shed in the

No. 98. same place, but entering from Rose Street, at a rent of £3 a month. Both places were required." So that he undertook to pay £7 per month for the storage of these goods for an indefinite period to abide some result, and that was the result of what promised to be a tedious and expensive litigation just then beginning, and which turned out just what was expected. I cannot see any justification at all for the course Mr Stronach took in these circumstances. I think it was the worst possible course. Whoever was to be found in the end entitled, surely it was most inexpedient to heap up the expense of rent to such an extent as is now before us. He could not expect the case to last a short period. Accordingly, the result of Mr Stronach's action was that the goods realised £262, 12s. 10d., and the amount of storage rent is £115, 10s. 10d. I do not think that the person who is found in the end entitled to the price of these goods is bound to submit to that deduction. I think Mr Stronach's course was a clear one, to apply for judicial warrant and have the goods sold.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

No. 99. HUGH MAFFETT, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure.
 ARCHIBALD STEWART, Defender (Appellant).—Jameson—C. S. Dickson.
 Mar. 4, 1887. Maffett v. Stewart.

Agent and Principal—Stockbroker—Contract for differences.—A stockbroker, in carrying over at the settlement £10,000 "Trunk Thirds" stock bought for a client, sent his client a continuation-note in these terms :—"I have continued for you as under. Sold 10,000 Trunk 3rds at £50, bought at £50, 3s. 3d. com. in a/c." In reality the broker had not bought that amount of stock at the price stated, but had bought a much larger quantity in different parcels and at different prices. These he lumped together and divided among those of his clients who had given him orders for Trunk Thirds, charging as the price the average of the different prices. This average price was that stated in the above continuation-note, and it corresponded to none of the individual prices. In an action by the stockbroker against the client for payment of the differences on a series of such transactions, held by a majority of seven Judges (viz., Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Craighill, Shand, and Adam, diss. Lords Mure, Young, and Rutherford Clark), that in so purchasing the stock the pursuer was to be regarded as having bought it on his own account, and not as agent for the defender, and that the defender having employed the pursuer merely as a broker was not responsible, no special custom of trade in regard to brokers on the Stock Exchange having been averred or proved.

2D DIVISION. IN October 1884 Hugh Maffett, a stockbroker in Glasgow, but not a member of the Stock Exchange, brought this action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Archibald Stewart, builder there, for the recovery of £1933, 7s. 3d. as the balance of his disbursements and commissions on the purchase and subsequent "carryings-over" on Stewart's account, and as his broker, of £10,000 Third Preference Stock of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, known among stockbrokers as "Trunk Thirds."

It was not disputed that on 11th October 1883 Stewart instructed Maffett to buy for him £6000 Trunk Thirds; that on the same day Maffett sent Stewart a note advising him that the purchase had been made; that on the following day Stewart had instructed Maffett to buy for him a further lot of £4000 Trunk Thirds, and that Maffett had sent Stewart an advice-note of this purchase also. The first advice-note was in the following terms—the terms of second being identical, except that the price of the stock had fallen to $51\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or £2060, and the commission was £10, 6s. 0d. :—

“Glasgow, 11th Oct. 1883.—Arch. Stewart, Esq.—Sir,—I beg to advise having bought on your account as under in Liverpool, and subject to the rules of that Stock Exchange.

“For account day—25th inst.—I am, &c.,	H. MAFFETT.
“6000 Trunk 3rds, at £52, 8s. 9d.,	£3146 5 0
Commission,	15 14 6

Maffett also founded on a series of nine continuation-notes, which he sent to Stewart on each fortnightly settlement day, from 24th October 1883 to 26th February 1884. These continuation-notes were in the following form, taking the earliest as an example:—

“Glasgow, 24th Oct. 1883.—Arch. Stewart, Esq.—Dear Sir,—I have continued for you as under.

This Account.	Next Account.

“H. MAFFETT.”

Accompanying each continuation-note was an account bringing out the balance against Stewart as at the date of the note. The balance so brought out in the account which accompanied the first continuation-note was £238, or £138 after deducting a sum of £100 which Maffett admitted he had received from Stewart, as afterwards explained. The balance increased at each settlement day as the price of Trunk Thirds was falling rapidly, while Stewart paid Maffett nothing further except a sum of £45 on 15th November 1883, also to be referred to again.

Stewart also admitted the receipt of the following advice-note from Maffett, intimating that he had closed the account:—

“Glasgow, 7th March 1884.—A. Stewart, Esq.—Sir,—I beg to advise having sold on your account as under in Liverpool, and subject to the rules of that Stock Exchange.

“For account day 14th inst.—I am, &c.,	H. MAFFETT.
	Per H. M.

“10,000 Trunks at 33,	£3300 0 0
Commission,

The account accompanying this advice-note shewed a balance against Stewart of £1933, 7s. 3d., being the sum sued for.

In defence Stewart averred (Stat. 2)—after referring to the purchases and advice-notes of 11th and 12th October 1883:—“It was quite well understood between the parties that no delivery was to be made under any of the contracts, and, in point of fact, the pursuer had no stocks or shares which he could deliver. The alleged transactions were not bona fide contracts of sale, and were merely gambling speculations on the rise and fall of the market between the date of the purchase and said 25th day of October 1883.”

The defender further averred that on 19th October (i.e. before the first settlement day) Maffett agreed to take over the stocks on his own responsibility on payment of £150, and that the two sums of £100 and £45 above-mentioned were paid in implement of this agreement. This defence, however, was on appeal practically abandoned.

The pursuer pleaded;—The sum sued for being the balance of an account-current between pursuer and defender, decree should be granted as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The alleged transactions between pursuer and defender having been gambling transactions for differences between the price of stock at the date of purchase and the date of settlement, the sum sued for is not recoverable. (3) The pursuer not having acted as a broker in the transactions in question, but as a dealer, is not entitled to sue for commissions or for alleged differences.

A proof was allowed. Although the defender on record averred that the pursuer had no stocks or shares which he could deliver in terms of his first advice-notes of 11th and 12th October 1883, the defender admitted that this was an error, and that the original transactions were, as regarded the pursuer, bona fide purchases of stock to the amount and at the prices set forth in the advice-notes, effected on the Liverpool Stock Exchange through R. Thompson & Company, stockbrokers there, acting for sellers whose names were undisclosed to Maffett at the time, but were ascertained for the purposes of this case. The subsequent continuation-notes, however, did not correspond to any specific transaction which the pursuer had entered into on behalf of the defender. The pursuer in answer to a call made on him before closing the record produced an account setting forth his dealings with R. Thompson & Company, who were his brokers throughout these transactions, except the last. It appeared from these accounts that the pursuer's method of business was to purchase for each settlement day such an aggregate amount of Trunk Thirds as he had orders for from his various clients. This he did in lots at different prices through Thompson & Company, the names of whose clients the accounts disclosed. He then lumped the lots together, averaged the prices, and charged the stock which each client had ordered at the average price, which rarely corresponded to any of the actual prices. It was these average prices which the pursuer gave in the continuation-notes he sent to the defender, who contended that the pursuer by manipulating the stocks in this way had made himself principal, not broker, in the transaction, and so liable to the objection under the Gaming Act, 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 109. This point, however, though raised in argument in the Sheriff Court, was there merely based on inferences deduced from the accounts; it was not the subject either of averment or of parole proof.

The pursuer in his evidence admitted that he knew the defender had no intention of taking up the stock—that he was merely speculating in differences.

On 5th August 1885 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds (1) that in October 1883 the defender, A. Stewart, employed the pursuer, a dealer in stocks in Glasgow, to purchase for him certain stocks in Liverpool, which the pursuer accordingly did through Liverpool stockbrokers, he not being himself a member of the Liverpool Stock Exchange, the transaction being, in the knowledge of both parties, merely transactions for differences; finds (2) that the transactions continued till March following, the pursuer regularly sending contract-notes to defender, which the defender has failed to prove that he ever objected to or repudiated; finds (3) that the transactions . . . were carried over from time to time, as per the contract-notes, at rates founded on the prices at which the stocks could be bought or sold to carry over: . . . Finds on the whole case and in law (1) that the balance sued for is due and payable by defender to pursuer; (2) that, as between defender and pursuer, the contracts founded on were not gaming contracts, but simply contracts of agency; (3) that, in the circumstances, the carrying-over must be held to have been authorised by defender: Therefore decerns as craved: Finds defender liable in expenses; allows," &c.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

At the hearing the case came to turn mainly on the question whether by lumping the lots of stock and averaging their prices in the manner just explained, the pursuer placed himself in the position of principal instead of that of broker.

In consequence the parties obtained leave to amend their pleadings. The defender averred ;—" With the exception of the two original purchases of £6000 Trunk 3rds and £4000 Trunk 3rds, entered in the account, under dates October 11th and October 13th, the pursuer never entered into or made any contract for the purchase or sale of stocks, for or on behalf of the defender, and never had any specific lots of stock appropriated to, or held specially on account of, the defender. The pursuer bought and sold large slump quantities of stocks, and, in particular, of Trunk 3rds, through or from Thompson & Co. of Liverpool, and other brokers, at various prices, and allocated these either to himself or his clients, just as he thought fit, and at such prices and dates as he thought fit. The prices of the stocks represented by the pursuer as bought for the defender, which were entered in the contract-notes sent by the pursuer to the defender, were different from the prices at which Thompson & Co. bought and sold the said stocks. From and after 27th October, the stocks alleged by the pursuer to have been bought for, and to be at the disposal of the defender, were truly bought for and held for behoof of the pursuer himself, or some of his clients, other than the defender, and this appears from several entries in the pursuer's books. . . . In all the transactions, except the two original purchases, the pursuer truly acted as a principal, dealing with the defender as the other principal, in speculative and gambling transactions for differences."

The defender also made the following alterations and additions to his pleas :—(3) Alter word "dealer" into "principal," viz.,—The pursuer not having acted as a broker in the transactions in question, but as a principal, is not entitled to sue for commissions, or for alleged differences. (6) None of the transactions entered in the account after 27th October having been made or entered into for or on account of the defender, the defender should be assoilzied. (7) The pursuer not having made any contracts of purchase or sale, which the defender would have been entitled to enforce against any third party as the other contracting principal, the defender should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed—to proceed before Lord Rutherford Clark. The pursuer, who was called by the defender, was the only witness. His evidence (the material portions of which are quoted in the opinions of Lord Mure and Lord Shand infra) substantially bore out what has been already stated as to the pursuer's course of dealing in continuing the stocks he professed to hold for the pursuer. There was no evidence that this course of dealing was according to the recognised custom of stockbrokers. It appeared that the last transaction was partly implemented by the sale of stock held by the pursuer on the Glasgow, not on the Liverpool Exchange.—See Lord Shand's opinion, p. 523.

After further hearing, the Court, "in respect of the importance of the questions submitted for determination, and in respect that the Judges of this Division are equally divided in opinion thereon," appointed the questions to be argued before seven Judges.

Argued for the defender ;—The pursuer, as a broker, was bound to make such a contract that the defender had someone in Liverpool bound to him, and whom he could sue. This the pursuer had, after the first transaction, failed to do. Neither as regarded the amount nor the price of the stock did the continuation-notes correspond to any real transaction, while the last transaction had not even been wholly carried out on the Liverpool Stock Exchange. That being the case, the pursuer was, according to Robinson v. Mollet,¹ a principal, not a broker, and so was not within the principle of Thacker v. Hardy.² It was true the defender was in default, and that gave the pursuer the right to do the best he could for him, but he was entitled to do so only in the way of the original contract, i.e., as a broker and not as a principal. The continuation-notes could not reasonably be construed in any other sense. There had been no proof here of the custom of stockbrokers.

Argued for the pursuer;—The original case against the pursuer was that he had never really bought or sold stocks in terms of his advice and continuation-notes. It was now admitted that he had actually bought the stocks (though the capacity in which he had acted was in dispute), and it was not said that he was suing for more than his outlay and commissions. It was part of the rules of the Stock Exchange that brokers were principals inter se; it followed that the defender had in the Liverpool broker a principal other than the defender, and would have a direct action against him in the event of the pursuer's bankruptcy. The effect of lumping several purchasers together at the worst put them to the inconvenience of suing jointly, and of so suing either Thompson & Company, or, if they disclosed their constituents, then these constituents, each at his own price. Robinson v. Mollet did not apply. There the so-called broker was principal to all intents and purposes, and would profit or lose by the rise or fall in the prices. Here the pursuer's commissions were his only interest. Further, even if that case was an authority for the proposition that the pursuer must establish privity of contract between the defender and a seller on the original transaction, that did not apply to the subsequent continuation-notes. The defender being in default, the pursuer had to finance for him, and consequently the relation of lender and borrower sprang up between them as well as that of broker and principal. In this complex relation the pursuer was entitled to act in any way that was consistent with the continuation-notes, and a comparison between them and the original advice-notes shewed that they could not be construed to mean a specific sale and nothing else. They implied an authority to keep the stock open for the defender in any way that was possible.

LORD MURK.—This action has been brought to enable the pursuer to recover the commission due to him as a broker, acting on the employment of the defender, in purchasing stock for the defender, and in afterwards carrying over that stock from time to time, and making the advances and disbursements for the defender which were necessary to effect the carrying over of the stock.

In the defences to this demand it is not denied that the defender employed the pursuer as his broker to purchase for him two lots of Grand Trunk Preference Stock, amounting together to £10,000 stock; and it is admitted that the defender duly received advice-notes from the pursuer of that amount of stock having been purchased for him in Liverpool, for settlement on the 25th of October 1883, subject to the rules of the Liverpool Stock Exchange. It is, however, at the same time alleged by the defender that he had no intention of taking delivery on that day of the stock so purchased. He also alleges that in point of fact the pursuer "had no stock or shares which he could deliver," and that the transactions, in so far as he, the defender, was concerned, "were merely gambling speculations on the rise and fall of the market" between the date of the purchase and the day fixed for the settlement.

Maffett v. Stewart.

It is, moreover, expressly averred in defence that, before the day of settlement arrived, the defender on two occasions instructed the pursuer to close the stocks, as the price was falling in the market, and that on the second occasion the pursuer agreed to take over the stock on his own responsibility if the defender would pay him £150 to meet the balance due upon the stock, which the defender agreed to do, and afterwards paid £100 and then £45 to account. The defender further alleges that, upon this being done, he understood that his responsibility was at an end, and that, if the pursuer carried over the stock, he did so for his own behoof and on his own responsibility. This alleged agreement and the instructions to close the stock are both denied by the pursuer.

So standing the averments in the defences, the main leading pleas for the defender were substantially these—(1) That the transactions being gambling transactions for differences between the defender and the pursuer as a principal, and not as a broker, the pursuer was not entitled to recover; and (2) that the pursuer having agreed "to take over the stock on his own responsibility," the defender was entitled to absolvitor. Upon a proof being led, the Sheriff repelled those pleas, and decerned in favour of the pursuer; and the case having been brought here upon appeal, the defender proposed and was allowed to amend his record, and upon that being done an additional proof was allowed.

In this amendment the more material of the facts alleged appear to be these, —1st, That with the exception of the original purchases of £6000 and £4000 stock entered in the account, "the pursuer never made any contract for the purchase and sale of stock for or in behalf of the defender," but "bought and sold large slump quantities of stock at various prices, and allocated these either to himself or his clients as he thought fit"; and 2d, That "From and after the 27th of October the stocks alleged to have been bought for the defender were truly bought for and held for behoof of the pursuer himself, or some of his clients other than the defender." With reference to these averments the following pleas were added to the record:—"6. None of the transactions entered in the account after 27th October having been made or entered into for or on account of the defender, the defender should be assoilzied. 7. The pursuer not having made any contracts of purchase or sale which the defender would have been entitled to enforce against any third party as the other contracting principal, the defender should be assoilzied."

In the discussion which took place before your Lordships on this amended record, and the relative proof, the parties confined themselves mainly to the questions raised in these two additional pleas. The defences relied on in the Sheriff Court, viz., those founded on the alleged gambling nature of the transactions, and on the alleged agreement of the pursuer to relieve the defender of the stock by taking them over on his own responsibility, were not reargued at that discussion. The first of them was, I think, incidentally alluded to; but, according to my recollection, and to the notes I made at the time, the defence founded on the alleged agreement was not even mentioned by the appellant; and I do not exactly know whether the parties expect the opinion of this Court to be delivered upon them. But, as they have not been withdrawn, I think it

No. 99. right to say that I concur in the views which the Sheriff-substitute has expressed in his note with regard to them.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Maffett v.
Stewart.

The defence founded on the Statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 109, depends, as it appears to me, upon whether the pursuer is to be considered and dealt with as a broker, or as being a principal in these transactions. If he is held to be a principal the statute applies. But if, on the other hand, the pursuer has acted throughout as a broker, employed by the defender to carry on the transactions, it appears to me that he is, in that character, entitled to recover his commission and advances upon the authority of the case of Thacker v. Hardy, 1878, L. R., 4 Q. B. Div., p. 685, and of the earlier case of Rosewarne v. Billing, 1863, 15 C. B., N. S. p. 316, in which it was held that a broker paying differences for his principal might recover them.

As regards the defence founded on the agreement, I am very clearly of opinion that the defender has failed. The onus rests upon him to prove that special agreement, but the only evidence he has adduced is that of his own statement, which is directly contradicted by the pursuer; while the conduct of the defender, on the other hand, appears to me to be altogether inconsistent with the notion that he had ever transferred his right to the stock in question to the pursuer under any such agreement; and for these reasons:—(1) The payment of £45 to account is not made by the defender till the 15th of November 1883, as shewn by the receipt granted for that sum to the defender, and founded on by him. But before that payment was made the defender had received, and accepted without objection or protest, two separate notices from the pursuer, one on the 24th of October and the other on the 12th November 1883, to the effect that the stock had been continued on the defender's account. These notices, moreover, were on each occasion accompanied by an account of how matters stood between the pursuer and defender at the date of the respective continuations; and in these accounts, and in the next continuation account of the 27th November 1883, the balance stated as then due to the pursuer by the defender is brought out after placing to the credit of the defender in the general account the payments of £100 and £45 which had been made by the defender. By so framing the accounts the defender was duly warned of what the pursuer believed to be the defender's position relative to those payments, viz., that they were placed to account of the general balance due by him to the pursuer; and yet no objection was made to this mode of stating the account. (2) Neither was there any complaint made by the defender against his being charged as debtor to the pursuer in the subsequent continuation accounts for all disbursements made by him in relation to the carrying over of the stock, of which he now alleges the pursuer had undertaken to relieve him before the 24th of October 1883. He, on the contrary, receives these continuation notices, and the relative accounts, without objection throughout the whole period of his connection with the pursuer; and in these he is charged with all the usual expenses and disbursements incurred relative to the carrying over of the stock; and having carefully preserved these accounts, he produces them in the present action.

I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking that, in these circumstances, the defender must be held as assenting to, and authorising the carryings-over as made on his behalf. His payment of £45 "to account of his balance" on the 15th of November, after he must have received a continuation-note and relative account not only of the first but of the second carrying-over, is, as the Sheriff has remarked, a practical adoption of those transactions, and tells much against his attempt to repudiate the later transactions, none of which were repudiated at the time. No. 99.

If any such agreement as that founded on in defence had existed, the natural and proper course for the defender would have been to write repudiating the pursuer's conduct, and ordering him to abstain from acting any further as his broker in the matter. He, however, does not do that. He leaves the pursuer to believe that he is still authorised to act as his broker in relation to the Grand Trunk Stock in question; and when he is informed in the month of December 1883, and January and February 1884, by the letters written to him by the pursuer, that the pursuer will be obliged to take steps against him if further payments are not made to account of the balance due, he does not even then repudiate the pursuer's authority to act as his broker in carrying over the stock, or find fault with his conduct.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Stewart.

The defender pleads in the record, both as originally framed and as amended, that the pursuer was a principal and not a broker in the transaction. But of this there is no evidence. The pursuer, when cross-examined in the additional proof, distinctly depones that in all these transactions he acted as "broker alone," and that of the sum claimed by him "between £80 and £100 is his commission—the balance is loss incurred in the reduction of the price of stock which I paid to brokers on behalf of the defender"; and there is no evidence to a contrary effect. The defender has all along admitted that he originally employed the pursuer as his broker to purchase stock on the Stock Exchange, which he says, and says truly apparently, that he was not in a position to pay for, and did not intend to take delivery of. That stock was admittedly purchased for him by the pursuer, and the defender's obligations in regard to it could only be got quit of or arranged through the pursuer, or some other broker employed to act for the defender on the Stock Exchange. But the defender has not condescended upon the name of anyone whom he employed to act for him instead of the pursuer. The stock moreover has been disposed of by the pursuer with the full knowledge of the defender, after a series of transactions of which the defender was kept duly informed, by means of continuation notices and accounts sent to him by the pursuer, as a broker acting on his employment, and which notices and accounts were not objected to at the time, but were duly received and preserved by the defender.

Upon the evidence then and pleadings as the action was originally laid, and apart from the questions raised under the amended record, the conclusion I have come to is, 1st, That the defender has failed to prove that the pursuer ever agreed to take over the stock he admittedly purchased for the defender, or that the defender ever gave the pursuer instructions to close that stock; 2d, That in carrying over the stock the pursuer acted with the knowledge and approval of the defender; and 3d, That the pursuer did this as broker for the defender, and not on his own account and responsibility.

In this state of the facts, and of the evidence bearing upon the case as the record was originally framed, I have been unable to find any grounds in law on which the defender can succeed in maintaining that he is under no obligation to pay the pursuer the commission due on the business he thus employed the pursuer to transact, or to repay the monies which were advanced by the pursuer on behalf of the defender with his knowledge and approval at the time.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Maffett v.
Stewart.

Neither do I think that the circumstance, which is one of those mainly relied on by the defender in the amended record, that the carrying over of the defender's stock as part of a larger sum of stock of the same kind which the pursuer required to have carried over at Liverpool for other clients, should invalidate the transaction to any extent, provided that was done in such a way as to secure to each of those clients the amount of stock required to be bought or carried over on his behalf. It is, I believe, not an uncommon thing for a broker, with orders to buy or sell a certain amount of stock, to buy or sell that stock in separate lots, when he finds he cannot acquire or dispose of it as a whole. That, as I have always understood, is a matter of everyday occurrence, and I do not very well see how in many cases the business of the Stock Exchange could be carried on if that were not allowed. And that being so, I fail to see how there can be any illegality in a broker, acting for two or more clients, each of whom wishes to acquire a lot of the same kind of stock, making a contract with the selling broker for the acquisition and delivery on a particular day of the gross amount required, and thereafter apportioning that stock among his clients with a view to the transference to each of them, when the day of settlement arrived, of the quantity he required.

Now that, as I read the evidence, was what was here done. It is not now disputed that the order given to the pursuer to purchase the stock was duly carried out on the 11th and 12th of October, by the purchase of two lots of Grand Trunk Thirds of £6000 and £4000 each. In the defences those purchases were distinctly challenged by the defender, when he alleged, in statement 2 of the record, that the whole was a gambling transaction, and that, "in point of fact, the pursuer had no stocks or shares which he could deliver." This allegation against the fair dealing of the pursuer is now withdrawn, for it was distinctly admitted by the defender's counsel at the discussion that the requisite amount of stock had in the first instance been duly acquired for the defender by the pursuer. And it is not now alleged that the amount of stock so bought for the defender had not, in point of fact, been carried over from time to time by the Liverpool broker, according to the rules of the Liverpool Stock Exchange. The continuation-notes of the Liverpool broker are quite distinct as to this, and their accuracy has not been challenged.

In obedience to a call, moreover, made upon the pursuer on the part of the defender in the pleadings in the Sheriff Court, the pursuer furnished the defender with the names of the various parties with whom, at the respective carryings-over of the defender's stock to the amount of £10,000, the pursuer's correspondents at Liverpool dealt. These names are distinctly set out in the account in the print of documents for the defender; and although the pursuer is asked one or two questions about this when examined for the defenders in the additional proof, no question was raised as to the correctness of the information he had given. The defender on each carrying-over, therefore, had a contracting principal from whom he could have demanded a transfer of the stock then bought, if the defender could have paid for it.

But although neither the accuracy of these continuation-notes, nor of the information as to the names thus given, is disputed, the legality or propriety of carrying the stock over on the 24th of October, as part of a larger sum, is disputed. That carrying-over appears to have been done in two sums of £18,000 and £20,000 stock, as shewn in the continuation-note of Thompson & Company, the Liverpool brokers, "subject to the rules and regulations of the Liverpool Stock Exchange," as explained by the pursuer when adduced as a witness by the defender in the additional proof, where he says,—^{Mar. 4, 1837.} "I had to divide the Maffett v. £38,000 between Stewart and other clients who had stock open when I Stewart. was advising them." He is then referred to his day-book, extracts from which are printed in the appendix to the proof, where he explains how this was done as follows:—"I am now shewn my day-book, and referred to the entries under date October 24th. I distributed the £38,000 between R. Service, £20,000; Archibald Stewart, £10,000; Dr Russell, £2000; account No. 3, £5000; and H. Maffett junior, £1000. Dr Russell is one of my clients in Durham. Account No. 3 stands for myself. £5000 of these Trunk Thirds had been bought for a party who had become bankrupt. I was carrying them on. I was not aware the man was bankrupt, but he had become bankrupt. His trustee called on me and wanted me to sell them. I told him I thought they were to go up. I closed his account and kept them on for a time, calling the account No. 3 as for myself. I was the purchaser of these stocks. They did not interfere with my security at all. H. Maffett junior is my nephew." And when this account is looked at, as printed in the appendix, a distinct division of the £38,000 stock and appropriation of it in the way here described will be found.

But the matter does not stop there. Besides these entries in the day-book of the names of the parties in right to the stock thus carried over, there is an entry in the pursuer's memorandum-book, of date the 24th of October, to the effect that of these £38,000 stock carried over by Thompson & Company of Liverpool, £10,000 are for the defender. And there is, moreover, the continuation-note of the same date sent by the pursuer to the defender intimating,—^{"I have continued for you as under,—Sold £10,000 Trunk 3d at £50, bought at £50, 3s. 3d. Com. in acct."} There are thus three distinct acknowledgments, under the handwriting of the pursuer, to the effect that he had carried over through the Liverpool broker and held that amount of stock for the defender. Similar entries are to be found made in these books at each successive carrying-over till the close of the transactions, and there is also evidence of due notice of this having been regularly sent to the defender by continuation-notes and accounts, as has already been explained.

On examining the day-book it will be found that from the 24th of October down to the beginning of January pretty much the same amount of Grand Trunk Stock was carried over for the same and other parties. But it appears that about the 9th of January a sale was effected of the £20,000 stock belonging to Mr Service, and with reference to this the pursuer says in his evidence,—^{"I am referred to the account ending 14th January 1834, from which I see that the Trunk Thirds, which I had open in Liverpool with R. Thompson & Company at that date, was £41,000. On January 9 I sold out £20,000 Trunk Thirds—two lots of £5000 and £15,000. These were Service's Trunk Thirds. He instructed me to sell out. That left me with £21,000 open in Liverpool. On January 14th £21,000 were carried over. On page 32 you will find the £21,000 on both sides of the account. That was all that was open in the Liverpool market, so far as I was concerned, at the close of the account on page 30."} He then goes on to explain how on the 14th and 15th January further sums were sold out to close by others of the holders, amounting to £9000 in all, leaving £12,000 to be carried over. And with reference to these he says,—

No. 99. "The £9000 were not part of Mr Stewart's lot. The entries in my day-book Maffett v. "On the credit side:—

Jany. 14. Dr Russell—£4000—38—£1520.

" " Account—£4000—37½—£1515.

" 15. Account—£1000—36—£360.

"On debit side:—

R. Thompson & Company are, of course, the Liverpool brokers. (Q.) Are those not simply cross-entries as far as those names are concerned? (A.) No; Dr Russell held the stock, and it was sold by Thompson & Company."

There thus remained open at Liverpool, after this £9000 stock was disposed of, £12,000 stock, £10,000 of which belonged to the defender. Of this fact a continuation-note and relative account was duly sent to the defender by the pursuer in February 1884; and the stock was closed as against the defender in March 1884 as he was unable to make arrangements for retaining it. As to this the pursuer says in his evidence,—“In Stewart's case the stock was in Thompson's hands until the last carry-over. There was only £9000 left in the market at the finish,” and with reference to this he adds in cross-examination as to his accounts,—“On the 26th February 1884 I purchase £10,000 Trunk Thirds for the defender, and I hold these on his behalf until the 7th of March, when I sell £9000 for him in Liverpool and £1000 in Glasgow.” It appears that there was some mistake about the sale of £1000 of the £10,000 held in Liverpool for the defender, and that he was credited on account with £1000 sold in Glasgow instead.

The entries to which I have referred in the pursuer's business-book, taken in connection with the continuation-notes, appear to me to afford conclusive evidence of the fact that, as the duly authorised broker of the defender, the pursuer had all along, at each carrying-over, under his control, and was under an obligation to obtain delivery of, £10,000 stock for the defender, should he wish to have that stock transferred to him when a day of settlement arrived. This the pursuer, as a broker, would, I conceive, beyond all doubt, have been obliged to do, had the defender asked him to procure a transfer of it, and furnished the pursuer with money to pay for the stock. And this the pursuer, in the ordinary discharge of his duty as a broker, could have had no difficulty in effecting when the day of settlement approached, by sending to his Liverpool correspondent a ticket with the name of the defender upon it, as the party to whom the stock was to be transferred, in terms of the recognised rules of the Stock Exchange. On that being done the selling broker would have been obliged to have that amount of stock transferred to the defender upon his tendering the price of the stock, and thus the matter would have been settled.

The rules of the Stock Exchange are very distinct in these respects, and the argument submitted on the part of the defender appeared to me to proceed upon some misapprehension as to these rules. When a broker is employed to purchase stock for a client in the Stock Exchange, he does not as a matter of course, as seemed to be assumed in the argument, at once disclose the name of that client to the selling broker, nor does the latter disclose the name of the vendor, and so make a contract between the purchaser and vendor. But the two brokers make a contract, the one to purchase a certain amount of stock for his clients for settlement on a certain day, and the other to deliver that amount of stock on the day fixed for settlement to the buying broker or his nominees ; No. 99. and it is not until what is called the "name day" arrives, which is generally a couple of days before the day of settlement, that any disclosure is made of the purchaser's name, and a contract effected between the principal parties. But it is then effected, and there is then clear privity of contract. Mar. 4, 1887.

Maffett v. Stewart.

This is very distinctly explained by Lord Justice Lindley when dealing with this subject in his work on Partnership (vol. i. p. 722), where, after mentioning the various leading cases on the subject, he says,—“That in the ordinary course of events a sale of shares on the Stock Exchange is essentially a transaction of the following description :—(1) There is a contract between the selling and buying broker or jobber to the effect that on a given day, called the ‘account day,’ the shares shall be deliverable and the price payable. (2) That on the day before the account day (called the ‘name day’) the buying broker or jobber gives or passes to the selling broker a ticket containing the name of the person to whom the shares are to be transferred, and the price which that person has agreed to pay for them. (3) That the name as passed may be objected to within a limited time, and if objected to on reasonable grounds, must be replaced by another name—the committee of the Stock Exchange deciding in case of dispute whether another name is to be given.” After so stating the rules he then goes on to explain that the above-mentioned ticket is prepared by the broker of the purchaser, and is in the ordinary case passed (between 12 and 2 o’clock on the same day) by such broker to the broker of the original seller, who executes a transfer (prepared by his broker) to the purchaser upon his payment of the agreed-on price.

Having thus explained the way in which a settlement is brought about, Lord Justice Lindley goes on to deal with the question of contract, and says, under the head “Privity of Contract” (p. 726),—“The precise moment when the contract in these cases is first created has given rise to some difference of opinion, but the better opinion seems to be that a contract between the vendor and ultimate purchaser exists as soon as the ticket containing the purchaser’s name has been handed by his authority to the vendor, and he has accepted the name, and indicated that acceptance to the purchaser. This opinion is based upon the ground that the ticket is drawn up and issued by the agent of the purchaser, who is authorised to use the machinery of the Stock Exchange, and to transmit the ticket to any person to whom the operation of that machinery may bring it. When that person is ascertained, and the ticket is handed to him, an offer is made by the purchaser to buy of the vendor, upon the terms specified on the ticket, and if the vendor accepts that offer, and informs the purchaser that he has done so, it is difficult to see that anything further is required to make a contract between the parties.”

Having regard to these rules, and the opinion I have just read, which are both fully borne out, I think, by the decisions which are referred to in support of them, it appears to me to be clear upon the evidence adduced that the pursuer, during the whole period of his acting as broker for the defender, had placed the defender in the position of being entitled to enforce delivery, after each successive carrying-over, of the £10,000 Grand Trunk Stock in question, at any one of the ordinary days of settlement on the Liverpool Stock Exchange. This the pursuer could have done for the defender by directing his Liverpool correspondent to pass a ticket with the defender’s name upon it to the selling broker for settlement in compliance with the above rules ; when, upon the price being paid, the stock would at once have been transferred to the defender. On these grounds it appears to me that the defender has entirely failed to instruct the only defence raised in the amended record, to the effect that the pursuer had not "made any contract of purchase or sale which the defender would have been entitled to enforce against another contracting principal," and that this defence, as well as those maintained in the Sheriff Court, should be repelled.

The case of Robinson v. Mollett (7 E. & I. App. p. 802) was referred to at the discussion as an authority in favour of the defender. But I am unable to see that the decision in that case has any direct bearing upon the present. That was not, as I read it, a decision relative to a Stock Exchange transaction. It was the case of a merchant in Liverpool employing a dealer in tallow in London, called a tallow broker, to purchase for him certain quantities of tallow. But instead of doing this the broker proposed to transfer to the merchant certain quantities of tallow belonging to himself, and which he had purchased in his own name, some of it before and some of it after he had received the order. Of this tallow the merchant refused to take delivery, as not bought for him in compliance with the order. Upon this the broker sold the tallow, and brought an action for the difference he had himself as a principal to pay. What, therefore, the broker had done was something quite inconsistent with the character of a broker. "He had converted himself from an agent" (as one of the Judges expressed it) "employed to buy for his employer into a principal to sell to him." Now, this plainly gave the broker an interest adverse to his duty, and on that ground the Court rejected the transaction, it being clearly proved that the broker had acted as principal throughout, and actually sold his own tallow, and claimed the difference as his own loss. Here, on the contrary, the whole was done under the rules of the Stock Exchange between brokers for their respective principals, and who had no interest in the matter beyond the amount of their commission.

In giving judgment in Mollett's case, Lord Chelmsford expressly put his decision on the ground I have alluded to, using the same expression as Mr Justice Hannen relative to the usage founded on as "converting a broker employed to buy into a principal selling for himself, and thereby giving him an interest wholly opposed to his duty," which could not therefore be sustained. This is a most salutary rule, which it may be right to apply in any similar cases; but there is not, as I humbly think, any ground for its application here in the circumstances which I have now explained.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the defences should be repelled, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer.

LORD SHAND.—In this case, after the appeal by the defender, Mr Stewart, from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute had been heard by the Court, an interlocutor was pronounced on 18th December 1885 recalling the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and allowing an amendment on the record to be made by the appellant and answered by the respondent, and also allowing the parties additional proof, which was taken before Lord Rutherford Clark, with special reference to the averments contained in the amendments by the parties respectively. Thereafter, as the result of the discussion on the additional proof, their Lordships, "in respect of the importance of the questions submitted for determination, and that the Judges of this Division are equally divided in opinion thereon," appointed the questions to be argued before them and three Judges of the First Division. The argument submitted under this order related almost exclusively to the averments which had been made by way of amendment and the evidence adduced under the order for additional proof, and the question thus raised, and now to be determined, is—Whether, on the assumption that the pursuer was employed, as he alleges, to purchase stock for the defender, and that the original purchases were carried over or continued from time to time by sales of the stock purchased and repurchases of the same quantities of stock, the pursuer is entitled, in the circumstances disclosed in the additional proof, to recover the ultimate loss after the alleged sale on 7th March 1884 of the last quantity of the stock purchased, the amount of the claim being £1933, 7s. 3d. This amount is brought out on an account debiting the defender, on the one hand, with the prices of stock alleged to have been purchased for him, and crediting him on the other hand with the prices of stock alleged to have been sold on his behalf, to which is added commissions on all the transactions paid to brokers on the Stock Exchange, and also commissions claimed by the pursuer himself.

No. 99.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Maffett v.
Stewart.

The defender does not dispute that the original purchases on 11th October 1883 of £6000 Trunk Thirds, and on 12th October 1883 of £4000 Trunk Thirds, making in all £10,000 of stock, was all in order, the pursuer having made contacts on his behalf for these purchases with third parties, which he, the defender, was in a position to enforce against them; but he denies that, as regards any of the subsequent purchases after the sale of the particular stock just mentioned, any privity of contract was ever created, or could have been created, between him and third parties, so that he could have made effectual any right against them for delivery of stock. He farther disputes the averment that the stock alleged to have been purchased for him was at the close of the transactions sold on his behalf; and he maintains that, this being so, the pursuer has failed to establish liability against him for the balance sued for.

Both parties are agreed that the pursuer was employed in the character of a broker only. This is averred by the pursuer on record, and is admitted by the defender, and at the close of his evidence in the additional proof the pursuer himself deposes that "all through these transactions" he acted as "broker alone," while in the original proof he explains that he is not a member of the Stock Exchange, but is a stockbroker, and has been so for twenty years, adding the words, "I am an outside broker."

It is further of importance in the decision of the question between the parties to observe that there is no averment on the record of any custom of trade or custom of the Stock Exchange or otherwise in reference to the dealings of parties in the purchase and sale of stocks to vary in any way the ordinary duties arising out of the relationship of customer and broker. If any such custom had been averred it would have been a fit matter for proof, and the defender would have had an opportunity of leading counter evidence on the subject. It follows that the pursuer, as in a question between him and the defender, was not bound to incur any personal responsibility in the purchase or sale of stocks (whatever responsibility he may have incurred towards other brokers with whom he dealt under the rules of the Stock Exchange in which he effected purchases and sales), but was an agent merely, with authority to bind the defender to third parties. But, on the other hand, the pursuer, in the performance of his duties, was bound to make his contracts of purchases and sales of stock on the defender's behalf with third parties in such terms as to enable the defender, as principal on one side of these transactions, to enforce the contracts against third parties directly with whom the contracts were made. The importance of this to any one in the position of the defender as principal was this, that even although the brokers, who as between each other might bind themselves as principals, should become insolvent there would always be a principal to whom the defender was entitled to look for fulfilment of the contracts.

The parties are agreed that the defender in ordering the original purchase of shares did not contemplate a permanent investment. His intention was to hold the stock temporarily, in the expectation that the market price would rise before the day of settlement, and again to sell the stock for payment on that day, thereby gaining the difference. In order to make profit in this way by differences it is obvious there must be real transactions of purchase and sale of stock with third parties. As the stock in this case fell instead of rising a series of new transactions took place, all with the same object. Between 12th October 1883 and 7th March 1884, when the defender alleges that the sale of the stock purchased for the defender and belonging to him was made, there appear to have been nine transactions "carrying over or continuing" the original purchases,—that is to say, nine transactions in which the stock purchased from time to time was sold for immediate delivery, and a new purchase or repurchase made for delivery a fortnight afterwards, in the expectation or hope always of a rise in the market. In the case of each of his purchases, assuming that contracts binding on the defender were made, the defender was bound to take delivery of the stock at the settlement day on the Stock Exchange a fortnight after the contracts were made, and as he was not possessed of funds to pay for the stock, the sale of the stock purchased was made for immediate payment, and the purchase of another quantity of stock again made for payment on delivery a fortnight afterwards. The whole of the transactions at the expiry of the nine different periods of a fortnight each were of the same nature, and at the end of the last fortnight the pursuer closed the account by selling the stock which he alleges to have belonged to the defender, but without making any new purchase. The course adopted by the pursuer on the first occasion may be taken as shewing what occurred on each subsequent continuation or carrying-over of stock. The first purchases were made for delivery and payment on 25th October 1883, but on 24th October the pursuer sold £10,000 Trunk Thirds at £50 for immediate payment, and bought the same quantity of stock at the higher price of £50, 3s. 3d. for delivery and payment a fortnight afterwards, according to the advice-note and account sent to the respondent. These transactions of continuation involving the sale of the stock, and the repurchase of the same quantity, were duly intimated by advice-notes from the pursuer to the defender in these terms (taking the first as a specimen):—"I have continued for you as under:—Sold 10,000 Trunk Thirds at £50; bought at £50, 3s. 3d.—com. in account." The note stated that the stock was sold for "this account," and bought for "next account."

It is clear that the pursuer and defender both fully understood that the defender was truly speculating in differences—that is, was buying and selling for the purpose of gaining by differences in the expectation of a rise in the price of the stock before each settling day. It is equally clear that if the pursuer had been a principal himself, contracting as such with the defender for the sales and purchases of stock, which it was quite understood was not to be delivered on either side, he would have been a party to gambling transactions struck at by the Gaming Act, and on which, therefore, he could not have maintained an action. No such case is however made out in the evidence. The pursuer by the arrangement and course of dealing between him and the defender was not in a position to make gains or losses by speculation, but was to be remunerated only by his commissions acting as a broker. And if he had properly performed the duties of a broker there would have been no valid defence to his present demand. No. 99.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Maffett v. Stewart.

But, again, if the pursuer by the mode in which he carried out the orders given to him made the purchases and sales truly for himself as principal and not for the defender to the effect of putting the defender in the position of being able to enforce the contracts made with third parties on his behalf, then it follows that the pursuer was not truly acting as a broker bringing third parties together as contractors buying and selling to each other, but made himself a principal, and he is precluded from suing on the contract of agency or brokerage, under which alone he was employed. In the case of Robinson v. Mollett, 1874 (L. R., 7 E. and L. Appeals, page 802), being an appeal from the Exchequer Chamber (L. R., 7 Common Pleas, page 84), although there was a great division of opinion on the question whether the custom of trade in the Tallow Market of London could be held to enlarge the rights of brokers so as to entitle them to sue, although by the course of dealing they had made themselves principals in the transactions (a question which was decided in the negative), all the learned Judges in the different Courts in which the case was heard were clearly of opinion that, in the absence of a special custom which the law could recognise as affecting the relation and rights of parties, a broker can only sue on his contracts, if it be clear that he acted throughout as broker only, making contracts between his principal and third parties, and that he could not sue if he himself became principal in the purchases or sales, giving his customer only the benefit of the transactions in which he had made himself principal. Mr Justice Blackburn there defines the duty of the broker or agent as "requiring the broker to establish privity of contract between the two principals," and in this view all of the Judges were agreed.

The defender in this case denies that the pursuer in the contracts made by him maintained the character of broker only, and maintains that the proof shews that in place of purchasing the particular quantities of stock which he, the defender, ordered or authorised to be bought and sold, the pursuer made lump purchases of larger quantities, and in some cases made a number of purchases which in the aggregate were of much larger amounts than the defender's orders, these purchases being made at various different prices, and that having done so, he in his advice-notes to the defender fixed arbitrary prices not corresponding with the prices of any particular purchases, but striking what he conceived to be an average; and farther, that while by these notes he professed to the defender to have effected particular purchases and sales on the defender's behalf, no such transactions had really taken place. It appears to me on a consideration of the proof that this contention on the part of the defender has been established, and, farther, that it has been shewn that the last sale of £10,000 Trunk Thirds, made by the pursuer on 7th March 1884, was not a sale of stock held under any contract of which the defender could possibly have taken the benefit, or for implement of which he was responsible; and in this state of the facts I am of opinion that the pursuer cannot succeed in his claim.

The evidence on these two points seems to be clear. The pursuer, no doubt, on the day before what is called settling-day always duly intimated to the defender that he had sold £10,000 Trunk Thirds at a certain price for the "present account," and bought the same quantity at another price for the "next account," but in regard to the quantity of stock alleged to have been purchased and to the price of that stock as intimated to the defender, the pursuer is unable to point to any definite transaction entered into solely on the defender's behalf, or to shew that any purchase of stock at the particular price intimated to the defender was really made.

Thus, to take the first date on which the stock was carried over, viz., 24th October 1883, it appears from the accounts which have been recovered in this case, and the additional evidence given by the pursuer himself, that two quantities of stock, one of £18,000 Trunk Thirds and another of £20,000 Trunk Thirds, were bought—neither of these being at the price of £50, 3s. 3d. intimated to the defender as the price of the stock bought for him. The evidence of the pursuer referring to the continuation-note of 24th October 1883 is in these terms,—“You will see that £18,000 Trunk Thirds and £20,000 Trunk Thirds are ‘sold’ [this should be ‘bought’] at £50, 2s. 9½d. and £50, 2s. 6½d. These two together make up the £38,000. . . . Of course I had to divide the £38,000 between Stewart and other clients who had stock open when I was advising them.” And some lines farther on he says,—“I am now referred to the print, page 4, to the account between myself and the defender on October 24th. I see an entry on the debtor side of £10,000 Trunk Thirds at £50, 3s. 3d. (Q.) Why do you charge £50, 3s. 3d. to Mr Stewart when the prices at which the £38,000 were bought were £50, 2s. 9½d. and £50, 2s. 6½d. ? (A.) That includes R. Thompson & Company’s 1-16th of commission. The London brokers advised these things net. Instead of that, however, I made a calculation as to how much the commission would be, and caused that to be added to the contango.” And after farther evidence as to the pursuer’s mode of dealing with the commission, the pursuer goes on to say,—“I distributed the £38,000 between R. Service, £20,000; Archibald Stewart, £10,000; Dr Russell, £2000; account No. 3, £5000; and H. Maffet junior, £1000,” the last three lots being really purchased by the pursuer himself, and subsequently he proceeds,—“In the division of the stock I charged everybody £50, 3s. 3d. for it. (Q.) To whom did you apportion the stock which you bought at £50, 2s. 6d. ? (A.) To all the parties at £50, 3s. 3d., for the reasons already explained. (Q.) Was there any particular lot of stock open between you and Thompson & Company which was apportioned to any one of the five people ? (A.) No, it was apportioned to the whole of them. I never mentioned the names of my clients to R. Thompson & Company. They knew no person but myself in these transactions.” The result of this evidence is that not only was there no purchase made of a specific quantity of stock for the defender under any contract which the defender could enforce,—no privity of contract established between the defender and another principal, nor, indeed, any contract at the price intimated of which the defender could take the benefit,—but that lump purchases having been made of large quantities of stock, one part at one price and another part at another, the defender struck an average of prices, and merely in his note-books or jottings made a note, on each occasion of a renewed purchase, of the allocation of £10,000 to the defender at a price in each case which had no existence, except in the pursuer’s mind and in his jottings. In this way it appears to me to be clear that there was no contract entered into which the defender could enforce, either when the transaction was entered into in Liverpool or at any subsequent date, with any third party. The only way in which the matter could be worked out was by the broker himself becoming principal, taking delivery of stock which he purchased at certain prices, and transferring this to the defender and other parties at different prices altogether. This evidence does not relate to the settlement of 25th October only, but runs through the whole account, for the defender says,—“The system of lump purchases and charging an additional price to the Glasgow clients goes on regularly through the whole account.”

Maffett v.
Stewart.

But, farther, the true position of the parties in these dealings is made very clear by what occurred when the pursuer closed the account, by selling stock which he alleges was truly held by the defender under a contract which the pursuer had made for him. It rather appears that the defender clearly understood that all his transactions were taking place on the Liverpool Stock Exchange, and, at all events, the advice-notes and accounts he received from the pursuer were calculated to lead him to think so. The pursuer himself says that “on the last occasion of carrying over or continuation, which took place on 26th February 1884, £12,000 Trunk Thirds were bought in Liverpool,” and that £10,000 of this had been allocated to the defender. If that had been the case, the defender would have been entitled to demand delivery of this stock on the settlement-day on 8th March following. But in the meantime, on 5th March, the pursuer sold out £3000 of the £12,000 Trunk Thirds on behalf of another customer named John M’Leish, leaving £9000 only which he could represent as in any sense belonging to the defender. This mode of dealing with the £12,000 stock held in Liverpool is only an illustration of the manner in which the pursuer acted throughout. It is clear that if he had acted as a broker only he would not have dealt with the stock in that way, leaving the defender as a contracting party for £9000 only. In the continuation-note of the ultimate sale of the £10,000 stock, represented as belonging to the defender, the pursuer writes,—“Glasgow, 7th March 1884.—A. Stewart, Esq.—I beg to advise having sold on your account as under, in Liverpool, and subject to the rules of that Stock Exchange, for account day, 14th instant, £10,000 Trunk Thirds, at £33—£33,000”; and this is the amount with which he credits the defender at the close of the account. From the evidence, however, it now appears, in the first place, that there was no sale of £10,000 Trunk Thirds in Liverpool, but a sale of £9000 only, and that the pursuer sold in addition a quantity of £1000 Trunk Thirds which he held for himself, or some other party in Glasgow; and in the second place, that there is no price of Trunk Thirds sold either in Liverpool or in Glasgow which corresponds with the price of £33 intimated to the defender and credited to him. The pursuer explains that the price intimated was reached on the principle of striking an average already referred to. On this subject the pursuer being asked,—“Have you slumped all your Liverpool and Glasgow sales? (A.) They were all being closed at the same time—some at Glasgow at £32, 18s. 9d., and some at Glasgow at £30, and the fairest thing to do was to make an average. I therefore gave a separate average between the price of his own stock sold in Liverpool, and the price of some that I had open at Glasgow”; and the very loose way in which the business was done is clearly brought out by another passage in the pursuer’s evidence, in which, being examined in regard to day-book entries relating to Trunk Thirds held by John M’Leish, he is asked,—“Prior to that date was he interested in any of the £12,000 open with the Liverpool brokers? (A.) He had bought a lot in Glasgow, and some in Liverpool. (Question repeated.) (A.) I never point out who the stock is for if I hold it in any of the markets. Suppose I hold Trunk Thirds for ten people, and have them in three different markets. If a client comes and orders stock to be sold in any particular market, I will do it. But I do not feel myself bound to keep the stock in any particular market." This passage in the pursuer's evidence seems to me to make it clear that it was not his system to make his contracts such that his customer had a definite contract with a particular third person which he could enforce in his own right either when the purchase was made, or at any time afterwards when delivery might be required. That being so, it appears to me that he by his actings himself became a principal in the transactions in question, a fact which destroys his claim to recover the sum sued for as due to him for transactions in which he was employed to act simply as broker, and with the ordinary powers and duties of a broker only.

It was argued on the defender's behalf that although in the original transaction with parties in Trunk Thirds the pursuer was bound to make a specific contract for the defender, enforceable by him against a third party, no such obligation rested on him in regard to the succeeding fortnightly contracts made thereafter. It was said that the pursuer was left "to do his best" for the defender as his customer, as the defender had failed to supply him with the price of the stock, or to pay the differences which were accumulating from time to time. I cannot give any weight to this argument. When the day of each settlement came the pursuer's only right was to sell out the stock belonging to the defender (if such stock were in existence), and thereupon to sue the defender for the difference, and his commission. He was not entitled to carry over stock and make a new purchase, unless authorised by the defender to do so. It seems, however, from the evidence and the course of dealings that such authority has been proved in reference to each of the fortnightly transactions, when the stock was in point of fact carried over. The defender and his friend Mr Service were repeatedly in the pursuer's office, and must have been made aware, as the pursuer alleges, that new transactions were being entered into from time to time; and as the defender received notices of these transactions regularly from the pursuer without objection, it cannot be taken from him now that the transactions were not authorised. But the authority to carry over or continue purchases and sales of stocks must, I think, plainly be taken to mean that these purchases and sales shall be made by the broker on the same footing and in the same way as the original transaction. The pursuer was a broker simply, and had no authority to change his character at any time in the course of the transactions, and accordingly throughout the whole of the continuations and purchases and sales made on the defender's behalf it was represented to the defender that stock had been purchased from time to time for him, of a specific quantity and at a specified price, in the same way as in the case of the original purchase. It may be that on the occasion of one or more, or it may be of all of the continuations, the person who bought the stock then due for delivery, and in whose favour the transfer of that stock must be taken, again sold stock to be delivered at the next settling-day. This, however, does not make the transactions in themselves in any way fictitious in so far as the persons buying and selling the stock respectively are concerned, and cannot, in my opinion, make any difference on the duty of the pursuer to continue to act as a broker only, as indeed he represented he did under the employment, as to the terms of which the parties are agreed. No. 99.

The case would have been very different if it had appeared and had been proved that the defender had authorised the pursuer to speculate for him, precisely in the way that the pursuer did,—that is, to buy stocks in different quantities and at varying prices—to lump these and strike an average price—and to take and hold the stocks, or rather a certain proportion of them, as allocated and as applicable to the defender's orders; or even had authorised the pursuer to carry on the whole transactions as principal himself, in his own name, though truly as agent for the defender. And the defender's authority for all this might possibly have been proved by clear evidence that he was made fully aware of the details of the pursuer's actings. But no case of this kind is either alleged or proved. Such a course of dealing would be quite beyond the ordinary duties or powers of a broker, while the pursuer's case on record is that he acted, and was employed to act, as a broker only, without any special powers given to him as an agent. Besides, on the evidence, there is no proof that the defender agreed to make the pursuer an agent to speculate in his own name for the defender, and in the way he did, mixing up the transactions of different customers in regard to quantities and prices of stocks. The case of Thacker v. Hardy, 1878, L. R., 4 Q. B. D. 685, has therefore no application.

Mar. 4, 1887.
Stewart.

On the whole, on the ground that it appears from the pursuer's account and evidence (1) that his actings after the first purchase and sale of stock were not those of a broker making transactions which the defender could enforce as against third parties contracting with him, and (2) as the stock sold at the close of the transactions did not belong to the defender, I am of opinion that the pursuer must fail in the action, except in so far as regards the balance of £138, 10s. 6d. due as the result of the first transaction of purchase and sale of stocks, which sum is admittedly due if the defences stated in the Sheriff Court be repelled, as I think they must be.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur with Lord Mure.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The appellant is defender in an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by the respondent, a stockbroker in Glasgow, in which the Sheriff gave judgment against the defender for £1933, 7s. 3d., the amount concluded for in the summons. That sum is alleged by the pursuer to be a debt incurred to him "as a broker on the employment and instructions of the defender in buying and selling shares for him." The transactions in question began in October 1883, and were carried on till March 1884. The defences are (1) that the alleged buyings and sellings were gambling transactions for differences between the price of stock at the dates of purchase and at the times for settlement; (2) that the pursuer had agreed to take over the loss on the first two (said by the defender to have been the only real transactions) on receiving £150 from the defender, which was subsequently paid; (3) that the pursuer did not act as a broker in the other transactions, but as a dealer; and (lastly) that the pursuer's statements as to instructions for carrying over, and as to the purchase and sale of stocks upon these instructions, are misrepresentations, the fact being that any orders given expressly or by implication to the pursuer were not fulfilled.

The first question relates to the first two transactions, the reality and regularity of which are not disputed. The only thing which has to be decided regarding

No. 99.

Maffett v.
Stewart.

there is whether the alleged agreement to accept of £150 instead of £238, which is sued for as the amount of the differences affecting them, has been proved; and the finding of the Sheriff upon this subject must, I think, be sustained. The burden of proof is on the defender, and he supported his statement by his oath. The pursuer, however, swore the contrary, and as the onus lay on the defender, what he alleged, as his evidence was not corroborated, cannot be held to have been established.

The next defence for consideration is the alleged gambling character of the subsequent transactions, but this does not require separate consideration, for, if the pursuer executed the orders he received by buying for the defender, he was in these not a principal, but only a broker or agent, and so is not affected by the plea in question. If, on the other hand, the pursuer did not execute the orders said to have been given to buy for the defender, the latter upon that ground is entitled to be assoilzied. We may therefore proceed at once to consider the two other pleas which have been put forward by the defender.

The first of these is that the pursuer had no authority to carry over. The burden of proof is here upon the pursuer. The order to buy stock does not involve authority to carry over in the event of stock not being taken up, or the difference not being paid. The broker may protect himself, but the way in which he is entitled to act for this purpose is to close the account, dispose of the stock which has been bought, credit the price to his client, and sue for the difference if the difference be not voluntarily paid. The right so to act affords the necessary protection, and were it to be held that a broker at his own hand is entitled to carry over—in other words, to continue the employment which was given upon the first order—this would be giving him the right to involve his client in indefinite liability. Such a thing is not necessary for the broker's security, and might be ruinous to the customer.

Such is my view of this matter, and therefore, unless there be proof of authority or ratification, the defender's liability for the differences on the transactions in question cannot be sustained. This is neither more nor less than what was decided in Newton v. Cribbes, 9th February 1884, 11 Rettie, p. 554. But it appears to me that the requisite proof has been provided. The defender, no doubt, swears that he gave no authority; the pursuer, again, swears the contrary, and the pursuer is corroborated by the sale-notes which were sent out to the defender the days on which the carryings-over occurred. All these sale-notes were produced by the defender. There was thus timeous intimation of what had been done. There was no repudiation, and whether there was an order or not to carry over, there was subsequent, and indeed immediate, ratification of the transactions. This distinguishes the present from the case of Newton v. Cribbes, which, therefore, is not a precedent on the present occasion.

The defender, accordingly, must be held to be liable for the consequences of the authority to carry over which was thus imparted.

Before proceeding to consider whether this authority was duly exercised, it appears to me to be necessary to explain that, in my view of the law, there must be on the part of the stockbroker carrying over—which is done by selling out and by buying in—as strict a fulfilment of the order as if it were the first order, or the order in which all the others originated. There was some controversy between counsel upon this subject, but I cannot say that I have any doubt upon it. For the pursuer it was said that when the carrying-over occurs the client is under a breach of contract, and therefore that the proceedings of the broker, whatever they may be, must be favourably regarded. To me it appears that there is no cogeney in such an excuse. The purchaser, no doubt, has neither taken up his stock nor paid his differences, and so far, in the one case and in the other, there was a failure to perform what, expressly or by implication, had been undertaken; but the carrying-over was the act of the broker. He consented to the arrangement, and this renders immaterial the consideration of the cause by which the carrying-over was induced. If the broker in his operations has put aside his character of broker, and acted as if he were a dealer, the fact that this was done in the carrying-over operations is not a reason for dispensing with the obligations of his contract. The transactions in question must be judged of on the assumption, which is indeed a fact, that the orders in question were given by the defender as client or principal to the pursuer as his agent or broker, and this introduces at once the question, which in truth is the question in the case, Were the alleged transactions, as these appear upon the proof, what they behoved to be according to the law by which the case is governed? That law, as I think, is not doubtful. The order is to buy for the principal. The broker is to fulfil the order given, and that cannot be fulfilled unless there is a purchase from a seller who is brought face to face with the purchaser, and is laid under obligation to deliver to him the thing which was the subject of the transaction. Any other rule would, using the words of Mr Justice Blackburn, as quoted in the opinion of Lord Chelmsford in Robinson v. Mollett, 7 Eng. & Irish App. 837, be a "departure from the ordinary duty of a broker, that duty requiring the broker to establish privity of contract between the two principals." That the order was given is at this stage of the argument not in controversy. Did the broker buy from another for the client the thing for which the order was given by the client? Were the parties to the transaction brought face to face, and was privity of contract established between them? And, as a consequence, could there be a right of action the one against the other? That the pursuer bought Grand Trunk Thirds after he had the defender's order is, I think, proved, but the form of the transaction was as if the purchase had been for himself. He may have intended, and probably did intend, that there should be distribution of the quantity bought among clients who had given orders. But all the same the bargain with the seller was such as it would have been if there had been no client in the case, and the pursuer had bought on his own account. This is as plain to me as anything could be upon the proof which was recently led.

These are the facts of the case, and they leave for determination only the question whether a lump purchase for distribution among several clients, where there is no allocation by, and no introduction of the client to, the seller, and no obligation undertaken by the one to the other, is a fulfilment of such an order as that which the pursuer says was given by the defender. If it be, then the duty of the broker must be different from that which has been explained by Mr Justice Blackburn. But I think that it is not different, and the circumstances related in other parts of the proof clearly shew that it would be dangerous to recognise what was done as the due fulfilment of such an order. Not only was there no allocation of any portion to any client, but even a portion which was intended by the pursuer to be held for a particular client was in part sold to make up a quantity which had been made the subject of a new transaction with or for another. This is said to be within the broker's right. The pursuer, indeed, adds,—“I would not book an order on any other terms.” The result of all seems to be that, were the pursuer's contention to be sanctioned, a broker need not purchase anything specific for his client, but may buy a lump quantity for him and for others at the same time, of which there need be no allocation; nay more, that he may in the end dispose of a part of the lot to others than any of those who gave the order, and supply the deficiency out of stock which was not bought even ostensibly to carry out the broker's obligation. The pursuer suggests that what he did was conformable to the practice of the Stock Exchange. There is no proof as to this. But even if there were proof, and if it were not shewn that the client was cognisant of the alleged custom, such custom would not be a rule by which the obligations of parties would be governed. This is one of the points which was fixed by the decision in Robinson v. Mollett.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having, along with three Judges of the First Division of the Court, heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, in conformity with the opinion of a majority of Judges present at the hearing, find, as regards the first quantities of stock differences upon which are sued for in the present action, being those under dates 11th and 13th October 1883, that the orders therefor given by the defender to buy for him were duly executed by the pursuer, and that there is in respect of these a balance of £93, 10s. 6d. still resting owing by the defender: Further, as regards the other quantities of stock differences on which also are sued for in this action, find that these shares were parts of larger purchases made on behalf of the pursuer himself or for the general purposes of his business, and were not in implement of the alleged order to buy for the defender: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Decern against the defender for the said sum of £93, 10s. 6d., with interest thereon from the 7th day of March 1884 till paid: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action: Find no expenses other than those for which judgment has been already given in favour of the pursuer due to or by either party, and decern."

Revenue—Income-tax—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), schedule D, cases I. and II., Rule first—Deduction for value of premises occupied as dwelling-house.—A bank was charged with income-tax under schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, on certain premises belonging to it in which it carried on its business, and which were also to some extent occupied as dwelling-houses by the manager and agents, that accommodation being given by the bank to them as part of their emoluments. In assessing the bank for income-tax under schedule D, the Income-Tax Commissioners refused to allow deduction from the gross profits of the bank of the annual value of these premises, in so far as they were occupied as dwelling-houses. In an appeal held that the bank was entitled to deduct the value of the whole premises in question—the portions used as dwelling-houses not being beneficially enjoyed as such by the bank. No. 100.

1st Division.
M.

THE TOWN AND COUNTY BANK, LIMITED, Aberdeen, appealed against an assessment upon the sum of £1058, under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, for the year 1885-86, which had been confirmed by the Commissioners of Income-Tax for Aberdeenshire.

The point of law stated in the case was, “Whether the bank is entitled to deduct from its profits, before returning them for assessment under schedule D, the whole value of their bank premises, where such premises are in part occupied for residence by officers of the bank?”

The following facts were admitted:—“1. That the whole premises, both in Aberdeen and elsewhere, in which the appellants carry on business, are the property of the appellants, and that the appellants pay income-tax on these premises under schedule A of 5 and 6 Victoria, caput 35. 2. That the premises used as the head office of the bank in Aberdeen, and in the same way the premises used as the branch offices of the bank in the different places where they carry on business, contain certain accommodation occupied as a dwelling-house by the manager or resident agent of the bank, as the case may be. The said manager and agent receive said accommodation as part of their emolument in the service of the bank, but the annual value of this accommodation is not assessed to income-tax otherwise than under schedule A as aforesaid. 3. That the sum in question, i.e., the £1058, is the aggregate annual value of the portions of the said premises occupied by the officials or agents of the bank as their dwelling-houses. 4. That the sum in question, like the other sums on which tax has already been paid, had been deducted from the bank's profits before these were returned to the Income-Tax Commissioners for assessment under schedule D. 5. That the sum in question did not include any portion of the premises belonging to the bank used solely as counting-houses, but that deduction had also been made, and not objected to, from the bank's profits of the aggregate annual value of the portions of the bank's premises so used.”

The case further bore,—“The appellants contended that in the return submitted by them deduction had been properly made from the bank's profits of the sum representing the annual value of its premises occupied by its officials or agents as their dwelling-houses; that these dwelling-houses form the official residences of the agents, and are necessary for the proper carrying on of the business of the bank; that owing to the nature of the bank's business it is essential that a responsible official should reside on the bank premises, and that thus the whole premises belonging to and occupied by the bank or its officials or agents are used for the purposes of the bank's business. There is no necessity and no possibility for the bank as such having a dwelling-house merely for occupation. The whole premises are for the purposes of the bank business premises. The case is totally unlike one where a private banker both resides and carries on business in the same premises. The appellants have no dwelling-house in the sense of section 101, which must, in terms of section 100, be a dwelling-house in part used for the domestic or private purposes of the trader, and not one wholly used for the purposes of such trader's business. A dwelling-house is necessary for the private trader unconnected with trade prima facie, therefore the dwelling-house must be considered as simply part of his private expenditure, and not as

No. 100. an incident of trade expenditure, and the fact that he uses part of it in connection with his trade does not alter its character as his private dwelling-house. The provisions of section 101 obviate the hardness of this last conclusion. . . . Now, in the case of the appellants the general rule as for the private trader has no application. If a further duty is imposed on the sum of £1058, the appellants will be charged on that sum twice over. It has already paid duty under schedule A, and as the sum is for part of the value of the premises used by them for purposes necessary or incidental to their business as bankers, they are entitled to make the deduction in terms of Rule I, Cases I. and II., as being disbursements or expenses wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of their trade as bankers in earning their profits. . . .

"The Surveyor of Taxes maintained that under the rules of the Income-Tax Acts the deduction in question could not be allowed. That, according to the first rule of the first case of schedule D of 5 and 6 Victoria, caput 35, the duty had to be charged on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits 'without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed'; and that by the first rule,* applying to the first and second cases of schedule D of the above Act, it is expressly provided that no deduction shall be allowed 'for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, or any part of such dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern, not exceeding the proportion of the said rent or value hereinafter mentioned'; and section 101 of the same Act provides, inter alia,—'That nothing herein contained shall be construed to restrain any person . . . renting a dwelling-house, part whereof shall be used by him for the purposes of any trade or concern, or any profession, hereby charged, from deducting or setting off from the profits of such trade, concern, or profession, such sum, not exceeding two-third parts of the rent bona fide paid for such dwelling-house, with the appurtenances, as the said respective Commissioners shall, on due consideration, allow.' That in the present case the managers and agents represented the bank, and the parts of the bank's properties occupied by them as their private dwelling-houses must be held as occupied by the bank exactly the same as in the case of a private banker: Further, if the assessment were confirmed, the amount would not, as stated by the appellants, be charged twice over; but, on the contrary, if the bank's contention were given effect to, the sum in question, or an equivalent amount, would escape assessment altogether."

The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the above statement and from the opinions of the Judges.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts of the present case are very simple, and they

* The first rule applying to both the first case (i.e., "Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act"), and the second case, (i.e., in respect of professions, &c.) was, "In estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or of such profession, employment, or vocation; . . . nor for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern, not exceeding the proportion of the said rent or value hereinafter mentioned. . . ."

are stated very shortly in the case before us. The Town and County Bank carry on business in Aberdeen, and also in some other towns in the north of Scotland, and the whole premises, both in Aberdeen and elsewhere, in which they carry on business, are their own property. They pay income-tax upon the whole of these premises under schedule A of the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 35. The premises at the head-office of the bank in Aberdeen, and in the same way the premises used as the branch offices of the bank in the different places where they carry on business, contain certain accommodation occupied as a dwelling-house by the manager or resident agent of the bank, as the case may be. The manager or agent receives that accommodation as part of his emolument in the service of the bank. But the annual value of this accommodation is not assessed to income-tax otherwise than under schedule A, by which I understand is meant that the bank manager or bank agent who receives the accommodation as part of the emoluments of his office is not charged with income-tax under schedule E. I shall have something to say about the propriety of that arrangement by-and-by, but in the meantime I merely notice it in passing.

County Bank,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

The footing upon which the Income-Tax Commissioners make the assessment to which I have referred is that the part of the premises used as a dwelling-house by the servant of the bank is held to be a dwelling-house used by the bank itself in the same way as if the bank, being a private individual, really dwelt in these premises. They state it thus in the course of the case: They say that "by the first rule, applying to the first and second cases of schedule D of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, it is expressly provided that no deduction shall be allowed 'for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, or any part of such dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern'; and they contend that in the present case the managers and agents represented the bank, and the parts of the bank's properties occupied by them as their private dwelling-houses must be held as occupied by the bank exactly in the same way as in the case of a private banker."

Now, I am of opinion that that contention is not well founded, upon the construction of the particular rule which is referred to, viz., the first rule applicable to the first two cases under schedule D. Schedule D charges income-tax upon the profits of trade, and also upon the emoluments derived from any profession or calling. These are the two heads of schedule D. The first is, "Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule"; and the other case is, "The duty to be charged in respect of professions, employments, or vocations, not contained in any other schedule." It is important to observe that the rule which we have to construe here is applicable to both these cases under schedule D, both to the profits of trade and to the profits of professions or callings. In regard to the profits of trade, we have this general provision in the first rule applicable to the first case under the schedule, that "the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years." The duty is to be charged upon the balance of profit. Now, I do not apprehend that that term is used in this statute in any other sense than that in which it is used by traders and manufacturers in the management of their business and in the keeping of their books, and one has no difficulty in understanding what is meant by a balance of profits in a trader's books. It means the free balance left in name of profit after deducting the whole outlay and expenses. I know no other meaning of "balance of profits." The question therefore comes to be, in the first place, before we go to the particular rule we have to deal with, how the matter would be dealt with under this leading rule applicable to the assessment of profits on trade. Can it be doubted for one moment that the whole sums paid to the servants and officers of the bank are outlay to be deducted before striking the balance of profit? I do not think anybody could say that that is not so. The circumstance that the emoluments may come either in the shape of money or in some other shape—some advantage to the servant or manager—can make no sort of difference. If it costs the employer so much money to secure the services of the officer or manager, that is just an outlay that must be charged against the profits before you can strike a balance. And therefore, in the present case, when dealing with those leading words of schedule D, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that, although part of the emoluments of the bank agent or the bank manager may be the enjoyment of a dwelling-house free of rent, that is just part of his emoluments, and part of the charges against the bank in striking a balance of profits.

We come next to the particular rule upon which the Income-tax Commissioners found their deliverance, and that is the first of the two rules applicable to both the first and second cases under schedule D. The form of this rule is to prohibit deductions of certain things in estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases—that is to say, the profits or gains charged according to the rule applicable to the two cases of trading profits, and of professions and employments. Now, there are four things embraced in this rule which, it is provided, shall not be deducted in estimating the balance of profit, and it so happens that the one we are more particularly concerned with is the third of these four. I shall take the liberty of asking attention, in the first place, to the other heads of prohibited deductions before I come to the one in question. The first is this,—there is to be no deduction "for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or of such profession, employment, or vocation." That is the first of them. One would have said that this was hardly a necessary provision, for it is involved in the enactment that the tax is to be levied upon the free balance of profit. The second is this,—there is to be no deduction "for any disbursements or expenses of maintenance of the parties, their families, or establishments." Now, I apprehend, there can be no doubt about what is meant by the parties. It means the trader or traders who are carrying on the business. There is to be no deduction of any disbursements or expenses for their own maintenance, or the maintenance of their families or establishments. And then the fourth is this,—there is to be no deduction "for any sum expended in any other domestic or private purposes distinct from the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or of such profession, employment, or vocation." Now, taking these three together, I think they may all be described shortly in this way, that there is to be a careful distinction made between money that is expended for the proper purposes of the trade and money that is expended for any other—for any domestic or other similar purposes. The maintenance of the trader himself or his family, or of his establishment, is thrown entirely out of the question. It is only the outgoing—the outlay—which is rendered necessary for trade purposes, that falls to be deducted in striking the balance of profits. No. 100.

Now, it is, as it were, in the very heart of this same rule that we find the words which are founded on by the Income-Tax Commissioners, and they are these,—“Nor for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, or any part of such dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern.” That is quite in accordance with the other provisions of this rule, and it must be read in connection with them in order to see what is intended. The Income-Tax Commissioners say, that if an officer of the bank occupies a dwelling-house, then that is a dwelling-house within the meaning of this rule, although it may be given to him as part of his wages or emoluments, and so be directly and not merely in substance, but also in form, an outlay for the purpose of carrying on the trade. That would be entirely inconsistent with the general scope of the rule in my opinion, and would be to introduce into the middle of that set of provisions which I have just described a provision of a totally different description. It appears to me plain that the value of the dwelling-house which is not to be deducted is the value of the dwelling-house of the trader himself, and that in using that language the Legislature has really in view—mainly, at least—the fact that a trader or a professional man may use one part of his house for the purpose of his trade or business and another part for domestic purposes, and, accordingly, they distinguish between the two and say,—So far as you devote a proportion of your house to trade purposes or professional purposes exclusively, you shall be entitled to deduct that, because that is an outlay connected with your trade, but so far as you yourself dwell in it and keep a domestic establishment in it you shall not be entitled to any deduction. That is plainly the true meaning of this clause, and, applying it to the present case, I cannot doubt that this is a good deduction which is proposed, because it is not the dwelling-house of the trader. No part of the premises is occupied by the trader. The part of the premises which is occupied as a dwelling-house is simply given as part of the emoluments or wages of an officer of the bank.

The mistake, I think, which the Income-Tax Commissioners have committed, and which, we are told, prevails in practice, in some places at least, is that they have got the income-tax applicable to the occupation of this dwelling-house from the wrong person. They are not entitled to charge the bank as the owner of the premises and as the trader in this way, by refusing to deduct the value of this part of the wages of their officer, but they are quite entitled to charge against the officer himself, who occupies these premises, the income-tax upon the value of his occupation. The case of a bank-agent falls quite clearly within the provisions of schedule E, for there it is provided that the duties shall be charged “on the persons respectively having, using, or exercising the offices or employments of profit mentioned in the said schedule, or to whom the annuities, pensions, or stipends mentioned in the same schedule shall be payable, for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever” accruing by reason of such offices or employments. It cannot be doubted that this house occupied by the officer of the bank is a perquisite or profit belonging to his office. I think, therefore, the determination of the Commissioners must be reversed.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add to the statement your Lordship has made of the grounds of our judgment.

LORD ADAM.—The sum upon which the Crown proposes to assess amounts to £1058, and what that sum is appears clearly from the third article of the case. It is the aggregate annual value of the portions of the premises occupied by the officials or agents of the bank as their dwelling-houses, and if we go back to the second article of the case we find this fact stated, that these houses "contain certain accommodation occupied as a dwelling-house by the manager or resident agent of the bank, as the case may be." And then it is said,—“The said manager and agent receive said accommodation as part of their emolument in the service of the bank.” Now, that appears to me to shew clearly that, so far as expense to the bank was concerned, it mattered nothing as in a question of profits whether the bank paid their officers entirely in money or gave them so much of their emoluments in money and so much in accommodation. The expense to the bank in either case would be entirely the same. That being so, the question we have to deal with arises on the first rule of the first case of schedule D, and it says this, that the duty to be charged in respect of profits shall be paid on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, and so on.

Now, what is meant by the balance of such profits and gains? I cannot but think that if this bank was making up a balance-sheet, altogether apart from revenue statutes or anything else, the only way it could arrive at a balance would be to strike off the whole expense of earning the profit, and that the salaries or emoluments paid to their servants in so doing, and also the expense of the necessary office accommodation, must necessarily be deducted by the bank before striking the balance. And I think it would matter nothing—it would be a mere matter of accounting and figures—whether the deduction was made in the shape of increased emoluments, paid all in money, or whether the deduction was made as so much money and so much value given to the officials in the matter of house rent or house accommodation. The result as it concerns the bank would be entirely the same in arriving at the amount of profit out of which a dividend was to be paid. Therefore, altogether apart from these revenue statutes, I should entertain no doubt at all that the whole of this sum would form a proper deduction before the profits were arrived at.

But then the revenue statute says, that upon the full amount of the balance of profits so ascertained income-tax shall be paid “without any other deduction than is hereinafter allowed,” and the curious thing, so far as I can see, is that there is no deduction allowed at all except by way of exception. The construction of the statute is to prohibit deductions, excepting so-and-so and so-and-so, from which we may draw the inference that that deduction is to be allowed. That is the frame of the statute, and accordingly in the third clause it sets out,—deductions not to be allowed for so-and-so,—and then we come to the case of professions, which is the second case, and the rules applying to both the preceding cases. It also proceeds on the same footing of deductions not to be allowed on the first and second cases, and we find it says this, that in estimating the balance of profits and gains to be charged according to either the first or the second case, no sum shall be set against or deducted from such profits or gains,—and then comes the deduction, “not being money wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade,” and so on, from which the inference is direct, that money wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade shall be deducted. Now, in asking myself whether the expense to the bank of house accommodation is a necessary disbursement, I think it is beyond doubt that that money was exclusively laid out and expended for the purposes of their business, and therefore this exemption falls directly under that first rule. No. 100.

The second rule does not bear directly upon this matter. The next branch of the same rule goes on to say, as before, that no deduction is to be made "for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, or any part of such dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern, not exceeding the proportion of the said rent or value hereinafter mentioned." I entirely agree with your Lordship that that rule does not apply to the present question. In my view no part of these premises is occupied as a dwelling-house by the party who is being assessed. I think this rule is meant to apply to the case of a person who actually occupies the dwelling-house. If the party actually occupying the dwelling-house happens also to occupy a portion of it for his business purposes, then, and in that case, he is to be allowed that deduction only, but that is not the case we have to deal with at all, because the bank occupy no part of their premises as their dwelling-house. So far as they are concerned, the whole of these premises are occupied solely for the purposes of the bank. I therefore agree entirely with your Lordship in the result at which you have arrived.

With reference to the question whether or no the occupants of those parts of the bank occupied as a dwelling-house are assessable under schedule E, I see no reason to doubt that what your Lordship has said is sound, but as some of those officials, if the Crown are to lay hold upon them, may have something to say upon the subject, I would rather reserve my opinion.

LORD MURE was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT accordingly reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to allow the deduction claimed, with expenses.

MESSRS ALLEY & M'LELLAN, engineers in Glasgow, contracted with Mr Josiah M'Gregor, C.E., to build certain boats for an Indian Navigation Company. Alley & M'Leilan gave out a subcontract for the hulls to Messrs Russell & Company, Port-Glasgow. In the execution of the contract alterations and additions were made, giving rise to a claim for extras. The amount truly due was disputed, but, in order to get delivery of the boats, M'Gregor and Alley & M'Leilan agreed to deposit £1589, 10s. to abide the issue of an arbitration. M'Gregor paid his half of this sum, viz., £794, 15s. to Alley & M'Leilan. The money was deposited in bank in the names of Russell & Company and Alley & M'Leilan. Eventually £139, 4s. only was found due, and M'Gregor called upon Alley & M'Leilan to repay him the balance of his deposit. They agreed to pay him all but a sum of £186, 8s. 2d., which they claimed as due to them in respect of expenses incurred by them in the arbitration. 2D DIVISION.

Mr M'Gregor raised an action against Alley & M'Lellan for payment of £186, 8s. 2d. The latter averred that it had been arranged that the same arbiters should determine the amount of this claim.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 20th November 1886, found that the defenders were bound to restore the deposit libelled, and decerned against them accordingly.*

The defenders reclaimed.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The object for which the deposit was made was satisfied, and the conditions on which it was made were purified. That being so, I think the Lord Ordinary was right.

LORD YOUNG.—I can see no interest that the parties have in bringing this question, unless there is a doubt about the pursuer's solvency. The defenders say that they are entitled to have the balance retained as a security for the payment of the amount which may be found due to them by an arbiter in adjudicating on their claim for £186. They have no right to have security for that undetermined claim. The whole balance must be given up, except what is needed for the object for which it was deposited.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. This was the view which was taken lately in the unreported case of Foster, Alcock, & Company. The Court found, and found without difficulty, that parties were not entitled to turn a deposit made for one purpose into a security to cover another.

On behalf of Mr M'Gregor, Mr Dickson expressed a willingness, if I should favour that view, to have the account investigated in some way—taxed—and as a matter of concession dealt with in this action. But that proposal has not been accepted by the defenders, who maintain that this process ought to be sisted, and the pursuer kept out of his money till they shall somehow or other get it ascertained that the account is to go to arbitration. ALEXANDER EDWARD BRODDLIUS, of Gothenburg, Sweden, and his mandatary in this country, raised an action for payment of £460, 7s. 8d. in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against Rudolph O. Grischotti. The pursuer was holder of a promissory-note for 6000 kroner granted by the defender, of which the following is a translation, viz. :—

"Three months after notice I promise to pay to Mr C. M. Grischotti or order the sum of six thousand kroner (6000 kroner), with interest of five per cent per annum until payment is made, value received.

"Gothenburg, the 1st May 1876.

RUDOLPH O. GRISCHOTTI."

This note was blank indorsed by Mr C. M. Grischotti. 6000 kroner are equal to £330, 15s. 2d., and the sum sued for was made up by adding to the principal interest since 1st May 1878, when the last payment of interest was made.

Formal notice requiring payment was made in Gothenburg on 8th June 1880.

The note, when produced in this action, bore a stamp, which was cancelled by the figures 2/3/86 being written over it.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The note is prescribed. (3) The note not being duly stamped is null.

In support of this latter plea he averred :—"The said document, if a note, is null, it not having been duly stamped before it was presented for payment, or indorsed, transferred, or negotiated in the United Kingdom. In particular, and without prejudice to said generality, it was not duly stamped when presented by the Bank of Scotland for and on behalf of the pursuer to defender for payment, on or about 9th March 1881, nor when it was negotiated and payment demanded by Huth & Company, London, Mr Gray, of J. Findlay & Co., Glasgow, both for and on behalf of the pursuer, and by the present agents of the pursuer." He further stated that a litigation was going on in Sweden between the pursuer and persons claiming right to the document, and that he (the defender) had been interpellated from paying to the pursuer.

The pursuer denied these averments, and pleaded that they were irrelevant.

 Grischotti.

The defender appealed, and argued ;—(1) On the question of prescription. The only authority in Scots law¹ laid down that the limitation in the case of a bill payable on demand ran from the date of the bill, and were it otherwise the policy of the statute would be defeated, for by keeping up a bill like this the creditor might make it last for forty years. The authority of an English text writer supported the principle of this decision in the case of bills payable “at sight,” or “on demand.”² The difference between the rule of English law, referred to by the Sheriff, and that of Scots law arose from the difference of the expressions in the statutes. The English statute referred to “cause of action,” and no “cause of action” arose till a demand was actually made. The Scots statute referred to the date at which the note “becomes exigible.”³ There was a debt due here, and certum est quod certum reddi potest.⁴

On the question of stamping, it was maintained that a bill once presented without a stamp was null, and could never found an action. From the terms of the 54th section of the Stamp Act, 1870, it was clear that the presentation of an unstamped bill involved a penalty on the presenter. It was therefore not duly stamped at the time of its execution, and the 17th section imposed a nullity.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that it has been made out here that the bill is null under the statute. It is said to be vitiated because it was presented to the debtor by the Bank of Scotland without a stamp. The fact is not being duly stamped, is null. The question under the former of these pleas depends on whether the sexennial limitation of bills and notes, in the case of a note made payable a certain time after notice (which may be taken as equivalent to after demand), runs from the expiration of the stipulated period after the date of the bill, or from that period after the date of demand. This depends on the construction of section 37 of the Act 12 Geo. III. chap. 72, providing that ‘no bill or note shall be effectual to produce diligence or action, unless the diligence be raised, or action commenced, within six years from and after the terms at which the sums in the said bills or notes become exigible.’ I am of opinion that the sum in a bill or note like this does not become exigible till the expiration of the period after the date of demand, and therefore that the prescriptive period does not begin to run till then. It was contended that the present case is governed by the principle of the decision in Stephenson v. Stephenson's Trustees, 1807, Morr. Bills of Exchange, App. No. 20, where it was held that in a bill payable on demand prescription runs from its date. Without entering into the grounds of that decision, I think it enough to say that to make the period of prescription run from a certain time after the date of such a bill as that in the present case, and not from the expiration of that period after demand, would, in my opinion, be to make it run from a different date from that when the bill was exigible. The view I take is in accordance with the well-settled rule in England, and although I have proceeded simply on a construction of the Act of 1772, there is obvious expediency in having the rule in Scotland the same as in England.

“As regards the question of stamp, the note as produced in process is duly stamped, and the fact, if it be one, that at some period of its currency it was not duly stamped, would not render it null. If indeed the pursuer had received it in payment or otherwise not duly stamped, he might, under the 54th section of the Stamp Act, have been disabled from recovering on it, but no averment to that effect is made. The plea of nullity must therefore be repelled.”

that it was stamped subsequently, but it is said that the bill in all its stages after presentation without a stamp is a nullity. I am unable to find any words in the statute to justify that contention.

Grischotti.

On the question of prescription, the Sheriff says the period would run from the date of the demand for payment, and that that is the rule recognised in England. There is an old case in Morrison, which decides that the limitation, for it is a limitation and not a prescription, in the case of a bill payable on demand, will run from the date of the bill, but I observe that Mr Bell in his Principles, sec. 595, says that in the case of a bill payable at sight the terminus a quo of the limitation is still matter of question. My impression is that the limitation should not begin to run till the date of the demand for payment.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment.

Poor—Relief—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 70.—An Irishman having no settlement in Scotland, being found destitute in the parish of Ardochattan, was sent to the combination poorhouse for the parishes of Ardochattan, Kilmore, and others, at Oban, in the parish of Kilmore. After remaining some months in the house the pauper applied to the governor for leave of absence for a night to attend a wedding, and asked for his own clothes to go in. The governor told him that he could not give him leave of absence for a night, but in the belief that he wished to leave the poorhouse finally, gave him his clothes. The pauper then left the house, but returned the same afternoon. The governor refused to admit him without an order. Next morning the pauper applied to the inspector of Kilmore, who gave him an order form, with blanks to be filled up by the medical officer and by the inspector, and sent him to the medical officer. After seeing the medical officer, who filled up the blanks requiring to be filled up by him, the pauper returned to the poorhouse and was admitted, the inspector not having filled in any blanks. The governor made no new entry in the admission-book. Held that the pauper had not ceased to be an inmate of the poorhouse chargeable to the parish of Ardochattan, and had not become chargeable to Kilmore.

object of parochial relief, to the Lorn Combination Poorhouse, to which I. the parish of Ardochattan is a contributor. That poorhouse is at Oban, in the parish of Kilmore. The pauper remained there till 19th January 1885, when he applied to the governor, George Sinclair, for leave of absence for a night to attend a wedding in Oban; he also asked for his own clothes to wear at the wedding. By the rules of the Board of Supervision the governors of poorhouses may give leave of absence occasionally for a few hours during the day, but not during the night unless for urgent reasons. The governor therefore did not give leave of absence, but, at the request of the pauper, gave him his clothes and let him leave the house.*

* The rules of the Board of Supervision as to the admission of paupers and leave of absence and dismissal are as follows, viz. :—

" 21. Every poor person who shall be admitted as an inmate into the poorhouse, either upon a first or any subsequent admission, shall be admitted by a written or printed order signed by an inspector, or by some other person duly

It did not appear whether the pauper had been invited to a wedding or whether he was suffering from an insane delusion. He returned, however, to the poorhouse the same afternoon and asked to be readmitted. The governor, however, refused to admit him without an order, and early next morning the pauper, under the advice of the Roman Catholic clergyman, applied to the inspector of Kilmore, Mr M'Craig, for an order for admission. Mr M'Craig gave him an order form, which contained a number of blanks, some of which required to be filled up by the medical officer and some by the inspector of poor, and sent him to the doctor. The doctor filled up the blanks which it was his duty to fill up, and the pauper went with this form to the poorhouse and was re-admitted. The blanks which fell to be filled up by the inspector were not filled up. The governor made no new entry of the pauper's name in the list of inmates.

Some time afterwards the pauper became insane and was removed to an asylum. The cost of his removal was borne by M'Craig, inspector of Kilmore. For reimbursement of this sum, and to determine the liability for the pauper in the future, the inspector of Kilmore raised an action against the inspector of Ardochattan, concluding for declarator that the defender was liable to the pursuer for his advances for Power, and for payment.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The said pauper having been found destitute in the defender's parish, and having been continuously chargeable since November 1884, the defender is liable for his maintenance.

The defender pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances stated, the pauper ceased to be chargeable to the defender's parish when he left the poorhouse at Oban on 19th January 1885. (2) The pauper having been properly and regularly discharged from the poorhouse at Oban on the 19th January 1885, the defender's parish then ceased to be chargeable for his maintenance. (3) The defender should be assoilzied, in respect that the pauper was found destitute in the pursuer's parish, and was admitted to the poorhouse upon the pursuer's order.

At the proof the governor of the poorhouse deponed,—“On 19th January 1885 Power asked to leave the poorhouse to attend a wedding. He asked for his own clothing to enable him to attend the wedding. This would be about eleven o'clock in the forenoon. I asked him if to-morrow would authorised by the house committee, or by a parochial board having a right to send poor persons to the poorhouse, to sign such order, and not otherwise.

“40. Twenty-four hours after having intimated to the house governor a desire to be dismissed from the poorhouse, or sooner if the house governor shall think fit, any adult inmate, not a dependant of any inmate, may quit the poorhouse; but no inmate shall carry away any clothes or other article belonging to the poorhouse without the express permission of the house governor or matron; and no poor person dismissed from the poorhouse, or so quitting it, shall again be received therein except in the mode prescribed in article 21 for the admission of poor persons.

“Appendix 12. . . . The board could not approve of a rule which would secure to all the inmates of a poorhouse, or to any class or section of them, leave of absence from the poorhouse on certain specified days recurring periodically, or what are called ‘liberty days.’ But they are of opinion that the house committee may authorise the house governor to give, if he shall see fit, to any inmate who shall state reasonable grounds for the request, permission to be absent from the poorhouse for a limited number of hours during any day; subject, however, to conditions and provisions similar to those above stated with reference to leave of absence for the purpose of attending divine worship; and provided, moreover, that leave of absence for any other purpose shall not be given to any inmate more than once in thirty days, or such other number of days as the house committee shall determine, nor during the night, unless in special circumstances and for reasons ascertained to be urgent.”

not suit him, giving me the twenty-four hours' notice required by the Board of Supervision. He said no; he wanted to get his clothing and leave the poorhouse to attend the wedding. He went. He came back the same day seeking readmission without an order. I refused till he produced an order. I always require an order for readmission. The Board of Supervision requires it. By the Court.—Paupers are sometimes allowed to leave for a few hours, but in this case Power got his clothing and dismissed himself. I look on that as a permanent leaving. Examination continued.—Next day, the 20th, he came back with the document No. 27 [the order form], and I let him in. I made no fresh entry of his name in the admission-book. (Q.) Why not? (A.) Because I considered him a pauper chargeable to the same parish as on the previous day. If he had been two nights absent I would have made a fresh entry. By the Court.—Though he brought an order from a different parish I considered him chargeable to the same parish as before. I noticed that the particulars were not entered at the foot of No. 27. This was necessary to complete it, but I had these particulars in the order from Ardchattan. (Q.) You thought the two together enabled you to let him in? (A.) Yes. If he had been two nights absent from the house I would have made a fresh entry in my book. The parish would have benefited a day by his being two nights absent. (Q.) If there had been one clear day of twenty-four hours during which he was not in the house, it would have been necessary to make a fresh entry? (A.) Yes; that was my reason for doing what I did.”

The pauper's health had not materially improved up to January; he was as much a proper object of relief then as when he was admitted.

On 25th November 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds (1) that the pauper, Mark Power, was, on 19th January 1885, discharged from the combination poorhouse, into which he had been received on the order of the inspector of the parish of Ardchattan; (2) that he was so discharged on his own application, and in conformity with the rules made by the Board of Supervision in the exercise of their statutory powers; (3) that the pauper was readmitted to the same combination poorhouse on the order of the parish of Kilmore, represented in this action by the pursuer; (4) that the pauper had no settlement in either of these parishes; (5) that, in these circumstances, the parish of Kilmore has no claim of relief against the parish of Ardchattan: Therefore assolvies the defender from the conclusions of the summons,” &c.*

* “OPINION.— . . . The facts which I find to be proved are these:—That on the 25th of November the pauper Mark Power, who was an Irishman, was found in the parish of Ardchattan in a state of destitution, and was, upon his application, admitted to the combination poorhouse, to which that parish is a contributor, in the town of Oban. He continued in the poorhouse, being relieved at the expense of the parish of Ardchattan, until the 19th of January 1885—a period of nearly two months. Beyond all doubt he was in the receipt of relief under the 70th section of the statute. On the 19th of January he applied to the governor for leave of absence for a night. The governor, according to his own statement, with which I am perfectly satisfied in all respects, explained to the pauper that he could not be allowed leave of absence for a night, and offered him leave of absence for a reasonable period during the day. The pauper would not accept that offer. He wished to leave the poorhouse for a night, stating that he wished to attend a wedding that was to take place that evening, and insisted on having his clothes, although informed that, if he left the poorhouse, he would require to apply again for readmission. In these circumstances, the governor, exercising the discretion which the statute gives to him of dispensing with notice, gave the pauper his clothes and discharged him. I hold it proved that the pauper was discharged from the poorhouse animo et

The pursuer reclaimed. He argued that the case of *Taylor v. Strachan*¹ was really in his favour, for the state of facts on which that case was de-facto by the governor, and that he could not be received into the poorhouse again except by a new application under the 70th section of the statute.

"Then, on the following day, the pauper was desirous of being readmitted—[His Lordship here referred to the circumstances which led to the pauper's readmission to the poorhouse.] It is quite clear that the fact that Power had been admitted was brought to the knowledge of the inspector, and, in the circumstances, I cannot in the least doubt that he was admitted under an order issued by the assistant inspector, who is a person falling within the description of the 'other officer of the parish' in the 70th section; that he was rightly admitted under his order; and that under the statute the parish would be bound, if it is a case within the statute, to continue the administration of relief so long as the pauper continued to be an object of parochial relief.

"Then the man became insane in the month of February, and was—no matter upon whose application—sent to the County Lunatic Asylum. The question is, which parish is bound to maintain him? . . . If I were to interpret the statute without reference to decisions, I should say that a person once admitted to the poorhouse under the 70th section must continue to be chargeable so long as he shall remain in that state of bodily or mental infirmity which renders him a proper object of parochial relief. I should also hold that as soon as the pauper becomes able-bodied, and being in possession of intelligence to be at large, demands his discharge, he must be discharged; and, whether he demands it or not, he must be discharged, because it is no longer a proper application of the parochial rates to maintain him in idleness in the poorhouse. This, although not expressed in the statute, is to be read into it as an obvious and necessary qualification of its terms. But that, again, is not a case which occurs here; because I am quite satisfied that, during the interval of twenty-four hours which elapsed between the discharge of Power on the 19th of January and his readmission on the 20th, the man continued to be in the same state of infirmity which entitled him to be admitted, and that he never recovered, but, on the contrary, became more and more infirm until his mind became affected, and he had to be removed to the lunatic asylum.

"I must, however, consider how this statute has been interpreted, and I think that the case of Taylor v. Strachan, which has been referred to, is a direct decision upon this point, because in that case also a pauper had obtained relief, under the authority of the 70th section of the Act, from the parish of Urquhart, was maintained for a few days,—it does not matter in this question whether it is days or weeks or months,—and was discharged upon his own application. There was a question whether he had not been sent out by the inspector for the purpose of transferring him to another parish, but the Judges unanimously negatived the suggestion to that effect, and held that he was discharged on his own application, just as Power was discharged in this case. He then came to the parish of Huntly, just as this man came to Kilmore, and applied for an order of admission to the poorhouse in that parish. It was held that Urquhart was not bound to relieve Huntly. Now, the view upon which the Court proceeded there was that the 70th section of the statute must be taken to contain the implied condition, that the liability was only to continue so long as the pauper desired to remain in the poorhouse; that, if he left of his own accord, just as in the case where he becomes able-bodied, it would not be the duty of the parish to support him; being discharged on his own application and as of right, the obligation in that case equally comes to an end. There is no duty on the part of the parish to maintain a pauper unless he desires to obtain parochial relief. It is not an unconditional duty, but only a duty which subsists so long as the pauper desires it. That qualification of the statute, I think, was admitted in the case of Taylor v. Strachan (Nov. 8, 1864, 3 M. 34, 37 Scot. Jur. 16) very clearly; and accordingly the only question was whether the pauper terminated was that the pauper had become convalescent, and had ceased, temporarily, to be a proper object of relief. So long as the pauper continued to be a proper object of relief, the parish where relief was originally given continued liable. Further, this was a case of leave of absence, not of dismissal, and it had been so treated by the governor at the time. It would be an intolerable hardship if all the paupers in the house who had no settlement otherwise, if they left the combination poorhouse for a few hours, were to become chargeable to Kilmore.

Argued for the defender;—No doubt the existence of a poorhouse in a particular parish might be a source of hardship to that parish, e.g., if young paupers were born there.¹ But the matter of fact alone must be considered; where was this pauper found destitute?—and undoubtedly that was in Kilmore. If any other rule than that of looking to the fact were applied the consequence might be, as was pointed out in Taylor's case, that where you were dealing with a tramp, you might have to inquire as to his health and the circumstances of his relief in half-a-dozen parishes.² What had happened here was truly a dismissal.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The impression on my mind is that this case is considerably too narrow to be brought within any of the categories mentioned in support of the reclaiming note. I must say, however, that it would be a very great boon if some more economical and less cumbrous method of settling such questions of liability could be devised.

I entirely accept the principle of Taylor's case. But what was there decided was, that when relief is given in respect that a person in need of relief is found in the parish, having no claim upon it otherwise, it does not follow that the liability continues if the pauper leaves that parish and wanders into another. That was decided under the reservation that there should be no collusion or unfair dealing in the matter.

The present case does not involve that principle in the least. The parish of Ardochattan, as was its duty, gave relief to the pauper, and gave it by sending him to the combination poorhouse in Oban, and there he remained till the 13th February, when he became insane and was sent to an asylum. The question is, who is to be liable for his support there? It is said that the parish of Ardochattan is liable till the parish of settlement is ascertained, and, as there is no such settlement, it must continue liable to the end.

had not been sent on to another parish for the purpose of evading liability. If that been held proved, the parish of Urquhart would not have been allowed to escape liability, because, under the authority of the previous case of Brown v. Gemmell (29th May 1851, 13 D. 1009, 23 Scot. Jur. 464), it was held that such a proceeding would have been an evasion of the statutory obligation of maintenance.

"Therefore, having regard to the case of Taylor v. Strachan, I come to the conclusion that when the pauper in this case was discharged on his own application, and, as I expressly find, not with any view on the part of the governor of relieving the parish of Ardochattan, then the obligation under the 70th section came to an end; and that the parish which thereafter admitted him to receipt of parochial relief admitted him under the obligation of section 70, and is therefore liable to maintain him so long as he remains a proper object of parochial relief. It is not disputed that from the time of this man's admission on the 20th of January 1885, he has been a proper object of parochial relief; and I hold that he must continue to be maintained by the parish of Kilmore."

Sinclair.

I shall not say what might have been the result if the circumstances of his leaving the house had been more important or significant. In point of fact I do not think that he ever left the house—that is, ever gave up his residence there. That comes out quite clearly to my mind in the evidence of the governor of the poorhouse as to his reason for not making a fresh entry in the admission book. It is clear that he did not consider that the rules of the poorhouse had been so infringed, or that the resolution of the pauper had been so clearly taken, as to involve a dismissal from the house altogether. I think that there was no break in the continuity of his residence by leaving the house as he did for a few hours.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree, and I think that the opinion just expressed by your Lordship is the opinion upon which the Lord Ordinary would have acted if it had not been for the view he took of Taylor's case. The opinion he expresses, but for his reference to that case, is exactly that which your Lordship has expressed and which I entertain, with this qualification only, that I cannot assume as a fact that this man was ever discharged from the poorhouse, so as to bring in the application of the 40th clause of the rules which have been referred to. I think that he did not apply for his discharge, and, in point of fact, was not discharged. I think that he applied for leave of absence to attend a wedding, and also asked leave to wear his own clothes during his temporary absence. I cannot interpret that request and the granting of it as asking a discharge from the poorhouse and getting it. I regard the case as one where the pauper continued to be chargeable as really as he could be, was absolutely destitute and helpless all the time, asked for leave of absence for a few hours and got it, and then came back and was readmitted, not that day but next day, without a new order, for I cannot call this form which was filled up by the inspector of Kilmore an order.

That being the case, I think the facts were quite different from those of Taylor's case.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I think that there is no doubt that, interpreting the evidence of the governor in its natural way, there was no dismissal; that the pauper never took his dismissal; and that his discharge was never, in point of fact, effected. The true reading is, that he left the poorhouse simply to attend a wedding, and that is the view which the governor took at the time.

By policy of insurance, dated at Dundee 20th September 1884, granted by the Northern Marine Insurance Company, Limited, in favour of David Hunter and others, registered owners of the barque "Afton," the company, in respect of premiums therein stipulated, insured the "Afton" to the amount of £500. Under the policy it was agreed that the insurance should be upon the cargo, hull, materials, &c. of the ship, "lost or not lost, at and from port or ports, ^{and/or} place or places, in any order, in Java, to any port or ports of call ^{and/or} discharge in the United Kingdom, or France, or United States, and while in port during thirty days after arrival, including all risk of docking while in dock, and undocking and shifting docks, as might be required at any time during the currency of the policy."

There were two other policies on the ship, which contained clauses similar to that above quoted. These policies were both underwritten by various underwriters.

The "Afton" sailed on the voyage covered by these policies, and arrived at Greenock on her return journey on 22d January 1885, where she was berthed in the Victoria Harbour, and discharged her cargo there.

On 6th February she left the Victoria Harbour and was put into Caird's Graving Dock for repairs. That dock was a private dock, and was not part of the public works of the port, though it was locally situated between two of those works.

Her repairs having been executed, she left Caird's Dock on 12th February, being towed out by a tug, and started for Glasgow, where she was to get a new cargo.

While being so towed, and when she had reached the fairway of the navigable channel of the river (which at that point comes close to the shore to avoid the bank in the river known as Greenock Bank), exactly opposite Caird's Dock, she was struck by a squall, which caused her to capsize. She then drifted on to the bank, opposite the Custom-House Steamboat Quay. She was subsequently raised, but was found to be considerably damaged. The cost of raising her, and of the repairs executed on her, amounted to £5890, 16s. 3d.

On 19th February 1886 her owners raised an action in the Court of Session against the Northern Marine Insurance Company and the underwriters of the other two policies, in which they concluded for payment by the Insurance Company of the sum of £310, 0s. 11d., the proportion of the £5890, 16s. 3d. alleged to be payable by them under their policy, and for payment by the underwriters of their several proportions of that sum.

The facts above stated were not disputed.

She then drifted on to the bank, opposite the Custom-House Steamboat Quay. She was subsequently raised, but was found to be considerably damaged. The cost of raising her, and of the repairs executed on her, amounted to £5890, 16s. 3d.

On 19th February 1886 her owners raised an action in the Court of Session against the Northern Marine Insurance Company and the underwriters of the other two policies, in which they concluded for payment by the Insurance Company of the sum of £310, 0s. 11d., the proportion of the £5890, 16s. 3d. alleged to be payable by them under their policy, and for payment by the underwriters of their several proportions of that sum.

The facts above stated were not disputed.

The pursuers averred;—"The port of Greenock, in the ordinary commercial sense of the term, and as known in mercantile and maritime custom and usage, embraces that part of the river Clyde, or estuary

No. 104. thereof, which lies between White Farland Point on the west and Garvel Point on the east, and from the shore or south bank of the Clyde on the south to and including the said sandbank on the north, and at all events it embraces and includes the place where the 'Afton' capsized."

The defenders denied that averment, and explained that "at the time of the accident the 'Afton' was not in the port of Greenock, but in the navigable channel of the Clyde. She had left the port of Greenock, and she was on a voyage from Greenock to Glasgow, and was not covered by the policies founded on. Explained further, that the pursuers themselves all along understood that the place where the 'Afton' capsized was not within the port of Greenock, and that the pursuers made no claim on the defenders at or for a considerable period after the date of the accident, but claimed from other underwriters who had insured said vessel for the pursuers on a risk commencing on the expiry of the defenders' policies. In so claiming, the pursuers acted on their understanding that the place where the 'Afton' capsized was not within the port of Greenock, and that the defenders' policies had expired before the accident. There is no such custom or usage as alleged."

The pursuers pleaded;—2. The loss sustained by the pursuers being a loss by a risk insured against by the said policies, the pursuers are entitled to decrees as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—2. The pursuers having sustained no loss insured against by the policies founded on, the defenders should be assolized. 3. The vessel not having been covered by the policies founded on when the loss occurred, in respect (1) she was not then in the port of Greenock, et separatim (2), whether in the port of Greenock or not, she had entered on a new voyage from Greenock to Glasgow, the defenders should be assolized.

Proof was led on 13th July 1886, the evidence being directed to the question, what, in the popular or commercial sense (i.e., as understood by ship-owners, seamen, underwriters, and merchants), were the limits of the port of Greenock. The following facts appeared from the proof:—The bay of Greenock is shut in by White Farland Point on the west and Garvel Point on the east, the distance between the points being about two miles. These points have become in later years less apparent, as the artificial works in the harbour have brought the receding land of the bay almost into a straight line between these projecting points. Opposite Greenock a long bank extends down the river at a few hundred yards' distance from the shore. The navigable fairway of the river runs between the Greenock shore and the bank. The westmost termination of this bank is a well-known anchorage for large ships, and is known as "the Tail of the Bank." The river at this point is about three miles broad, Roseneath being opposite Greenock on the northern bank. The result of the evidence of the pursuers' witnesses, who were men engaged in a business capacity in the port, or merchants, &c. who did business in the port, may be thus summarised: They all agreed that in the commercial sense of the term the navigable fairway opposite and between White Farland and Garvel Points was in the port of Greenock. Some stated that on the north the port was bounded by the bank, and included the Tail of the Bank, while others (e.g., Mr Walker, shipbroker, Greenock) said that it extended as far northwards as the buoy at Roseneath, i.e., nearly to the north bank of the river. The defenders' witnesses, who were also business men, merchants, and underwriters, all stated that in their opinion the use of the words "port of Greenock" was confined to the artificial docks, harbours, and works on the Greenock shore, vested in the Greenock Harbour Trustees under the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866. From the evidence No. 104. it was apparent that in the earlier parts of the century ships were in the habit of loading and unloading in the fairway off Greenock, but the practice had been discontinued of late, only one witness, Mr Campbell (who had for sixteen years been a member of the Greenock Harbour Trust, and had been acquainted with Greenock all his life), deponing that he had seen ships discharging and unloading there within "the last few years," but it has not been frequent since the deeper harbours were made." There was evidence that ships were even now in the habit of wholly or partially unloading at the Tail of the Bank.

The evidence on the question whether the port of Greenock authorities exercised jurisdiction over the fairway is summarised in the note of the Lord Ordinary, at p. 549. As both parties admitted that the term "port" fell to be construed according to the popular meaning of the word, it is sufficient to refer to the opinion of the Lord President with regard to the evidence to be gathered from the terms of the "Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. clvi.)," and the exhibition of the regulations contained in it on placards on various parts of the harbour. As to the levying of rates on ships using the port and harbours, it may shortly be stated that no rates could be exacted under that statute except from ships actually using the artificial works in the harbour. The limits of the "port and harbours," according to that Act, are defined in sec. 44, quoted in note, p. 552.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers, who are owners of the barque 'Afton,' seek under this action to recover the amount of damage sustained by their vessel in February 1885 from the defenders, who are the underwriters on certain policies of insurance effected over the 'Afton,' and said to be current when the damage was sustained. It is admitted that the 'Afton' suffered damage in the circumstances set forth in the record, but the amount of the damage has not been ascertained, the parties having agreed (in the event of the defenders being held liable) that that should be determined by the average staters named in the joint minute, No. 96 of process. The defenders, however, deny liability for the damage sued for, on the ground that the 'Afton' was not covered by the policies at the date of the damage; and this question falls to be determined partly by a consideration of the facts, and partly by the construction of the policies.

"The policies (which are all set forth on the record) are expressed practically in the same terms. They purport to insure the 'Afton' from the Tyne to Java, and 'thence to any port or ports of call, and/or discharge in the United Kingdom, or France, or United States, and while in port during thirty days after arrival, including all risk of docking, while in dock and undocking, and shifting docks as might be required, at any time during the currency of the policy.' Having regard to the voyage actually made by the 'Afton,' the policies may be read thus,—'To the port of Greenock and while in port thirty days after arrival, including all risk,' &c. The words I have emphasised are the words on which the controversy hinges.

"The facts (so far as material) may be shortly stated. The 'Afton' arrived in Greenock on the 22d January 1885, and completed the discharge of her homeward cargo in the Victoria Dock on 4th February following. She was then under charter to proceed to Glasgow to take a cargo from that port to Brisbane (Queensland), but some repairs being necessary before proceeding on her new voyage, the 'Afton' was on 6th February taken into Caird's Dock at Greenock for repairs. On the 12th February, the repairs being completed, she left Caird's Dock in tow of a steamer to be taken to Glasgow to fulfil said charter, and on the same day, while in tow, she capsized at the place marked on the

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It was admitted, and must on authority be admitted, that the test of what was the "port" must plan produced, and sustained the damage now sued for. The locus of the accident may be described generally as being a place in the fairway of the river Clyde opposite, and within a short distance from Greenock Harbour. So far the parties are agreed. But the defenders maintain that the place where the damage was sustained is not within the 'port of Greenock,' while the pursuers maintain that it is. The pursuers' averment with regard to this is as follows:— 'The port of Greenock in the ordinary commercial sense of the term, and as known in mercantile and maritime custom and usage, embraces that part of the river Clyde, or estuary thereof, which lies between White Farland Point on the west and Garvel Point on the east, and from the shore or south bank of the Clyde on the south to and including the sandbank on the north, and at all events it embraces and includes the place where the "Afton" capsized.'

"The parties were agreed that the words 'port of Greenock' must be taken in their popular commercial or business sense, i.e., the meaning and sense in which they are understood and used by persons resorting to or doing business in the port. A proof was accordingly led before me as to what was included in the 'port of Greenock' in the sense I have explained. The pursuers' witnesses, speaking generally, supported the pursuers' averment above quoted; some of them indeed went beyond the averment, and carried the port of Greenock very nearly as far north as Roseneath. That, I think, is extravagant; it throws, however, some doubt on the value of the testimony which these witnesses gave. On the other hand, the witnesses for the defenders, again speaking generally, confined the port of Greenock to the works constructed by the Harbour Trustees—and all agree in excluding from the 'port' the fairway of the Clyde between the harbour of Greenock on the south and the sandbank on the north, in which fairway the 'Afton' was at the time she capsized. The result of the evidence was to satisfy me that there was no general or undivided opinion among mercantile or nautical men as to what was meant by or included in the words 'the port of Greenock.' This matter, however, had never before been considered by the witnesses; there had been no occasion for considering it. While, therefore, on the evidence I cannot affirm the averments of the pursuers, I am not simply on that ground prepared to find for the defenders. It is of importance to inquire whether, mere opinion of witnesses apart, the locus in question presents those features which mark a port. Is it a place where vessels usually load or unload cargo? Is it a convenient or suitable place for loading or discharging cargo? Is it, in fact, used as a part of the port? Do the harbour or port authorities exercise any jurisdiction there?

"I think it will be admitted that the place where the 'Afton' capsized is certainly not a convenient place for loading or discharging cargo. In the fairway of the river Clyde, where so many steamers are constantly passing, it is obviously neither a convenient nor suitable place for such operations. Nor can it be said that the place in question is one at which, in the present day, vessels usually load or discharge cargo. Formerly, indeed, it appears from the proof, vessels did load and discharge there, at least partially. The pursuers' leading witness, Mr Campbell, may be taken as the most favourable for the pursuers on this point, and his evidence is to the effect that, thirty or forty years ago, he saw vessels loading and unloading in the fairway; he has seen this done occasionally at a more recent period; he cannot say when he last saw it, but he has seen it within 'the last few years, but it has not been frequent since the deeper harbours were made.' No other witness speaks to the discharging or loading of vessels in the fairway at so recent a period, and although it may be true that Mr Campbell has seen this within the last few years, the rest of the evidence clearly establishes to my mind that the place in question has not been a usual place of discharge for at least thirty or forty years. But what was usual thirty or forty years ago, and not usual since that date, can scarcely be taken as entering into the meaning and intention of the parties who made the contract of insurance in 1884 or 1885. There is a good deal of evidence to shew that vessels have loaded and discharged their cargoes, or a part of their cargoes, at the Tail of the Bank from early time down to the present. That does not appear to me to aid the pursuers. The Tail of the Bank is not the locus in question. It is not in the fairway, and even if it had been proved to have been, in the mercantile sense (as I think is not proved), a part of the port of Greenock, that would not have aided in the solution of the question now to be determined. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the locus of the accident to the 'Afton' was not a place where vessels were usually loaded or discharged.

"Did the harbour or port authorities exercise any jurisdiction there? Formerly at this place there were buoys, to which vessels sometimes moored, although the buoys were chiefly for the purpose of aiding vessels in warping into or out of the harbour. Vessels using these buoys for either purpose were sometimes charged anchorage and ring dues. The claim for these dues was always made,—was sometimes paid and sometimes not paid,—but the right to make the claim was always disputed. These buoys do not seem to have been used since 1868, if they were used so long, so that for about twenty years no dues have been even claimable. The evidence as to the exercise of any other power or jurisdiction is, I think, dependent on the evidence of one witness, who says that the harbour master of Greenock ordered vessels out of the fairway and 'pushed them further out to the Tail of the Bank so as to keep the fairway clear.' He states, however, that the harbour-master's right to give such orders was disputed. No special case of this kind is given, and the present harbour-master is not examined. I cannot regard this as evidence of the exercise of such jurisdiction as would fairly lead to the inference that the place concerning which it was exercised was within or formed part of the port; I should rather conclude that such acts on the part of the harbour-master as are above spoken to were acts performed under the authority of the 139th section of the Act of 1842,* a clause which appears to me rather difficult to reconcile with the idea that the fairway of the Clyde was part of the port of Greenock under the jurisdiction of the port authorities.

"All the marks or tests, to which I have alluded as indicating a port, are thus found to be wanting in the case of the locus in question. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers have failed to establish that the 'Afton' was within the port of Greenock when she sustained the damage in question.

"Even had I been of opinion that the locus of the accident to the 'Afton'

No. 104. evidence shewed that in their opinion the port extended at least as far north as the bank, and included the fairway of the channel where was within the port of Greenock, I would still have decided in favour of the defenders, on the construction of the policies. In my opinion the policies had expired before the accident had occurred or the damage been sustained.

"The 'Afton' was insured against damage on her voyage, 'and while in port thirty days after her arrival.' I think that must be read with this implied limitation, 'if she shall remain in port so long.' If she left the port before the expiry of the thirty days, the policy came to an end. The mere fact of her returning to the port still within the thirty days from the date of her first arrival would not, in my opinion, have the effect of continuing the policy in force or reviving it. I find this view stated by Mellish, L. J., in the case of Gambles (L. R., 1 Excheq. Div. 145), where the policy was in effect the same as we have here. He says,—'If the words had been simply "for fifteen days after arrival," then it might have been necessary to put some limitation upon them, because the underwriters could hardly have intended to be liable for a ship going out to sea within that time; but the express terms "whilst there," shew that the stipulation is that the underwriter is to run the risk of what may happen to the ship while she remains in the port.' In this case the underwriters took the risk of what might happen to the ship while in port (i.e. the port of discharge), thirty days after arrival. This, as I have said, implies continuance on the part of the ship in port. If she continues or remains there for thirty days after arrival, she is covered by the policy; but if she leaves sooner, the policy expires. By leaving the port the vessel enters upon a new risk, which the policy does not cover.

"Now, the facts bearing upon this view of the case are all admitted. The 'Afton' arrived on the 22d January. She discharged her cargo, in the Victoria Dock, by the 4th February, and on the 6th February she left the dock and went to Caird's Dock or shipbuilding yard for repairs. That dock or shipbuilding yard 'is not the property of the Greenock Harbour Trustees,' although it is locally situated between two of the Greenock docks. In my opinion, the 'Afton,' when she left the Victoria Dock on the 6th of February, left 'the port' in the sense in which these words are used in the policies of insurance. That the dockyard she went to was a Greenock dockyard does not appear to me to be of any moment. So far as the policy is concerned, and the risks covered thereby, it would have been the same if the 'Afton,' instead of going to Caird's, had gone to a shipbuilding yard at Ayr or Dumbarton. In Caird's she was as much out of the property of the Greenock Harbour Trustees as she could have been anywhere. She was not paying harbour dues. She was not under the protection nor the jurisdiction of the authorities of the harbour or port of Greenock. I put the case, whether, if the 'Afton' had gone to Ayr for repairs, and afterwards, on her way to Glasgow (still within thirty days of the 22d January), had met with her accident where she did, the pursuers could have recovered under the defenders' policies. I was answered that they could, because the vessel was in fact in the port of Greenock when the accident occurred, and the thirty days after her arrival had not expired, and I was referred to Gambles' case as an authority for this contention. The contention is, in my opinion, untenable, and not supported by authority. In Gambles' case the vessel had never left the port, but had merely shifted from one loading-berth to another. The question there was not as to the effect of leaving the port, but occupying the port continuously under different charters. The opinion by Lord Justice Mellish, already quoted, shews that he would have regarded the pursuers' contention as I have done; for, if the pursuers' contention was sound, the defenders' liability would have been quite the same if, instead of going to Caird's Dock, the 'Afton' had made a voyage to Ireland and returned to the place of the accident before the thirty days had expired.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defenders should be absolved—(1) Because the 'Afton' was not in the port of Greenock when the accident occurred out of which the damage in question arose; and (2) assuming that the

the accident occurred. The view of the Lord Ordinary was that Caird's No. 104. Dock, where the "Afton" went, being a private dock, could not be said to be in the port of Greenock, and that therefore when she quitted her berth in the Victoria Dock she began a new risk. But Caird's Dock lay between two of the artificial works of the trustees, and therefore was, in the strictest sense of the term, in the port. But if their witnessses were to be believed, the port included much more than that, viz., at least all the water between White Farland and Garvel Points, and the far side of the fairway, and until the vessel was fairly out of that water she could not be said to have left the port and commenced a new voyage in the sense of a voyage policy with a time policy adjoined, such as this.¹ In Garston's case² tests were given by which the limits of a port or harbour might be settled when they were not otherwise definitely laid down. (1) The place of the accident was in the natural port. It was in the bay of Greenock as it originally existed before the curve from White Farland to Garvel Point was straightened by the artificial works. The conformation of the land thus afforded protection from three sides, and the bank from the fourth. (2) The evidence shewed that thirty or forty years ago the locus of the accident was used as a place for loading and unloading ships, and even of recent years (which was hardly to be expected since the extended facilities for unloading had been afforded by the harbour works) such a thing was not unknown. [LORD PRESIDENT.—Then it comes to this, that every ship going up the river to Glasgow must pass through the port of Greenock?] Yes. [LORD PRESIDENT.—Then it is a question of law whether the fairway of the navigable channel of the Clyde can be called the port of Greenock?] Yes. Such a state of matters was not unknown, e.g., the port of Leith extended to Inchkeith. [LORD PRESIDENT.—The harbour, not the port.] "Port" was a more extensive term than "harbour." The term was so understood in both the English cases cited. (3) The port authorities, prior to 1866, when the Greenock Port and Harbours Act was passed, levied anchorage dues there—(See Lord Trayner's opinion, p. 549). They always had asserted a right to dredge in the channel (Clyde Lighthouses Act, 1755, Act for deepening, &c. the Harbours of Greenock, 1773), and could prevent vessels throwing ballast into the channel, discharging firearms opposite the town, &c. (Greenock Harbour Act, 1842). (4) In a question of demurrage, the ship would have been regarded as arrived.³ There was no case where the meaning of the word "port" had been limited to artificial works in a harbour. The definition of "port and harbours of Greenock" in the Act of 1866 (quoted by Lord President, infra, p. 554), was a purely statutory definition, and could not be referred to, looking to the general rule of settling the limits of the port by reference to local understanding. The definition there given was simply for statutory purposes, and had nothing to do with the question whether the ship had arrived or not.

Argued for the defenders;—The case of Gambles was not in point here, as there the ship was admittedly in the port of Newcastle when the accident occurred. She had moved from one berth in the port to another, and was loading her outward cargo, but it was never said that she had quitted the port for a moment. In a question of demurrage, it would depend on the wording of the special contract whether the ship here would have been held to have arrived. She might, for example, be held to have arrived so far as demurrage was concerned, though she was waiting outside the harbour to get in, all the berths being full. With regard to the test of unloading,¹ the evidence, such as it was, that unloading had been carried on opposite Greenock of late years, referred really to the Tail of the Bank, which was not the point here, being out of the fairway. And any evidence that before the artificial works were constructed to any extent the fairway was used for unloading, was irrelevant in an inquiry as to the mercantile understanding at the present day. As regarded the locus being in a natural shelter or port, could it be said that where the channel of a river was the recognised highway to another port, that could in any common sense view be said to be a place where ships went for shelter. The main point was, however, what were the limits of the port in the view of nautical men, merchants, seamen, &c. On the pursuers' own evidence there was no evidence conclusive on that point. No two of them agreed as to what the limits were, and the fact that one of them went so far as to say that the port extended to the other side of the river went far to detract from the value of his evidence. The defenders' witnesses, on the contrary, were clear in their view that only the artificial works were included. This view was strengthened by reference to the history of the port. Certainly, since 1866, when the Greenock Port and Harbours Act was passed, there could be no doubt what the Legislature understood by the term "port," and as the regulations under that Act had for twenty years been posted up on placards all over the harbour, it was probable that the general understanding was now the same as the statutory. The definition in that Act* clearly limited the port to the property vested in the trustees. With regard to the buoys set in past years in the channel, it was clear that they were placed there not to mark the port, but to assist vessels in warping out of harbour. The harbour only came into existence owing to the erection of artificial works, and after they were placed there the Statute of 1866 set forth the popular as well as the statutory meaning of the term.² On the point whether the risk intended to be covered included the ship being in a dry dock, and that a private one, that depended on the terms of the contract. There was no special provision to that effect, and it could not be denied that the risk was altered, and probably increased, thereby.³ It would, therefore, require a very special provision to cover that case.

'Afton' was in the port of Greenock when the damage was sustained, she was not then covered by the policies founded on by the pursuer."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is laid on three policies of insurance on the ship "Afton" belonging to the pursuer, and the question arises on the construction of certain words which occur in those policies. I shall take the case upon the first of the three, as they are all in the same terms, so far as the words to be construed are concerned. The policy is on the cargo, hull, and material of the "Afton," "at and from port or ports, and/or place or places in any order in Java, to any port or ports of call, and/or discharge in the United Kingdom, or France, or United States, and while in port during thirty days after arrival." Thus, the policy is one on the voyage, to which is superadded a time policy after the voyage is completed, and while the vessel is in port for thirty days. It is not disputed that unless the loss occurred within thirty days of arrival the time policy is of no effect, and it is further not disputed that it would be of no effect unless the vessel was in port, i.e., in a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, France, or United States when the loss occurred. It must be kept in view that the parties in framing these policies did not contemplate that the ship should discharge in any special port, but used words which were applicable to any port in those kingdoms at which the vessel might elect to discharge.

The facts relating to the loss are very fairly stated in the 5th article of the condescendence,—“The ‘Afton’ sailed on the voyages covered by the said policies, and arrived at Greenock on the 22d January 1885, where she was berthed in the Victoria Harbour, and discharged her cargo. On the 6th February thereafter she was put into Caird’s Dock in that port for repairs, which having been executed she came out of that dock on the 12th of that month, being towed by the tug ‘Lord Elgin.’ While being so towed on the said 12th February 1885 in the port of Greenock, and within thirty days after her arrival at said port, and when opposite Messrs Caird’s shipbuilding yard or thereabouts, she was struck by a gust of wind, which caused her to list heavily to port and to capsize. She thereafter drifted on to the sandbank opposite the Custom House Steamboat Quay and the entrance to the West Harbour, her yards first striking the said bank.” The pursuers’ case is then stated thus,—“The port of Greenock, in the ordinary commercial sense of the term, and as known in mercantile and maritime custom and usage, embraces that part of the river Clyde, or estuary thereof, which lies between White Farland Point on the west and Garvel Point on the east, and from the shore or south bank of the Clyde on the south to and including the said sandbank on the north, and at all events it embraces and includes the place where the ‘Afton’ capsized.” It is only necessary to add to this statement that the place where the accident occurred was in the middle of the fairway of the navigable channel of the Clyde opposite Greenock, and that the vessel was then in course of going up to Glasgow in ballast to take in a cargo of coal there. The contention on the one side is that though the “Afton” was in the fairway of the river and had commenced her voyage to Glasgow, she was still in the port of Greenock, and so was within the provisions of the time policy. The contention on the other side is that being in the fairway of the navigable channel, and in the prosecution of a new voyage, it is impossible to say that she was still in the port of Greenock. The Lord Ordinary has adopted the latter view, and has decided accordingly that the vessel was not at the time of the loss in a position to be covered by the policy. I agree in that decision, and shall give very shortly the grounds of my opinion.

In the first place, I think that the fact of the vessel being in the fairway of a navigable channel, which we all know to be somewhat narrow for the enormous traffic it has to accommodate, is quite inconsistent with the notion that she is still in port. It is a contradiction in terms to say that a vessel which is in the navigable channel of a river is still in port.

But it is contended, and I think justly, that in determining the limits of a port we must take into consideration what are held to be its limits by merchants, sailors, shipowners, and underwriters,—in short, that we should not give any technical meaning to the term, but should adopt the popular idea of what it comprehends. Now, a good deal of evidence has been laid before us on that point by both parties, but I am of opinion that the whole of it seems to be a good deal tainted with partisan prejudice. There has been a long standing jealousy between the Magistrates of Glasgow as Clyde Trustees and the Greenock Harbour Trustees as to what the privileges of Greenock on the river are. One set very naturally takes the one side and the other the other. The result is that the evidence now before us is of very little value. I must further say that an observation made by the defenders' counsel as to the pursuers' evidence on this point is well founded—viz., that there is scarcely any consistency between the pursuers' various witnesses. No two fix the same limit to the port. Some extend it to an extravagant extent, others are more moderate, but all, no doubt, maintain that the limits of the port embrace the whole of the navigable channel.

For these reasons I do not think it necessary to examine the evidence in any detail, nor do I suppose that any of your Lordships attach great importance to it.

There is, however, another class of evidence which appears to me to be equally valueless, that is, historical evidence. If we were to regard this as a matter of historical inquiry and so to determine it, we should be departing very widely from the rule which has been appealed to by both parties—viz., that the well-known understanding of underwriters, sailors, merchants, &c., is the only rule by which the matter ought to be decided. I think, therefore, the historical evidence is of little value. One part of it, however, does seem to me to be of importance—viz., an Act which was passed in 1866, and it does, I think, throw a good deal of light on the matter. That is an Act "to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the port and harbours of Greenock." Now, among other things that Act undertook to define the meaning of the words "Port and harbours." The interpretation clause says that the term "shall mean the port and harbours of Greenock as herein defined within which this Act shall be carried into effect." The clause which defines what the port and harbours are is the 44th, which provides that,—“The limits of the port and harbours shall extend to and include the whole works, lands, and property vested in and belonging to the trustees by virtue of this Act, or which shall, pursuant to the powers of this Act, be vested in and belong to the trustees.” It must be observed that that definition applies to the port as well as to the harbours, and it defines the nature of the port and harbours as “the whole works, land, and property” vested in the trustees under the Act. That appears to me to be exclusive of the notion that any part of the navigable channel which is under the management of the Clyde Trustees under their Acts can be part of the works or property vested in the trustees under the Greenock Act. The definition then is entirely exclusive. But still further light may be extracted from that Act. Schedule B settles the rates on vessels. Now, as regards coasting vessels, we have this provision,—“When a coasting vessel shall not commence or terminate her voyage at the port and harbours, but shall only call at, enter, or use the port and harbours, docks, piers, or other works of the trustees on her way to or from Glasgow, or any other port on the river Clyde, or within the above limits, such vessel shall be entitled in the same voyage to call at, enter, and use the port and harbours, docks, piers, and other works of the trustees on return to the original port from whence she started, without again paying any rates." There it is to be observed that though a vessel does not commence or terminate her voyage at a port or harbours belonging to the trustees, she may call at, enter, or use one of such ports or harbours. A vessel in mid-channel can hardly be termed to be "calling at or using" the port of Greenock on her way to Glasgow. She might "call" at the port of Greenock in this sense, that if she anchored at the Tail of the Bank she might have communication with Greenock. But the idea meant to be expressed in this section is that of a vessel coming within the artificial works of the port. But further, Schedule C enacts that,—“Goods shipped from the port or harbours to vessels in the stream, or at or below the Tail of the Bank, by steamer or otherwise, to pay full rates of their class, whether river craft, coasting vessels, or vessels foreign, according to the port to which such vessels are bound.” Now, what is contemplated and provided for here is the case of a vessel anchored outside the works in Greenock port taking in cargo, while anchored, by steamer or otherwise from the port or harbour. The charge made is for goods shipped from the port by steamer or otherwise. Is it not plain therefore that a ship lying in the stream is not in the port? I think, therefore, that the Act of 1866 leaves little room for doubt that the statutory limits of the port and harbour of Greenock are consistent with my view of the case, and inconsistent with the view that the port extends beyond the artificial works in the harbour.

But it may be said that this is a departure from the rule to which both parties have appealed—viz., that we should consider the popular meaning that is given to the term, and not the statutory meaning. That observation might be of some force, if it were not for this, that these statutory regulations to which I appeal are publicly exhibited on placards in various parts of the harbour, and therefore I think it is quite impossible to dissociate the statutory meaning from the ordinary. On these grounds I have come without much difficulty to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that this vessel was not in the port when she was capsized, but was in course of prosecuting her voyage from Greenock to Glasgow towed by a tug.

It is not necessary for me to advert particularly to the other ground on which the Lord Ordinary has relied—namely, that when the vessel was put into Caird's Dock she ceased to be in the port of Greenock. There is a good deal to be said for the view, that that dock being a private dock, and not part of the public harbour works, it is not a part of the port; and, further, that as the object for which she was sent there could not be attained without taking the vessel out of the water, she could hardly be said to be "in port" in the ordinary sense of the term. But I only make these observations in passing, and not as forming my ground of judgment.

LORD MURR.—I also think that we ought to adhere. There is no doubt as to the place where the ship capsized. It was in the fairway of the navigable channel of the river Clyde, through which all vessels passing up and down between Glasgow and Greenock are navigated, whether they call at Greenock or not. As I understand the evidence and the plan furnished to us, the ship had come out of Caird's Dock and crossed into the channel and there met the squall while on her way up to Glasgow. Having regard to those facts, I think they go far to shew that the view of the defenders is correct, viz., that any vessel which is in the navigable channel of such a river cannot be said to be in port.

The evidence of the witnesses who speak to the general understanding as to the limits of the port of Greenock is very contradictory, and I think that the onus lay on the pursuers to shew that this vessel was within the port at the time of the accident. But, even on the evidence adduced by them, I should have great difficulty in coming to that conclusion. Because as I read the evidence of the leading witnesses for the pursuers, they make the port to extend for two miles along the river, from White Farland Point on the west to Garvel Point on the east, and northwards from the Renfrewshire shore across to and beyond the Greenock Bank, and then on almost to Roseneath on the opposite side of the river. But it is impossible, in my opinion, to hold that the port extends over all that space. For the evidence of the defenders' witnesses, and, in particular, that of the three last witnesses examined, two of whom are pilots and Greenock men, is directly adverse to that view, and sufficient, I think, to shew that the pursuers' witnesses are not to be implicitly relied on as to the limits of the port.

In these circumstances it appears to me that the Act of 1866 solves the difficulty in favour of the defenders, as the Legislature, in the parts of that Act which have been referred to by your Lordship, has defined the port as lying within the narrower limit contended for by the defenders. I do not enter on the second ground of judgment stated by the Lord Ordinary, for in the view I take of the main question that is not necessary. On that question I think the decision of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD SHAND.—I am so unfortunate as to differ from the opinions which I understand are entertained by all of your Lordships, as well as from the Lord Ordinary, and I am unable to concur in the judgment to be pronounced.

Of course if it be rightly held that the port of Greenock—taking the expression in its ordinary commercial sense—is limited to the piers and harbour works of Greenock fronting the Clyde, there is an end of the question between the parties, for the pursuers' ship was capsized and stranded in the river at a short distance from and in front of these works. But I cannot agree with your Lordships in holding that the term "port or ports of discharge" in the policy was applied to the port of Greenock is to be taken in the very limited sense in which the defenders contend. If the expression "port of Greenock" relates to the port fixed for fiscal purposes, the limits of the port would extend over a large part of the river seaward from the town of Greenock. If, again, the expression were used with reference to the rating of goods and vessels—that is, to the charges or dues payable to the harbour trustees—it must be conceded that under the existing statute and regulations the port is limited to the docks, quays, and harbour works, for the use of which the dues are paid. But it appears to me that the term "port of discharge" in the policies in question refers neither to the port for fiscal purposes or dues, but must be taken in a larger sense; and that where the "port of Greenock" is referred to in a charter party or policy of insurance, then, according to the commercial sense of that term, the parties refer to that part of the river Clyde which the pursuers allege to be the port of Greenock, extending from White Farland Point on the west to Garvel Point on the east, and outwards from the shore so as to include at least the anchorage at the Tail of the Bank, and that part of the river and estuary which intervene between the bank and the southern shore, on which the harbour works are built.

If, therefore, the pursuers' vessel in sailing towards the Victoria Harbour, in which she was unloaded at the end of her voyage, had stranded and been injured at the place where she capsized, and was run aground as described in the minute admissions for the parties and relative plan, I am of opinion that the injury would have occurred in the port of Greenock, although the vessel had not been attached to a pier or reached the inside of a dock; and I shall deal with the case as if the loss had occurred in this way in the first instance. It is obvious that the vessel on her way to the Victoria Dock must have passed over the very ground in question, and the accident which afterwards befell her might have occurred there. I shall afterwards consider whether the fact that the vessel was afterwards taken to Caird's Dock for repairs, and sustained injury after having gone out of that dock when she had started to make the passage or voyage for Glasgow, can make any difference. It is to be observed that Greenock is one of the largest maritime or river ports in this country, having a very extensive shipping trade, and that a large number of sailing vessels and steam vessels, great and small, and engaged in home and foreign trade, resort to the port and use the harbour, and that in particular there is a large foreign traffic constantly going on. The harbour works consist of a long stretch of piers or quays facing the river, with breaks in the quays at different parts admitting of vessels going to different harbours and shipbuilding yards, the names of which are to be found on the plan. The case is one which I rather suppose must be regarded as unique amongst important shipping ports in the kingdom, if, notwithstanding the existence of a large expanse of natural bay in the estuary opposite the town and harbour works, with the admirable shelter which it affords, of which advantage is constantly taken by vessels anchoring for shelter and various other purposes, it shall be held that nevertheless a vessel has not reached the port of Greenock unless she has been attached to a pier or quay or has got inside the gates of a dock.

It has been laid down in several recent cases that the Court in construing the term "port" in a charter-party or policy of insurance must endeavour to reach that meaning which shipowners, merchants, and insurers would naturally attribute to it, taking the term in its ordinary commercial sense; and certainly in the ordinary and usual case such parties in using the term "port" do not mean to limit its signification to the piers, quays, and docks, or, in speaking of a vessel arriving in the port, limit the expression to the case of vessels becoming attached to a quay or getting inside of a dock. A port usually includes the ground in front of harbour works used for navigation, and for shelter and anchorage, as well as for loading and unloading, or for partially loading or unloading cargoes. And if the natural situation of a port be such that there is an expanse of water fronting the harbour works—it may be to some extent land-locked, or forming a bay suitable for shelter—shipowners and merchants understand that the space is included within the port in the business sense in which they use the term, particularly where vessels have been in use to anchor and partially to load or unload cargoes opposite a town which forms a large commercial centre.

It seems to me from the evidence in this case that the expanse opposite to the town and harbour of Greenock, which I have already described, falls within the description of a port which I have now given. The evidence shews clearly that the port of Greenock, extending out into the river at least to the Tail of the Bank,—and it may be even beyond that point to the north, though that question does not arise in this case,—has been in existence and been recognised.

In 1816 a charter was granted to the bailies and town-council of Greenock of the sandbank "opposite the harbour of Greenock, from the point or part of the estuary of the river Clyde at the north-west side of the said harbour, called the Tail of the Bank, in a south-easterly direction across the bay, until it touches the point or opening at the east or Garvel Point called the Troughlet, for the purpose of building dykes upon said bank, and to that end of digging and gaining upon the same for the protection of the bay and harbour from the east and northwards, and for making it otherwise useful without destroying or injuring the navigation of the river Clyde." And in the same charter power is given to the magistrates to enlarge the harbour, "and to erect and build other harbours within the space above mentioned, and to reclaim land from the sea for that purpose, and to apply to their use the anchorage, shore, bay, and river dues, and the other taxes and customs foresaid, to be paid by all kinds of ships and vessels which may come to the said harbour, or other harbours to be built as aforesaid." These terms, read with reference to the locality shewn on the plan, to the large natural bay or estuary opposite the harbour, and with the light of the evidence as to the anchorage ground at the Tail of the Bank, and the long continued existence of buoys in the river for mooring vessels and warping vessels out and into the harbour, all go to shew that from a very early period the bay or estuary of the river at and opposite the town and harbour works of Greenock was recognised as a port possessing anchorage ground and shelter, which is the marked characteristic of a port. The evidence is clear and uncontradicted that down to the date of the Statute of 1866 not only were there harbour appliances in the river at and near the very place at which the "Afton" capsized or was run ashore, but that both at that part of the river and out as far as the Tail of the Bank there was a constant practice of loading and unloading vessels, until in more recent years dock and harbour accommodation with the requisite depth of water were provided. And even down to the present time there is a frequent discharge of part of timber cargoes and occasionally of sugar cargoes to lighten the ship. The witness James Marshall, a stevedore and lighter-owner, states that he is almost daily employed either in partially unloading cargo or filling up cargo for vessels in the bay out and towards the Tail of the Bank, and the witness James Neil speaks to a large fleet of vessels within the last eight or ten years having unloaded a considerable amount of timber cargo there, and to another vessel laden with coke and iron being also so unloaded. Even in the regulations, schedule C, appended to the Statute of 1866, the practice of loading up vessels at the Tail of the Bank is recognised as existing; for goods shipped from the harbour to vessels in the stream, or at or near the Tail of the Bank by steamer or otherwise, are subjected to certain rates there specified. It further appears from the proof that when vessels for the Port of Greenock arrive at the Tail of the Bank it is not unusual for the captain to discharge the crew and to employ stevedores, and it is his duty at once to report the arrival of the ship to the Custom House.

An important body of evidence to the effect I have now stated, adduced by the pursuers, would seem to leave no doubt that the bay of Greenock, outwards at least to the Tail of the Bank, must be held to be within the meaning of the "port of Greenock" in its natural and ordinary and commercial sense, unless there be very strong evidence to overcome this. I do not think any such evidence has been adduced. The witnesses who were examined on behalf of the defenders were mainly gentlemen in Glasgow, most of whom were defenders in the case, having underwritten risk in these very policies. But there are two witnesses, men of experience and of weight, who were also brought and examined by the defenders, and I may observe upon their evidence that I think it goes a very little way indeed to weaken the evidence which has been adduced by the pursuers. I refer particularly to the witness Mr Leitch, who had been for a large number of years a merchant and shipowner in Greenock, and Mr Carmichael, a merchant and shipowner in Greenock and chairman of the Chamber of Commerce. The first of these gentlemen undoubtedly says in answer to the direct question—"According to commercial and nautical understanding, what constitutes the port of Greenock? (A.) The quays and harbours." He is then asked this question,—“Is there any understanding, so far as you know, among commercial or nautical men that the fairway between the bank and the harbour is within the port?” And the answer is this very broad one,—“If the ‘Afton’ had anchored where she sank when she arrived with her cargo, and had tendered her cargo for delivery to the merchant, the merchant would not have taken delivery, but would have told the captain to bring his ship into the harbour.” So that the view upon which this gentleman proceeds, evidently, in the testimony which he has given as to what is the port of Greenock, seems to be this, that the port of Greenock means some special port at which delivery must be taken by the consignee of cargo. Of course if that view were sound, one must immediately arrive at the conclusion that you cannot be in port till you have reached a quay or berth, and if that is the view on which Mr Leitch proceeds, it goes very little way indeed to shake the general evidence to which I have alluded. Then, again, the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce is asked the question how long he has been in Greenock, and he says he has been in Greenock all his life. He says he is one of the defenders in this action, and one of the underwriters. Then he is asked what constitutes the port of Greenock, and his answer is,—“Where a ship can legally call upon a consignee of cargo to take delivery.” That is obviously unsound, for it simply amounts to this, that nothing can be a port which is not a loading or unloading place with a quay and harbour appliances, and I need not say that no one can possibly give countenance to that view of the meaning of the term “port.”

The point really most relied on in defence has reference to the provisions of the Act of 1866. If the question between the parties had arisen in the year before that statute was passed, the conclusion, I think, must have been inevitable that the port of Greenock could not be limited to the mere harbour works. Can it then be said that by virtue of that statute the port in its ordinary commercial sense no longer includes the sheltering or anchorage ground or expanse of water which it formerly did; that by virtue of the statute the port has shrunk within the limits of the harbour works either suddenly in 1866 or by degrees since that date? Can it be truly said that this port has been diminishing in its area or limits since 1866, as larger and deeper docks admitting of vessels of large draught of water were built; that in proportion as Greenock was increasing in its commerce, and growing in importance as a maritime port, the limits and extent of the port were diminishing, so that at the present day these include only the breastworks on the river side and the docks inside these? I am unable to reach that conclusion, and I think it a very strong and startling statement that the Act of 1866 has had any such effect. I cannot think that the effect of the provisions of that statute has been entirely to change and to limit the meaning of the term "port of Greenock," as that term was previously understood in its natural and ordinary commercial sense by business men in the making of their contracts of charter or insurance. In the case of a sailing ship (Garston Company v. Hickie) Mr Justice Wills preferred the expression "legal port" as the proper term to describe a port of departure of a vessel to the popular or ordinary or commercial or business sense in which the word is used by business men, and in this view attached very great weight—almost exclusive weight—to the elements of defined limits within which port dues were levied. But this view did not receive countenance in the Court of Appeal, for the Master of the Rolls, now Lord Esher, for reasons which strongly commend themselves to my mind, preferred what he called the "very good working definitions" given by the other terms in ordinary use above quoted. His Lordship there said—"Shippers of goods, charterers of vessels, and shipowners, what do all those persons in their ordinary language mean by a port? What they understand by the word is the port in its business sense, in its popular sense, i.e., the popular sense of such persons. Therefore, with the greatest deference to Mr Justice Wills, it appears to me that all these phrases are quite good, and that they all in substance mean the same thing. He seems to have been inclined to substitute the words 'legal port,' but with all deference to him, in my opinion, that would not do. A 'legal port' might be fixed by an Act of Parliament about which nobody knows anything. It must mean a port which such persons as I have mentioned would be dealing with for the purpose of ships going to or from it carrying goods." And he goes on to enforce as the chief characteristic of a port so understood that the place be in itself a sheltered place, a place of safety, a natural port.

This passage appears to me to give the key to the fallacy which, I humbly think, pervades the argument for the defenders. They seek to set up a legal port as distinguished from a port in the ordinary business sense of the term, and they do so by reference to the provisions of the Harbour Act of 1866. Now, I do not doubt that the port as described in that statute is confined to the harbour works, and that the only dues which the trustees are entitled to levy are for accommodation at these works, and for the use of the harbour appliances. It even appears further that any jurisdiction which the trustees can exercise in the river and bay ex adverso of the works is of a very limited nature, though this last statement must be taken with the qualification that the Greenock harbour authorities are represented on the Clyde Lighthouse Board and Pilotage Board, who are concerned with the works necessary to secure the free navigation of the channel, and their harbour-master, as a member of one of these boards, does exercise a certain control over the shipping in what I call the port. But all this—and the knowledge of all this—while it may define a "legal port" for dues or rating purposes, will not, as it appears to me, alter or affect the ordinary or business meaning of the words "port of Greenock" as used in shipping and insurance contracts. The truth is that there is one circumstance which fully explains the legislation of 1866, and entirely accounts for the limitation of the port defined in that Act for dues or rating purposes, and that is the position of Greenock on the bank of the river Clyde, which is the great highway to another port of even greater importance, the port of Glasgow. It is notorious that by artificial operations which have gone on for many years the river for eighteen to

of sea-going steamers and sailing vessels. Vessels of very large burden have way up the river, and the evidence shews that disputes from time to time arose Northern the Bank or unloading cargo, particularly as to the payment of dues. In the interest of all parties it was desirable to settle all such questions on a practical and permanent basis. Accordingly, about 1866, a sum of £20,000 was paid to the town of Greenock by the Harbour Board to buy off their claim for the anchorage, bay, and river dues which they had been previously in use to levy from time immemorial, and these dues were to be no longer exacted. The Harbour Trustees obtained power to make large additional docks and works, and their dues or rates were by statute raised and enlarged, and at the same time limited to charges for the use of their quays, docks, or harbour works and appliances, while the Clyde Trustees undertook the responsibility of maintaining the river channel and navigation. In this way the "legal port" in the sense of the port in which dues are charged simply for the use of harbour accommodation arose, and was defined by the statute, and such an arrangement was not only the natural, but probably the only practical one with a port like Greenock in an estuary of the river Clyde, having Glasgow higher up. The Greenock traffic paid dues as before, for though the anchorage, bay, and river dues were no longer levied, the harbour rates were raised. And even the traffic from Glasgow in this way produces a very large revenue, for the steamers for local, coasting, and foreign trade, and passengers constantly call in great numbers at the Greenock quays, and must produce a large revenue to the Greenock Harbour Trust.

All this, and the public notices of dues payable as port dues for the use of harbour accommodation and appliances on the quays and elsewhere, seem to me, however, to be beside the question as to what is the port of Greenock in a charter-party of a vessel coming from abroad or a policy of insurance of a vessel to "the port of Greenock, and while in port during thirty days after arrival."
In short, I think the statutory port for payment of dues or rates on goods or ships is not the port of Greenock in the sense in which I think merchants and business men use the term in their contracts, for that term refers not to quays, docks, and piers only, but to the large expanse of water having shelter and anchorage in the natural port which exists opposite or near the harbour in Greenock, as in all other important maritime ports or places.

Two of the unquestionable marks of a port are no doubt the levying of dues, and the unloading and loading of ships, and it may be that in the majority of cases the area within which dues are levied will be found to be co-extensive with the limits of the ports, using the term in a particular sense. But this cannot be stated as an invariable rule, and though there must be in every port a place of loading and unloading goods, in very few places indeed can it be said that the port does not extend greatly beyond such a place as, e.g., take the case of the Cardiff Dock where the artificial cut and part of the river Taff—a long way from the place of loading—is part of the port.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the place in question where the "Afton" was injured was in the port of Greenock in the commercial and natural sense of the term. That place is directly opposite the centre of the town and the steamboat quay, which is much frequented, and on which the Custom House of the port is built, and apparently about 500 feet from the breast of the quay. I attach no importance to the fact that the place is in the fairway of the river. If the expanse of water forming the bay and extending out to the bank be within the port in the natural sense of the term, you cannot cut out the navigable channel and say that it is not part of the port though the land and water on each side of it is so. The river for miles higher up is within the port of Glasgow from bank to bank, and it would be absurd to say of a part in the centre buoyed off, it might be, as fairway or navigable channel, that this was not in the port. A similar illustration might be taken from the port of Newcastle, which, I understand, extends for miles from bank to bank of the river, with navigation going on higher up, and the Cardiff case is another illustration, for there a great part of the port seems to have been fairway. On this point it may further be observed that the policies cover the ship while in port during thirty days after arrival, including all risk of shifting docks. I put the case that after the "Afton" had partially discharged in the Victoria Harbour she had been required by the harbour authorities or the charterers to move to the west harbour or Albert Harbour to complete her discharge, what in that case becomes of the defenders' argument? Can it be maintained that as soon as the vessel got out of the Victoria Dock into the river or fairway of the river she was out of the port of Greenock although merely on her way from one dock in the port to another, and if so, what meaning is to be given to the words "including all risk of shifting docks" in the policy. I should suppose that the very use of the term "shifting docks" in such a policy would convey to the mind of anyone thinking of a port on any river that the vessel must be taken out of one dock into the river and along the channel or fairway of the river into the other dock, and if so, it is to me inconceivable that the parties should mean that the risk ceased and the vessel was unsecured in the river between the two docks because she was not in port, but that the policy should again revive as soon as she was taken inside of the stone breastwork of the harbour. This, however, is involved in the defenders' argument. Such changes of dock must occur daily in the port of London, and I cannot suppose that it has ever occurred to anyone that the vessel is out of the port when she sails along the fairway of the river from one dock to another. I have, on the grounds now stated, come to the conclusion that if the vessel had gone aground as she passed over the place in question on her way to the Victoria Dock, where she was discharged, the occurrence would have taken place in the port of Greenock. But she completed her discharge, was taken into Caird's Dock for repairs, took in ballast, and had emerged from the dock, starting on the passage to Glasgow to take in cargo there, when she capsized and went aground. It appears to me she was still insured, and that the defenders are liable under the policies. Engrafted on the voyage policy there is a time policy, "to any port of discharge in the United Kingdom, . . . and while in port during thirty days after arrival, including all risk of docking while in dock, and undocking and shifting docks, as might be required at any time during the currency of the policy." The Lord Ordinary expresses the opinion that the taking of the vessel into Caird's Dock destroyed the policy in the same way as if the vessel had gone to Ayr, or had made a voyage to Ireland and returned to the place of the accident before the thirty days had expired. In my view that is not so. It is true that the vessel when in Caird's Dock was not in a dock the property of the Greenock Harbour Trustees, nor paying harbour dues, but the question under the policy is, was she in the port of Greenock? If so, then the policy in its language covers the case. The parties must, I think, be taken to have had in view that the vessel might encounter severe weather, in which case repairs might be necessary, or the copper on the vessel's bottom might require to be cleaned, and if this were done in port within thirty days after arrival, I can see no ground for thinking that the risk did not continue. There are docks and shipbuilding yards in Greenock as in all other ports. Are not these in the ordinary sense of the term in the port if locally within the limits as generally understood? Caird's Dock is in the very centre of the harbour. It is, as it seems to me, a dock or yard of and in the port of Greenock, so I hold the taking of the ship there for repairs did not bring the policy as a time policy to an end.

Finally, it is said that as the vessel left Caird's Dock on her passage to Glasgow, again the risk ended. That observation would be true if the vessel had left the port of Greenock, but not otherwise. In the case of the Garston Company, the vessel, which had cleared out at the Custom House and had proceeded towards the sea on her voyage to Bombay from Cardiff, had got down an artificial channel leading from the docks to the river Tarff, and about 300 yards beyond the junction of the channel with the river, when she came into collision with another ship. Lord Escher there said, referring to the case of Rocklands v. Harrison,—"The final sailing from the port is not at the time when the vessel starts from the rivermost end of the port; it is not till she gets to the outer end of the port. Till then she has not sailed from the port; she is sailing in the port." So here, the parties in charge of the vessel had it in view to take her out of the port, and in a very short time, if no accident had occurred, she would have been out of the port, but she took the ground and was injured while she was still in the port, if I be right as to the meaning of that word in the policies. The loss occurred within thirty days after arrival. The vessel was still "in port," and the risk was therefore covered by the policy. It would be to add a new term to the policy, for which I see no warrant in its language, to hold that the risk terminated as soon as the vessel was unloosed and started from the dock to go to Glasgow though she was still sailing in the port of Greenock.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to succeed in their demand, and that the case should be remitted to the average-stater to ascertain the amount of loss, under the minute of agreement of the parties.

duty to defend his deliverance by appealing against the interlocutor of a Sheriff recalling it, when the result of that appeal, if successful, would be injurious to the interests of the general body of creditors.

A trustee in a sequestration sustained the claim of certain creditors to a preference. The unsecured creditors appealed to the Sheriff, who ordered service of the note of appeal upon the trustee only. The Sheriff recalled the trustee's deliverance—the trustee alone appearing as respondent. The trustee then appealed to the Court of Session. In a question as to the competency of the appeal, held that the Sheriff ought to have ordered service of the original appeal upon the secured creditors, and that the trustee ought not to have appealed to the Court of Session, but that in the circumstances the secured creditors whose claim to a preference the Sheriff had disallowed might be sisted as appellants instead of the trustee on condition that they paid the whole expenses incurred and to be incurred in defending their interests.

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.
 M.

GEORGE SHEPHERD, farmer, trustee upon George Skinner's sequestrated estate, pronounced a deliverance admitting the claim of Daniel M'Intosh and Charles Caie to a preferable ranking. The amount of their claim was £1854, 13s. 8d., less £284, 17s. 9d. previously paid to account.

The ordinary creditors appealed against that deliverance to the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire, and on 14th September 1886 the Sheriff (Dove Wilson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Appoints a copy thereof and of this deliverance to be served upon the therein designed George Shepherd; and appoints parties or their procurators to be heard thereon before the Sheriff-substitute, within the Sheriff Court-house here, on the 22d day of September current." He subsequently, on 6th December following, recalled the trustee's deliverance, and remitted to him to rank the claim of Messrs M'Intosh and Caie as an ordinary claim.

The trustee thereupon appealed to the Court of Session.

When the case came on for hearing a minute was put in for Messrs M'Intosh and Caie craving to be sisted as appellants.

The ordinary creditors objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—A trustee in bankruptcy represented the general body of creditors, and it was not for him to defend the interests of an individual creditor who had obtained a preferential ranking against the interests of the general body of creditors and at their expense.¹ A creditor who did not himself appeal could not take advantage of an appeal presented by the trustee.² The trustee was in the position of a pursuer who found he had no title to sue, and in that case a new pursuer could not be sisted without the consent of the defender.³ It was the invariable practice in the Sheriff Court not to serve an appeal against a trustee's deliverance upon the creditors. The creditors always knew of the presentation of the appeal, and it was in their power to take advantage of it if they pleased. But they had not done so. Besides, Messrs M'Intosh and Caie might have appealed against the Sheriff's interlocutor to the Court of Session.

The appellant argued in support of the competency;—The answer to the question which was now raised depended on whether the trustee had a good title to appear to defend his deliverance in the Sheriff Court.

This was a review of the Sheriff's judgment under section 170 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. Where a trustee's deliverance was appealed to the Sheriff there was no provision in the statute for intimation to the creditors, and in this case none had been asked for. The trustee was recognised by the statute as the party respondent to each appeal, and he was the proper person to defend his own deliverance.¹ But if there had been intimation to Messrs M'Intosh and Caie in the Sheriff Court they would have asked to be sisted—as they now applied to be sisted here. The fact that they had not been parties to the lis in the Court below prevented them from bringing the case under review. It would be a hardship if they were shut out from their right of appeal by the fact that the trustee had been accepted by the respondents as their contradictor. They were willing to relieve the trustee of his expenses. In any case, a judgment against the trustee would not be res judicata against Messrs M'Intosh and Caie.

Skinner's
Keith.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—An objection has been taken to the competency of this appeal, founded on circumstances which require careful consideration. The claim which was presented to the trustee in the sequestration by Messrs M'Intosh and Caie was for £1854, less a sum of £284 paid to account. They claimed to be ranked preferably, and their claim was sustained, and the preference for which they contended given effect to by the deliverance of the trustee. The unsecured creditors, or at least some of them, appealed to the Sheriff against the trustee's deliverance, and, the appeal having been presented, an interlocutor was pronounced by the Sheriff on 14th September last appointing a copy of the appeal and of the trustee's deliverance "to be served upon the therein designed George Shepherd," who was the trustee, and parties were appointed to be heard thereon on 22d September following. In the prayer of the note of appeal nothing is said about service, and we are told that under such circumstances it is common to pronounce a first interlocutor in the terms I have read, appointing service to be made upon the trustee. That may be a convenient course, and such service may be sufficient in certain circumstances, because in the general case where the effect of a deliverance by a trustee is to reject a claim to a preference, it may serve every purpose that the trustee should be called upon to defend his own deliverance. But it might be requisite even in these circumstances that further service should be ordered. But where the party interested in maintaining the deliverance is not the trustee, but the particular creditor who has got a preference, it appears to me that such service as was made here is wholly inadequate, and is even not applicable. The service ought to be made on the party whose interest it is to maintain the deliverance, and that is the creditor who claims the preference. The trustee has no office to defend his own deliverance where that deliverance is against the interests of the general body of creditors, as it necessarily is where it establishes a preference. The proper office of a trustee is to cut down preferences as far as possible. I do not, of course, mean that he should not sustain a preference when he thinks that there are sufficient grounds for so doing, but when he issues a deliverance

Skinner's
Keith.

The difficulty of the present case arises from the circumstance that the Sheriff or Sheriff-clerk did not advert to the fact that it was the duty of the creditor and not of the trustee to defend the deliverance. I think the creditor who was maintaining the preference was the only proper contradictor of the appellants, who were ordinary creditors, but the case proceeded before the Sheriff without the preferential creditor making appearance, and without any one being in Court except the appellants and the trustee, the result being that the trustee's deliverance was recalled by the Sheriff, who held that there was no sufficient ground for sustaining the preference. Against the Sheriff's interlocutor an appeal has been brought to this Court in name of the trustee only. I am of opinion that the trustee ought not to have brought that appeal. But it is a different thing to hold the appeal to be incompetent. The Sheriff's judgment was pronounced against the trustee, who is now the appellant, and accordingly there seems to be no incompetency in his bringing an appeal in the interests of whomsoever it may concern.

But the real reason why I think the trustee ought not to have undertaken an appeal to this Court is that if he is to be allowed to litigate as a trustee he must do so at the expense of the bankrupt estate. But the estate is interested upon the other side, and it would therefore be made to pay the expenses of an appeal, the successful issue of which would be injurious to the unsecured creditors themselves, and would reduce the amount of the fund available for division among them.

The question, therefore, is whether the appeal may not be sustained as competent, and the process put into a different shape by sisting as appellants the creditors who claim a preference. Upon consideration I have come to be of opinion that these creditors may be sisted if they consent to relieve the trustee of all the expenses which he has incurred, and to pay the whole charges of the appeal,—the trustee himself standing aside and taking no further part in the appeal. The creditors' minute craving to be sisted must contain an undertaking to pay past expenses, and also full expenses for the future.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

The minute for Messrs M'Intosh and Caie having been amended so as to include an undertaking by them to pay the trustee's expenses,

THE COURT accordingly pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sist Daniel M'Intosh and Charles Caie as parties to the appeal in room of the appellant, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Skinner, in terms of the minute for them, No. 16 of process, as now amended, and appoint the cause to be put to the Summar Roll for discussion on the merits."

Glass v. Glas-

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Free space for air—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 370.—Plans of buildings proposed to be erected in Glasgow which were held not to comply with the provisions of the 370th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, requiring a certain amount of free space in front of the windows of sleeping apartments.

PETER GLASS, builder in Glasgow, presented this petition in the Dean of Guild Court there for a warrant to erect buildings on subjects belonging to him in North Street, Springburn, Glasgow. The plans produced shewed two kitchens, each with a window on the ground floor to the back. These kitchens, the petitioner proposed, should be used also as sleeping apartments. Had the elevation to the back been unbroken, a line drawn at right angles to the plane of either of these windows would not have shewn the free space required by section 370 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866,* in consequence of the proximity of buildings belonging to another person. To obviate this objection the back elevation was broken up into three parts—the centre part, i.e. that between the two windows being thrown back several feet, and the windows placed at such an angle that a line drawn at right angles to the plane of either would pass through the requisite amount of free space.

The petitioner called the Master of Works for the City (who alone appeared to oppose) and the two coterminous proprietors.

On 19th February 1887 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the petitioner's plans do not shew in front of the windows of the sleeping apartments on the ground flat to the back of the proposed tenement the amount of free space required by section 370 of 'The Glasgow Police Act, 1866,' and therefore refuses to grant the lining craved until said objection has been removed, either by an amended plan giving the said required free space in front of said apartments, or by the petitioner undertaking that the same shall not be used as sleeping apartments, and decerns."†

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—At common law a Dean of Guild Court could not prevent a proprietor from building to the very edge of his property;‡ and the Court would construe a statute such as this strictly

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 370, enacts:—"Except as after mentioned, it shall not be lawful for any proprietor to let, or for any person to take in lease, or to use or suffer to be used for the purpose of sleeping in, any apartment, unless one-third at least of its height is above the level of the turnpike road, or public or private street or court adjoining or near to it, and unless there be in front of at least one-third of every window in such apartment, including any turnpike road or public or private street or court, a free space equal to at least three-fourths of the height of the wall in which it is placed, measuring such space in a straight line from and at right angles to the plane of the window, and measuring such wall from the floor of the apartment to where the roof of the building rests upon such wall."

† "NOTE.—The angling or placing of the windows in the corner of the two kitchens (to be occupied as sleeping apartments) on the plan of the ground floor, instead of normally in the line of the back wall, is clearly an attempt to evade the provision of section 370 of the Police Act, and as the free space in front of one of said kitchens is about a fifth less than that which the Act provides for, while in front of the other of said kitchens the free space is much less, the Court cannot consent to pass the plans in their present state."

Reparation—Slander—Publication of decrees of Court of Justice.—A private firm instituted an agency which they described in a prospectus as “a medium for interchange of information, by enabling the trading classes to communicate one to another their knowledge of doubtful and habit and repute bad payers.” The prospectus stated, “A book is issued to subscribers containing upwards of 1000 names and addresses of people against whom decree in absence has been obtained.” The firm issued to their subscribers a list headed “List of Names,” Edinburgh, 1885, and containing simply names and addresses. The list in point of fact contained the names (to a certain extent selected) of persons against whom decree in absence had been granted in the Small-Debt Court of the county during several months previous to publication. Prefixed to the list was a leaflet headed “Caution,” which stated, “It is possible that there are names contained in this list of people to whom credit under certain circumstances might be given, but it is recommended that use be made of the inquiry department of the agency before the entailing the risk.”

In an action of damages for slander, raised by a person whose name appeared in the list, against the firm, held that the defenders, by means of the list of names and “caution” circulated by them, had slandered the pursuer, and were liable in damages. Damages assessed at £5.

DRUMMOND & GRAHAM, accountants, Edinburgh, instituted an agency, which they called “The Shopkeepers’ Mutual Protection Agency.” The objects of the agency were thus described in the prospectus which was circulated with a view to obtain subscribers:—“In consequence of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, the Wages Arrestment Act, the effect of the law of hypothec, and the facilities afforded the unscrupulous by the Married Women’s Property Act, it is admitted on all hands, that to give credit means simply to be cheated by a large and growing section of apparently respectable people. How to counteract this evil is a problem of the greatest importance to every person giving credit; existing trade protection offices—useful enough to wholesale houses—fail to cope successfully with it. This agency has been established with a view to remedy this state of matters by affording the opportunity of organisation on mutual principles to all classes of shopkeepers. It is intended to be a medium for interchange of information by enabling the trading classes to communicate one to another their knowledge of doubtful and habit and repute bad payers, and thus effectually to ‘Boycott’ them. The full advantages of the agency will be readily seen in the following departments.” The prospectus then had four paragraphs headed respectively “The Directory,” “The Defaulters’ Register,” “Status Enquiries,” and “Debt Recovery.” Under the heading “The Directory” it was stated, —“A book is issued to subscribers containing upwards of one thousand names and addresses of people against whom decree in absence has been obtained; the arrangement is alphabetical, and it is believed that it will prove as valuable as it is easy of reference. This will be supplemented at intervals by a ‘cyclostyle’ list of current information.” A directory of this kind was issued to subscribers to the agency on 6th April 1885. It was headed "List of Names," Edinburgh, 1885, and contained only names and addressees. It had prefixed to it a leaflet headed "CAUTION," and containing this statement,—"It must be clearly understood that the information contained in this is intended solely for the personal use of the subscriber, and is under no circumstances to be shewn or divulged to a third party, and the subscriber will be held entirely responsible for the breach or nonobservance of such understanding. It is possible that there are names contained in this list of people to whom credit, under certain circumstances, might be given, but it is recommended that use be made of the inquiry department of the agency before the entailing the risk." This "list of names" included that of James Andrews, North St David Street.

Andrews v.
Drummond &
Graham.

James Andrews, 34 St Andrew Square, formerly at 7 North St David Street, Edinburgh, raised an action, on 15th January 1886, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles against Drummond & Graham, to interdict them from publishing or distributing any lists containing his name, and also concluding for £500 damages, alleging (what was not disputed) that he was the party named in the list.

He averred,—(Cond. 2) "In connection with said agency the defenders had got printed, and they have circulated amongst their subscribers in Edinburgh and elsewhere during the last twelve months, . . . and they are daily exhibiting to others as an inducement to become subscribers, a list of names, amongst others that of the pursuer, representing thereby that the persons whose names are in that list are in debt; that they refuse to pay their debts; that debts are irrecoverable from them; and that on these grounds they are unworthy of credit, or at least persons to whom credit should not be given unless under certain circumstances, and after use had been made of the agency department of said 'agency.' Said list is intended to represent, and does represent, that those whose names are in it are unscrupulous in the contraction of debt, are doubtful and habit and repute bad payers, to whom to give credit is to be cheated, and that while ordinary trade protection offices fail to cope successfully with such parties, that established by the defenders is designed to do so, and 'thus effectually to Boycott' the parties whose names are in said list. In it parties' names are given against whom no decrees have ever been pronounced in absence, and many hundreds are not in it against whom decrees have passed in absence." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer has been thereby falsely and maliciously slandered, and without a probable cause, and he has been thereby greatly injured in his feelings, reputation, and credit, as well as in his business as a solicitor, and by which it is calculated to be further injured. He is a solicitor in the active practice of his profession. In said list his designation is given as 'North St David Street.' He left that address at Whitsunday 1884. There was at that time no decree against him, and he has hitherto paid 20s. a pound."

He pleaded;—(4) The pursuer having suffered greatly in his feelings, reputation, and credit, as also in his business, by the illegal and unwarrantable publication and distribution of said list containing his name, and by his name being groundlessly and unjustifiably inserted therein, and by his being represented to the extent and effect condescended on, he is entitled to solatium and reparation, and decree should be pronounced as craved.

He did not found in the record on the terms of the caution.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 2) "The said agency is a private medium for interchange of information, facilitating the subscribers, who pay 10s. 6d. per annum, in ascertaining the financial position of persons with whom they have to deal. The said list, which is merely headed

No. 107. 'List of Names,' contains names and addresses of people against whom decrees in absence have been pronounced." (Ans. 3) "Decrees in absence have been obtained for debt on several occasions against the pursuer, notably on 18th June 1884, in the Sheriff Small Debt Court at Edinburgh, . . . for the sum of £6, 7s. 3d., also on 10th June 1885 in said Court . . . for the sum of £8, 2s. 11d., which has not yet been paid. The said list of names is strictly confidential, and is used solely for the protection of the subscribers to the defenders' agency. It is not used maliciously, recklessly, or oppressively, and it cannot be construed as containing, and in point of fact does not contain, any imputation against the character or reputation of the persons named therein."

Mar. 5, 1887.
Andrews v.
Drummond &
Graham.

They pleaded ;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the petition. (2) The list of names founded on by the pursuer not being calumnious or defamatory, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (4) In any event, the issuing of the said list of names is privileged.

The defenders founded also on a copy of the prospectus, in which, under the heading "Directory," this statement appeared :—" It must be clearly understood that there is not the least intention on the part of the agency to insinuate or imply that the parties mentioned are unworthy of credit, the information is given as a matter of fact and without prejudice; however, in cases where credit is given or likely to be extended to parties therein named the advantage of the inquiry department is obvious."

It appeared, however, in the course of the proof allowed by the Court, that this was a revised prospectus, differing in several respects from that originally circulated.

On 10th February 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) sustained the defenders' first plea in law, and dismissed the action as irrelevant.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Crichton), who, on 6th April 1886, adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and obtained leave to amend the record, by setting forth and founding on the "Caution," and thereafter the Court allowed the parties a proof.

The proof was led before Lord Shand, and in addition to the above established the following facts :—There were about 2000 subscribers to the agency, who paid 10s. 6d. each. There was nothing "mutual" in it, but it was conducted for the profit of the defenders. The list included only the names of those against whom decrees had been obtained in absence in the Small Debt Court, Edinburgh, and consisted simply of names and addresses, without any reference to the amount for which decree had been granted, or the date, or the Court in which it had been obtained. It was compiled from "Stubbs' Gazette" (a publication of a similar kind), but the latter contained many more names than the defenders' list, which was confined chiefly to persons resident in Edinburgh and Leith, and omitted firms, wholesale houses, companies, and shopkeepers. A decree in absence had been granted against the pursuer on 18th June 1884 in the Small Debt Court for £6, 7s. 3d., but he had paid the account sued on on the 17th July following, and no other decree had been obtained against him until 10th June 1885, after the issuing of the list complained of. As to the latter decree, the pursuer deponed that he had not paid the sum sued for, because he had not the means. No special damage was proved to have resulted from the publication of his name in the list. The pursuer was quite unknown to the defenders.

There the parties alleged to have published the slander were an association of merchants, who collected and circulated the information among themselves, so that the case was one of privilege. Further, they published exactly what appeared in the judicial records. Here, however, the defenders were carrying on the business for their own profit, and they had not simply transcribed the names from the records. The names undoubtedly were selected. In some weeks more than one-half of the persons against whom decrees in absence had been granted were omitted from the defenders' list. Further, the date and the sum contained in the decree were omitted, and the only information beyond the name was to be gathered from the prospectus and the caution. It did not even appear that the decree was in the Small Debt Court. The Directory was a means of carrying out the objects described in the opening paragraphs of the prospectus, and the insertion of the pursuer's name implied that he was a person answering the description of those who rendered such an agency necessary. The "Caution" further implied that some of the parties in the list might be entitled to credit, but the mass were not, and that there was risk in dealing with any of them. Moreover, the decree had been obtained ten months before the pursuer's name was published in the list, and had been implemented by payment nine months before. The case fell, therefore, under the principle of M'Nally v. Oldham,¹ where it was held that if a judgment has been satisfied by payment, a party thereafter publishing it as an existing liability is guilty of slander. As to the defenders' argument founded on "veritas," there was neither pleading nor evidence to warrant it.

Andrews v.
Drummond &
Graham.

Argued for the defenders;—The leading object of the agency was to procure information from shopkeepers, to be communicated to other shopkeepers. The opening paragraphs of the prospectus were merely a disquisition on recent legislation, and could be no slander on the pursuer. The "Directory" was mentioned simply as containing the names and addresses of people against whom decrees in absence had been obtained. The pursuer was only represented as falling under that description, which was certainly true. A slander must be both false and calumnious, and the statement here was neither. No doubt the list did not contain the names of all against whom decree in absence had passed, but it contained several hundreds of them, and it was a strong thing to say that there was here a slander because the list did not contain still more. It was absurd to say that the defenders intended to slander some hundreds of people. No malicious motive could be suggested. As to the "Caution," it amounted to no more than a fair and legitimate comment on the effect of decrees in absence as a rule. Even if there were such an innuendo to be drawn from the "Caution" and prospectus as was contended for by the pursuer, the defenders had proved "veritas," for the pursuer himself admitted that he had not paid the sum in the decree of 10th June 1885, because he had not the means. Further, no damage had been proved. Any harm to the pursuer's credit by such a publication had been previously done by the publication of his name in "Stubbs' Gazette," from which the defenders' list was a mere compilation.

At advising,—

LOED PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages for slander brought in the Sheriff Court of this county by the appellant, and the case was decided against him by the Sheriff-substitute on the ground that the record was irrelevant, and that no ground of action was divulged. As the record then stood, I should be

No. 107. quite disposed to agree with the Sheriff-substitute, but it has now been amended by a minute which alters the complexion of the case a good deal. The defenders are a firm of accountants, and have set up an agency which they call a mutual protection agency, and which is intended to give information to shopkeepers with a view to protect them against parties who are not likely to pay their accounts. The object seems quite a legitimate one, and if prosecuted in a legal manner no one could object to it. The pursuer founds on the prospectus, but I think we have very little to do with the prospectus, because the only thing he has complained of is that his name is in the list circulated by the defenders. The prospectus describes quite distinctly what that list is intended to represent. The pursuer has founded on the opening statement of the prospectus, which sets out that shopkeepers are apt to be imposed upon, that "to give credit means simply to be cheated by a large and growing section of apparently respectable people" who would not pay their accounts, and the shopkeepers were thus cheated. That may be perfectly true or the reverse; we have no reason to inquire. It is not alleged that this pursuer answers the description of persons mentioned in that opening part. The part in which the pursuer's name does appear is that under the head "The Directory." There is there this statement,—"A book is issued to subscribers containing upwards of one thousand names and addresses of people against whom decree in absence has been obtained; the arrangement is alphabetical, and it is believed that it will prove as valuable as it is easy of reference. This will be supplemented at intervals by a 'cyclostyle' list of current information." This Directory is the list complained of, and we gather from the statement of the prospectus, what does not appear on the face of this list, that it is a list of persons against whom decrees in absence have been obtained. Now, turning to the list we find the pursuer's name there. That means, of course, that decree in absence has been obtained against the pursuer. But that is true, and if the matter went no further than that, of course the defender would plead justification, if indeed it is necessary to plead anything of the kind, because a mere statement that a decree has passed in a Court of Justice open to the public is not a thing that requires any justification. It is a public fact that anyone is entitled to state, and therefore the list itself would be of no value at all for the purposes of this action if it were not that the list is accompanied by a note which is entitled "Caution," and which is pinned on or pasted into the pamphlet, and this "Caution," which was not set out on record in the inferior Court, or founded on, is now made part of the record, and we must see whether the "Caution," taken in conjunction with the list and the appearance of the pursuer's name in the list, amounts to a slander against him. The first paragraph of the "Caution" appears to me of no consequence, but the second is in these terms:—"It is possible that there are names contained in this list of people to whom credit, under certain circumstances, might be given, but it is recommended that use be made of the inquiry department of the agency before the entailing the risk,"—I suppose that means incurring the risk. Now, an innuendo is put on that by the pursuer which I think it will not bear. He carries the innuendo a great deal too far in the record as now stated. It appears to me that the true meaning of this second paragraph is this: First, that there are some of the persons named in the list who may on inquiry be found worthy of credit notwithstanding that a decree in absence has been obtained against them; in the second place, that the remainder, being the majority, are unworthy of credit; and in the third place, that as regards the whole persons named in the list, there is risk in dealing with them. If that be the true meaning, it certainly contains something that in law amounts to slander as against any party whose name is in that list, because it manifestly means that he is a party who cannot be dealt with by shopkeepers without the shopkeepers incurring a risk, which means that he is not in good credit. It also contains the insinuation that he is a party in such bad credit that he is unworthy of credit at all, or if he be worthy, that it will require some inquiry and examination to justify that opinion. This is undoubtedly a reflection on the credit of a person whose name is found in the list. If the list had stood alone without the "Caution," I do not think that would be implied by the mere statement that a decree in absence had passed against him; but coupled with that second paragraph of the "Caution," it appears to me that there is enough to amount to slander. But still I am bound to say that I think it is a very mild slander, and as no damage is proved to have resulted, I should not be disposed to recommend to your Lordships to award a large amount of damages. I think any damage or inconvenience that the pursuer may be supposed to have sustained will be very fully represented by a sum of £5; and if so, the only other question is that of expenses. Now, if the pursuer is to have £5, it will seem to follow that he must have expenses; but we must take into account that as this case came originally before us it certainly could not be entertained as giving ground for an action of damages, the only real ground of complaint, which I propose to sustain, not being set out in the original record at all. Probably the most just thing would be to disallow the expenses in the inferior Court, and to give expenses here.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that if people will carry on a business of this kind, in which they profess to deal with the credit of others who are engaged in daily business, or who may for any reason in the course of their ordinary transactions in life desire credit, they must be very careful not to go beyond what the law strictly allows. It is, no doubt, lawful to publish the fact that decrees of Court have gone out against members of the public. I think it would be fairer if that were not put in general terms, and that there should be some specification of the amounts and dates, so that there should be some protection to the defenders against the possible implication that matters are very much worse than they really are. But it may be within the power of a party simply to publish the names, and the fact that a decree or decrees have been obtained. But I think this is the furthest point to which such publication can be allowed. If it had been shewn that the prospectus in setting out the purpose for which this agency was founded and stating that "to give credit means simply to be cheated," had a direct application to the pursuer of this action, I should have held that a very serious calumny. But I think the prospectus does not come into the case so as to have any bearing. I am of opinion with your Lordship, however, that there is enough in the "Caution" to warrant this action, and I agree in your Lordship's statement of the innuendo therein contained, to which this must be added, that the persons named are not only generally unworthy of credit, but should only get credit under certain circumstances,—that is, under peculiar circumstances, where probably some sort of security could be given by them. Having no doubt that that goes beyond what anyone is entitled to say,—in the absence of a plea of veritas,—I think that damages must be given. Having regard to the fact that

No. 107. the decree had been already announced to the public in another publication of the same kind, and that there has been no real damage,—I think £5 will be enough. I think it desirable that expenses should be given to mark the sense of the Court of the impropriety of which the defenders have been guilty, in going beyond what parties are entitled to do in cases of this kind.

Mar. 9, 1887.
Munro's Trustees v. Young.

Trust—Assumption of new trustees—24 and 25 Vict. c. 84 (Trusts Act, 1861), sec. 1.—By an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in October 1860, the spouses provided that, in the case of the death, or resignation, or legal incapacity of the trustees named in the deed, it should be competent to them, the spouses, or to the survivor, to appoint new trustees, and also that the trustees should have power after the death of the survivor to assume new trustees.

Held that this trust could not be held, during the lifetime of the survivor of the spouses, to include a power of assumption by the trustees nominated, the provisions of the deed being to the contrary.*

2D DIVISION.
M.

MR WILLIAM PRINCE MUNRO AND MISS ANN GRAY were married in October 1860, an antenuptial contract of marriage, of date 30th October, being executed by them. Mr Munro had little or no property at the time of his marriage. Mrs Munro had an interest in her father's and mother's estate. There was a conveyance of this interest to trustees, and a general conveyance by Mr Munro of all property he should possess at his death. He died in June 1885, survived by his widow, and leaving estate to the value of about £10,000.

The contract contained the following provisions as to the assumption of trustees:—"And in case of the death or resignation or legal incapacity of any of the said trustees, it shall be competent to the said William Munro and Ann Gray by any joint deed, or to the survivor of them, to nominate and appoint new trustees in the place of those dying or resigning or becoming incapacitated, . . . with power to the trustees before-named or appointed, after the death of the survivor of the said William Munro and Ann Gray, to assume other trustees in the place of such of their number as shall die or resign or become incapacitated, who shall have the same powers as the original trustees." No. 108.

* The Trusts Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84), by its first section provides,—"All trusts constituted by virtue of any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated shall be held to include the following provisions, unless the contrary be expressed; that is to say, power to any trustee so nominated to resign the office of trustee; power to such trustee, if there be only one, or to the trustees so nominated, or a quorum of them, to assume new trustees."

At the time of Mr Munro's death three of the original trustees survived. ^{Mar. 9, 1887.} Two of them proposed to resign, and accordingly in December 1885 the trustees were requested by Mrs Munro to assume Messrs George Young and James Flett. They did this by a deed of assumption dated 11th February 1886, but by the same deed they assumed two other trustees, Messrs John Thomson and John Munro. ^{Munro's Trustees v. Young.}

Mrs Munro and the trustees having differed in opinion as to the power of the trustees to assume, a special case, to which the original trustees and the two gentlemen assumed by them were the parties of the first part, while Mrs Munro and the two trustees assumed on her suggestion were the parties of the second part, was presented to the Court. The question of law was,—“Do the terms of the said antenuptial contract of marriage exclude the statutory power of assumption vested in gratuitous trustees, so as to invalidate the assumption of the said Messrs John Thomson and John Munro?”

Argued for the first parties;—The assumption here was good, for the contrary was not expressed by the deed. The point was concluded by authority, for in Hairsten's case¹ a power in the deed to assume new trustees in room of those that might resign or become incapacitated was held not to exclude the Act, and in Maxwell's case² it was held that “the fact that a limited power of resignation was conferred by the trust-deed could not possibly prevent the application of the subsequent enactment, which conferred an unlimited power of resignation.”³ For “resignation” let assumption be read, and that case was directly applicable. It might be very necessary to have the power to assume here against the chance, e.g., of Mrs Munro becoming insane.

Argued for the second parties;—In a deed executed before the Trusts Act of 1861 it was not to be expected that the assumption of new trustees should, in so many words, be prohibited, for it was at that time prohibited at common law. The law of Hairsten's case had been destroyed by the subsequent case of Miller's Trustees,⁴ where the doctrine of expressio unius exclusio alterius had been adopted as the rule. In the present case the trusters had adopted a particular kind of assumption as the law of their trust, and that had an object, viz., that the lady should have control of the trust, which would be defeated if the statute were allowed to operate. Besides, by the first section of the Trusts Act of 1884,⁵ the Acts of 1861 and of 1867 were to be read together, and the 19th section of the latter Act was fatal to the contention of the first parties.*

No. 108. case depends on a state of facts substantially to the following effect. The question arises out of the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Munro, of whom
 Mar. 9, 1887. Munro's Trustees v. Young. Mrs Munro is the survivor. The contract nominates certain trustees, and then it contains the following clause :—"In the case of the death or resignation, or legal incapacity of the said trustees, it shall be competent to the said William Munro and Ann Gray, by any joint deed, or to the survivor of them, to nominate and appoint new trustees in the place of those dying, or resigning, or becoming incapacitated."

As I have said, the husband predeceased, the widow survived, and a question has arisen as to the nomination of certain new trustees in place of certain apprehended resignations. On the one hand Mrs Munro exercised the power reserved to her, and nominated two trustees, Messrs George Young and James Flett. Now comes the question whether the other trustees have power to nominate trustees at their own hand founding on the terms of the Statute of 1861.

The terms of that statute have more than once been the subject of interpretation. The terms of the statute are that the trusts to which it refers "shall be held to include the following provisions, unless the contrary be expressed ; that is to say, power to any trustee so nominated to resign the office of trustee ; power to such trustee, if there be only one, or to the trustees so nominated, or a quorum of them, to assume new trustees," and certain other provisions. The deed is to be held to import these powers, unless the contrary is expressed in the trust-deed. The question substantially is whether the nomination by the old trustees of new trustees in their own right is sanctioned by the Act of Parliament, or whether that is not clearly contrary to the terms of the marriage-contract.

I think that it is desirable to refer to what has already been decided by the Court with regard to the somewhat curt provisions of the Act of Parliament. The questions raised have been questions as to the powers of trustees to resign and their power to nominate new trustees. In one case the question was whether a limited power to deal with resignations in the trust-deed, in the other a limited power to assume new trustees, was to be held to be contrary to the Act of Parliament. In both cases it was held that the powers given were not sufficient to exclude the operation of the statute, and it was held to be necessary to have some plain and unequivocal exclusion of such powers as were afterwards conferred by the statute. In the former of the two cases, Maxwell's case (2 R. 71), the question was as to resignation, and the limited power conferred by the deed was "in case any trustee should become incapable of acting as such, or should desire to be relieved of the said trust, it should be in the power of the other accepting and surviving trustees therein named or to be assumed, if they should deem it expedient, to discharge and exoner him of the said trust upon his denuding thereof in favour of the others."

It was contended that there was there an expression of intention contrary to the provisions of the statute, and derogating from it, but that contention was rejected. The Lord President says,—“Any hypothetical inference as to the intentions of the truster can never prevent the application of the statute” ; and Lord Deas, although he had some doubt, says,—“I am very clear that there is nothing in the first objection. The fact that a limited power of resignation was conferred by the trust-deed could not possibly prevent the application of the subsequent enactment, which conferred an unlimited power of resignation.”

on precisely the same lines in a question as to assumption, and there is an important and valuable opinion of Lord Gifford, who takes the same view as the Lord President in the former case, and enlarges and illustrates it in some very cogent sentences. No. 108.
Mar. 9, 1837.
Munro's Trustees v. Young.

These cases I use by way of contrast, not as analogies. In them a limited power was held not to derogate from the provisions of the statute, but to be within it. This case is quite different, and is entirely outside the statute. The power is not so much granted as reserved. There is a reservation to the survivor of the spouses to nominate new trustees. It is quite clear that that cannot stand along with a power to the trustees to do the same. That being so, it would be manifestly contrary to the deed to give the trustees the same power as the spouses had declared was reserved to them. What may happen after the death of the survivor it is not necessary to consider.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree. It is very necessary to attend to the facts of this particular case, and it is not necessary to pronounce any general opinion on the provisions of the Act of Parliament beyond the exigencies of the present case.

The first observation I make is that this is a case on a contract; trustees are to be nominated by the husband and wife, and they were at liberty to make such contracts as they pleased for the transaction of their own business. One of the contracting parties is dead, the other, the wife, now the widow, is alive. Two trustees have failed, one by death, the other by resignation. That is the very case for the widow to exercise the power given to her by the contract. I do not look upon it as a case of assumption at all, it is a case of one of the surviving parties desiring to nominate trustees. Without any formal deed she may make such an appointment by a simple statement in writing that two trustees have failed, and that she appoints A and B in their place.

But what has happened is this. The surviving trustees, hearing of her intention, proceeded themselves to execute a deed of assumption, giving effect no doubt to her desire by assuming the two gentlemen whom she favoured, but assuming at the same time two gentlemen nominated by themselves.

The first result of this judgment will be to put that deed in the fire, for there is no right in the other trustees to assume at all. The body of trustees was complete according to the contract, and they are not entitled to increase it. The widow may nominate if she pleases, or she may abstain; that is her contract right, but the trustees have no right of assumption.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The question of law put to the Court, Mrs Munro being still alive, ought I think to be answered in the affirmative. The clauses of the marriage-contract quoted in the special case make it plain that while both spouses were alive, or while the survivor was alive, the exclusive power of nominating new trustees was vested in them, and that the trustees named by them were to have the power of assumption only upon the death of both. This seems to me to bring the case under the operation of the condition set forth in the clause of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84), also quoted in the special case, by which it is provided that the power of assumption thereby conferred is not to come into operation if the contrary be expressed. I think that the contrary has been expressed, for were the power claimed by the trustees to assume new trustees in the lifetime of Mrs Munro to be recognised, that would be in the contrary of the power of nomination conferred on Mrs

No. 108. Munro. The question which we have to decide is not in any way affected by the decision in the case of Allan's Trustees, 5 R. 576, because in that case there was no power of nomination in Mrs Allan after the trust came into operation, the only parties entitled to nominate at any time being the trustees named in the deed, and the survivor of those trustees. The facts being as they are, I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the exercise of the power conferred by the Act while Mrs Munro is in life is plainly excluded.

 The Division before whom a proof has been brought upon a reclaiming note cannot certify the expenses of scientific witnesses under the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1844,* even in cases where the judgment of the Lord Ordinary has been reversed and the party found liable in expenses by him has been found entitled to expenses by the judgment of the Inner-House.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord M'Laren.
 I. IN an action raised by Thomas Gibson, a farmer, against the West Lothian Oil Company to recover damages for injury to his stock and crops caused by the fumes from the defenders' works, the Lord Ordinary assailed the defenders, and found them entitled to expenses. No application was made to his Lordship for a certificate to cover the expenses of scientific witnesses.

On a reclaiming note, the Second Division, on 3d March, recalled the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and gave decree for a sum of damages, finding the pursuer entitled to expenses. The pursuer then made this application, craving the Court to certify the expenses of certain scientific witnesses who had dissected his sheep and inspected his crops. He argued that the Act of Sederunt had been held to apply to proofs as well as to jury trials.¹ It might quite fairly be said that the Division was "the Judge who tried the cause." In the two cases which would be cited on the other side,² there was this important distinction from the present, viz., that in them the pursuer had been found entitled to expenses in the Outer-House, and that finding was affirmed by the Division; here the pursuer had been found liable in expenses by the Lord Ordinary, and it would have been a mockery therefore for him to apply for a certificate.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no warrant save the Act of

* Sec. 4, subsec. 2, provides that in cases where it has been found necessary to employ scientific witnesses to make certain investigations previous to the trial, in order to qualify them to give evidence, fair and reasonable additional charges may be allowed, "provided that the Judge who tries the cause shall, on a motion made to him, either at the trial or within eight days thereafter if in session, or if in vacation, within the first eight days of the ensuing session, certify that it was a fit case for such additional allowance."

Gibson v.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My impression would rather have been to deal favourably with the party making this application. It was not unnatural that he should not have made application to the Lord Ordinary, although he might have done so.

LORD YOUNG.—The pursuer must bring himself within the Act of Sederunt. Now, the Act of Sederunt allows no one to certify for such expenses but the Judge before whom the proof is taken, and that within a limited time. His refusal to certify would be conclusive, for I never heard of the case of a reclaiming note against a refusal to certify. It may be that there is a defect in the Act of Sederunt, and it might be quite safe to allow this Court in deciding the case on the merits to certify for these expenses. But that is not in the Act of Sederunt, and is contrary to practice.

Whether there might not be another ground for the pursuer to take, viz., that a party should be allowed all his reasonable expenses in the case, I do not know.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree. The Act of Sederunt may be a good or a bad Act as to its policy—and its policy seems to be that this question should be determined in a short time after the proof—but there is no doubt as to its terms, and it is binding on us.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also agree, but I confess it may very well be that the Act of Sederunt, which was originally intended to apply to jury trials only, might be improved.

Valuation Acts—"Consideration other than the rent"—Goodwill—Obligation by landlord not to commence rival business—Valuation of Lands Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 6.—A sum of money paid by a tenant to his landlord in name of "goodwill" on obtaining a lease of premises previously occupied by the landlord, is in the general case to be regarded as "a consideration other than the rent" named in the lease paid for the occupation of the premises, and as such is to be divided by the number of years for which the lease is to run, and the quotient added every year to the rent.

In addition to a rent of £48 yearly named in the lease of a hotel for seven years, the tenant agreed to pay to the landlord a sum of £220 in name of goodwill, the landlord who had previously been in occupation of the hotel becoming bound not to commence business as a hotel-keeper in opposition to the tenant. Held that this obligation by the landlord was a valuable consideration, apart from the occupation of the premises, for which compensation was due by the tenant, and consequently that a proportion was to be deducted from the sum of £220 before making any addition to the rent named in the lease in terms of the above rule. Determination of the Magistrates deducting one-half from the £220 on this principle affirmed.

Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

ANDREW SELKIRK, the proprietor, and James Blackwood, the tenant and occupant of the Station Hotel, Lanark, appealed to the Magistrates of the burgh against a valuation of the hotel at £79 made by the Assessor.

Blackwood held the subjects under a lease granted by Selkirk for seven years, from Whitsunday 1886, at a rent of £48 yearly.

In addition to this rent, a sum of £220 was paid by Blackwood to Selkirk in name of goodwill, Selkirk, who had previously carried on business in the hotel, becoming bound not to commence business as a hotel-keeper in opposition to Blackwood. No part of this sum was paid for furniture, fittings, and utensils, a separate valuation of these having been made and payment made accordingly.

Case No. 77.

The Assessor reached his valuation by taking the whole of this sum of £220 as a consideration for the occupation of the premises other than the rent, and then adding one-seventh of the amount, or £31, to the yearly rent of £48, stipulated in the lease.¹

Blackwood and Selkirk argued that no part of this £220 should be taken into account in fixing the annual value of the subjects, on the ground that the obligation by the proprietor (who had made the business) not to open a rival hotel was the consideration for the payment; and maintained further, on the authority of the case of Drummond,² that in any event only one-half of the said sum should be taken into account.

The Magistrates held "that a payment for goodwill being a consideration other than the rent, fell to be taken into account when fixing the annual value, but that the obligation on the landlord not to carry on business in opposition to the tenant fell also to be taken into account, and sustained the appeal in so far as to restrict the value to be entered in the roll to £63, being the actual rent, £48, plus the one-half of the sum paid for goodwill divided by the number of years of the lease."

The Assessor took a case.

There was no hearing before the Judges.

LORD LEE.—I think that the Magistrates, in dealing with the payment for goodwill as in part a payment for the proprietor's obligation not to enter upon a competing business, took a sound and discriminating view of the transaction, and I see no reason to doubt that the sum of £63 which they fixed is as much as could reasonably be expected for the premises by the year. The Assessor is mistaken in supposing that the statute requires that the whole payment should be distributed over the different years of the lease. The effect of finding that there was a consideration other than rent is that the stipulated rent cannot be taken as fixing the annual value.

I think that the determination of the Magistrates was right.

LORD FRASER.—It has been decided that where a sum of money is paid to the landlord which is said to be for goodwill, this is to be taken in the general case as simply a payment in advance of rent. At all events it is a consideration other than the rent which the parties insert in the lease (See Drummond v. Assessor for Leith, Feb. 5, 1886, 13 R. 540, and Wilson, May 20, 1884, 21 S. L. R. 545). I have had occasion repeatedly to point out the distinction between the payment of a sum of money called "goodwill" to the landlord on the occasion of a lease, and a payment made by an incoming tenant to the outgoing tenant during the currency of the lease. In the former case, the payment for

"goodwill" is taken into account in entering the value in the Valuation-roll; No. 110. in the latter case, it is not. The way in which the goodwill money ought to be allocated when the money is payable to the landlord is to divide the sum by the number of years of the lease and to add the quotient every year to the sum called "rent" in the lease. It is a mistake to suppose that the case of Drummond was a decision to the effect that only one-half of the sum payable for "goodwill" was to be taken as the sum to be divided. No doubt in that case the assessor did take the one-half; and as both parties acquiesced in this being the right sum to be divided, we did not think it fell within the case that was submitted to us to interfere in this matter.

Selkirk.

In the present case the Assessor would have been quite right but for a specialty to which, with discrimination, the Magistrates have given effect. The sum of £220 which was paid to the landlord Andrew Selkirk was paid not for goodwill merely, but in return for a most important obligation come under by him in favour of the tenant, viz., that he, Selkirk, who was in the trade, should not commence business as a hotel-keeper in opposition to his tenant. This was a valuable consideration in favour of the tenant, for which compensation was due; and therefore I think the Magistrates were right in holding that this ought to be taken into account in ascertaining the sum to be entered as annual value. I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates in this case was right.

WILLIAM ALLAN, tenant and occupant of a public-house in Kilmarnock, appealed to the Magistrates and Town-Council of the burgh against the valuation of £48 put by the Assessor on the public-house for the year ending Whitsunday 1887.

Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Prior to 1886 the public-house was occupied by Mrs Morton, one of its two joint proprietors, at a rental of £14. It was taken by Allan at Whitsunday 1886 at a rental of £18, he also paying Mrs Morton £150 for goodwill.

Case No. 78.

The assessor, who stated that he understood that there was a lease for five years, or at all events that a lease for five years had been promised as a condition of the payment of the £150, had arrived at his valuation by dividing the £150 by the number of years of the lease, and adding the result (£30) to the rent.

Allan contended that the goodwill was paid to Mrs Morton as outgoing tenant, and not as proprietor, and therefore that it could not be taken into consideration in arriving at the annual value of the subject, in proof of which he stated that the other joint proprietor received no portion of the £150, but only participated in the increase of rent from £14 to £18. He also stated that he had no lease of the premises.

- No. 111. The Magistrates and Town-Council, by a majority, held that the rent of £18 could alone be considered in reaching the value of the house.

 Assessor for Kilmarnock v. Allan. There was no hearing before the Judges.

LORD FRASER.—I am of opinion that this case is governed by the decision in Nicolson and Others v. Assessor for Port-Glasgow (March 12, 1886, 23 S. L. R. 603). No doubt there was here a sum of £150 paid by the tenant to the outgoing tenant, who happened to be one of the joint proprietors; but there was another joint proprietor besides the one who received this sum of money. That other proprietor received no part of this £150—all that she can claim is the half of the £18 stipulated as rent. The fact that she does not participate in the £150 leads to the conclusion that that sum was not paid to Mrs Morton qua proprietor, but really and truly for the goodwill of the tenant; and so this case is taken out of the rule laid down in Drummond, &c., v. Assessor for Leith (Feb. 5, 1886, 13 R. 540). I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was right. I adhere to the principle of the decision in the case of Nicolson.

 Case No. 79.

JOHN M'NALLY appealed to the Magistrates and Town-Council of Kilmarnock against the following valuations in the Valuation-roll of the burgh for the year ending Whitsunday 1887, viz., the public-house, No. 4 King Street, of which he was the tenant and occupant, at a value of £70, 10s., and the house, No. 6 King Street, of which he was the tenant, and Robert Neilson the occupant, at a value of £14, it being explained that the appeal was truly against the first entry only.

Both premises were occupied prior to Whitsunday 1886 by Mrs Brown at a rental of £70, she having a lease of the premises, of which three years were then still to run. M'Nally offered to take the premises from Mrs Brown at Whitsunday 1886 and pay her £400 of goodwill, provided the proprietor would cancel her lease, and grant him a fresh lease for seven years. The proprietor would consent to do this only if he received a sum of £50 from M'Nally, and a sum of £70 from Mrs Brown. This was ultimately agreed to; the old lease was cancelled, and a new one granted to M'Nally for seven years at the old rental of £70.

The Assessor reached his valuation by adding the annual value of the sums received by the proprietor (which he understood at the time of making his valuation to amount together to £100, not £120 as came out in evidence) to the rent, making £84, 10s. in all, from which was deducted £14 for the house sublet and entered separately (as to which there was no dispute), leaving £70, 10s. for the public-house, the entry appealed against.

Kilmarnock v.
M'Nally.

M'Nally contended that the £70 paid, not by him but by the outgoing tenant to the proprietor, could in no view be regarded as a consideration which the Assessor was entitled to take into account; and that as regarded the £50 which he himself paid, that also ought not to be taken into account, as it was not a grassum, but the consideration received by the landlord for granting a new lease and accepting a stranger as tenant.

The Magistrates and Council, by a majority, decided that only the £50 paid by M'Nally direct to the proprietor could be regarded as a consideration within the meaning of the Act, and reduced the valuation accordingly to £62, 13s. 4d.

The Assessor took a case.

There was no hearing before the Judges.

LORD FRASER.—In this case I am of opinion that the two sums of £50 and £70 must be taken as considerations other than the rent paid by the tenant to the landlord, and that the contention of the Assessor must be upheld. When the real character of the transaction is looked to, it is just a payment by the tenant of both sums to the landlord of the nature of rent; and therefore the determination of the Magistrates was wrong.

LORD LEE concurred.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates and Town-Council was wrong.

v. Assessor for Leith.

THE ASSESSOR FOR LEITH, Respondent.—J. G. Smith—Thorburn.

Valuation Acts—Principle of valuation—Gas-works belonging to gas company.
—Gas-works, the property of a gas company, were valued by the Assessor on the principle of taking the cost of the company's works, less an allowance for depreciation, and assessing the annual value at a percentage on the balance. The company maintained that the works ought to be valued on the principle of taking the revenue of the company for their preceding financial year, and deducting therefrom the expenses (excluding capital expenses), and also deducting 5 per cent on the expenses in name of tenants' profits—the balance being taken as the value of the subjects.

The Magistrates confirmed the Assessor's valuation. The company appealed.

The Judges being divided in opinion (in accordance with their respective opinions in the Falkirk case, Feb. 24, 1883, 10 R. 651), the valuation stood.

At a Court of the Magistrates of Leith, held on September 14, 1886, the Edinburgh Gas-Light Company, incorporated under the Act 58 Geo. III. cap. lxvii., appealed against three entries in the Valuation-roll for the burgh of "gas-pipes under ground," of which they were the proprietors and occupiers, in the parishes respectively of South Leith, North Leith, and St Cuthbert's, the total values as entered being £598, and craved that these values should be reduced to £317 in all.

The undertaking of the company lay in the city of Edinburgh, the county of Edinburgh, and the burgh of Leith. From the passing of the

Court.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 80.

No. 113. Valuation Act of 1854 until and including the year 1886-87, the following mode was adopted in fixing the valuation of the company's undertaking:—The Assessor for the burgh of Edinburgh obtained from the manager of the company a return shewing, 1st, The amount of revenue drawn by the company for the supply of gas (including the sale of coke, gas-tar, &c.), for the year ending at the date of the company's last annual balance; 2d, The amount of expenses incurred by the company in earning said revenue, exclusive of erection of works, laying of pipes, interest on borrowed money, and landlord's taxes; and 3d, The total amount expended by the company in erecting works and laying pipes in the parishes in which they are situated respectively. The Assessor then deducted the amount of expenses from the amount of revenue, thus ascertaining the nett income of the company from its business, and from this nett income he allowed a further deduction of 5 per cent on the amount of expenses in name of tenants' profits, and a fixed sum of about £700 for risk; and the balance was then taken as the rental of the whole undertaking of the company. The expenses deducted in ascertaining the nett income of the company did not include interest on working capital or insurance of gas-holders, retorts' house and contents, condensing and washing apparatus, and piping throughout works. The rental thus fixed having been divided among the three districts in proportions corresponding to the amount expended by the company on works in each, the proportions applicable to their respective districts were communicated by the Assessor for the burgh of Edinburgh to the other assessors, and were accepted by them.

Mar. 9, 1887.
Edinburgh
Gas-Light Co.
v. Assessor for Leith.

The rental of the whole undertaking thus ascertained for the year 1885-86 was £25,142, of which the proportion effeiring to the burgh of Leith was £598; for the year 1886-87 the corresponding figures were £13,477 and £317.

The Assessor for Edinburgh, requiring more explanation of the cause of so serious a diminution of rental than could be given to him at the time, entered (by arrangement with the company) the rental in the Edinburgh Valuation-roll at the same figures as in the previous year and at the same time sent their former figures to the Leith and the County Assessors, who entered them in their respective rolls, but prior to the sitting of the Valuation Court for Edinburgh it was explained to the City Assessor that the decrease in the revenue of the company was due to—1st, a reduction of 2d. per 1000 feet in the price of gas, which affected the revenue to the extent of about £6000; and 2d, a fall in the prices obtained for residual products, amounting to £9054, making a total loss of £15,054, which, however, had been reduced by increase of business to £11,782, 7s. 4d. It was also explained that these causes of decrease in the revenue were in all probability permanent. After receiving this explanation the Assessor for Edinburgh agreed to accept the figures in the company's return. An appeal by the company was accordingly sustained, and the reduced value entered in the Edinburgh Valuation-roll.

At the Leith Appeal Court, which was held on the day after that of Edinburgh, the company in like manner appealed against their property in the burgh being valued at the old figures, maintaining that the old principle of valuation already explained ought to continue, in accordance with which the cumulo values would be only £317. The Assessor, however, refused to consent to this. He contended that the principle of valuation ought to be to ascertain the capital value of the company's undertaking, less an allowance for depreciation, and to assess the annual value at a percentage on the balance, which percentage he fixed at 8½ per cent; but he stated that the result (£666) was so little above the valuation of last year (£598) that he had allowed last year's valuation to remain for this year. He reached the figure £666 by taking £7844 as the value of the company's pipes in Leith. The total amount expended by the company down to 31st May 1886, as set forth by the secretary under head 3 of the return sent (as already explained) to the Assessor for Edinburgh, was £350,865, of which £8266 was stated as the amount expended within the burgh of Leith. The difference between this last figure and that stated by the Assessor for Leith as the value of the company's property in the burgh was his allowance for depreciation, but the company did not admit the accuracy of his calculation, and there was no evidence on the point.

The Magistrates dismissed the appeal. The company obtained a case. The foregoing facts were stated in the case.

Argued for the company;—In accordance with the practice of the parties during the last thirty years the undertaking had been valued by the city of Edinburgh Assessor, in whose district nearly the whole undertaking lay. It could not be valued in any other way, because a separate valuation of outlying gas-pipes was meaningless. The Leith Assessor was not entitled to defend the entries on a principle of percentage upon cost, which was admittedly inconsistent with the principle on which the entries themselves had been reached. He had not himself valued the undertaking, and had not produced any evidence of the present value, or the proper rate of depreciation, of the pipes in Leith. In order to ascertain the probable annual rent of gas-works, in their actual state from year to year, the legitimate course was to look at the state of the business, ascertain the gross profits, and make a fair deduction for tenants' profits. The practice in Scotland had been in favour of the company's view,¹ which also was that adopted by the Assessor of Railways and Canals when called on to value a gas company, under section 23 of the Act of 1854. It was also the rule in England;² and the same principle had been adopted in Scotland in cases more or less analogous to gas-works.³ Business premises, even agricultural farms not under lease, were valued by reference to the state of the business; thus agricultural depression had been allowed for,⁴ and goodwill as well as rent had been included as part of the annual value.⁵ In the case of collieries, linen factories, and distilleries, the Court had sanctioned a valuation upon the output, number of looms, &c. This was the only sound principle, because the rent to be given must depend not on what the landlord had spent, most unwisely it might be, but on what profit could be made from the premises in their actual state. The principle of a percentage on cost had been sanctioned only in the case of newly erected premises, and then only along with other elements of value.¹ Even if a percentage on cost were a sound principle, it had not been properly applied here by the Leith Assessor, as he should have taken the cost of the whole undertaking, and then ascertained the proportion for Leith, on the principle of the Dundee and the Glasgow Water-Works cases.²

Argued for the Assessor;—This gas company was a private concern, entitled to make profits, and thus it was in a different position from that of corporation gas-works or water-works, which could not earn profits and could not be let, and in which therefore the Court had to reach the annual value of the works on some other principle than that which might be applied to ordinary undertakings. The onus was on the company to shew why a less value than that of the preceding year should be taken, and was not discharged by shewing that if the Assessor had followed the same method of arriving at results as in former years, the value would have been smaller. Different methods might produce substantially the same results, as the *Falkirk*³ case illustrated, and so long as a practically fair result was produced, the Assessor was not bound to scrutinise the theoretical soundness of the method; but when a method of valuation produced a sudden and unexplained fall in the apparent value of the property, the Assessor became bound to inquire into the soundness of the method, for the presumption was against it. The Assessor's method was the sound one. He took the cost, made an allowance for depreciation, and so arrived at the capital value. That was of course on the assumption that the works had not been unnecessarily constructed, and that they were still useful. The Assessor had to consider what interest on his outlay an owner constructing such works would expect—that was evidently at a higher rate than in the case of ordinary buildings—and the Assessor took 8½ per cent, which was the rate suggested by Lord Lee in the *Falkirk*³ case. The system advocated by the company made the annual value depend on the profits for the year, which, owing to bad management, might be nil, whereas a tenant would be influenced by the amount of profit realisable if the business were properly managed. The proposal to deduct 5 per cent on the gross expenditure in name of tenants' profits was clearly wrong, because in that view the larger the expenditure the greater would the tenants' profits be. If the company's principle was to be applied at all, it ought to be applied not only to the valuation of the undertaking, but to the allocation of the value between the several districts. The company, however, in allocating took the cost of construction as the principle, not the profits earned in each district. The earlier cases in Scotland laid down no principle, and in the *Falkirk*³ case the Court was equally divided. In England Judges had expressed themselves dissatisfied with the existing practice, but had felt themselves bound by authority.⁴ Besides, the English rule was not that advocated by the company. For although in England they ascertained the annual value of the whole undertaking by finding the profits of the whole and then deducting a sum for tenants' profits in allocating the amount between the different districts, they valued separately the works, such as gas-meters, stations, main-pipes, in each district, assigned an annual value to them, which they appropriated to the particular district, and, deducting the values of such structural works from the value of the whole undertaking, distributed the balance according to the profits made in each district.

v. Assessor for Leith.

At advising.—

LORD LEE.—I remain of the opinion which I expressed in the case of the Falkirk Gas Company, that earnings do not enable the assessor to fix the annual value of a factory in accordance with the rule laid down by clause 6th, and I think that the proposal of the appellants in this case brings out very distinctly the impossibility of reconciling their method of arriving at the annual value with the rule laid down by the statute. For what the statute requires is, that the yearly value shall be taken to be the rent at which, "one year with another," the subjects might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let by the year. What the appellants demand is that the Assessor shall accept for the ensuing year a return of the income and expenditure for last year under deduction of tenants' profits. The business of manufacturing and supplying gas is not said to have fallen off. On the contrary, the business of the company admittedly has increased; and although the profits are said to have been reduced during last year, it is not suggested that the business has ceased to be a very profitable one. If the amount of profit earned in each year were to determine the valuation for the year following, it would be necessary to ascertain the actual amount of the divisible profits; and the profits earned in Leith would require to be distinguished.

I do not find that any ground has been stated for holding that the lettable value of the subjects has diminished since last year; and as the assessor of Leith is not bound by the mistake of the Edinburgh Assessor, my opinion is that the determination of the Leith Magistrates is right.

It is certainly anomalous and unfortunate that a different principle of valuation should be applied to that part of the works which is situated in Leith from that which has been applied in Edinburgh. I am disposed to think that it would have been better had the appellants applied to have the whole subjects valued by the Assessor of Railways and Canals. It was in their power to obtain this under the 23d section of the statute, and in that case a different rule of valuation would have applied. But that is not before us. We are bound to dispose of the case now stated according to the statute, and as a case for valuation under clause 6th. It is, however, not out of place to point out that if the appellants desire it, they have it in their power to avoid in future any want of uniformity in the principles of valuation applied in different parishes.

LORD FRASER.—In this case we have an appeal from the Magistrates of the burgh of Leith by the Edinburgh Gas-Light Company complaining of the valuation put by the Assessor, and affirmed by the Magistrates, of a portion of their undertaking lying within the burgh of Leith. The Assessor has fixed the annual value at £598, and the appellants maintain that it ought only to be £317.

The pipes of the Edinburgh Gas-Light Company run through Edinburgh city and county, and also through a portion of the burgh of Leith. The mode of valuation adopted by the Assessor is by taking the cost of laying the pipes within Leith, and having ascertained that to be £7844, he then takes $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of this sum and declares that to be the annual value. That percentage would bring out a sum of £666, but he was contented to take the lesser sum of £598. This mode of ascertaining the value is, in my opinion, erroneous. The pipes within the burgh of Leith have in themselves only the value of old iron, unless they are considered as part of the undertaking of the Edinburgh Gas Company, whose works for the manufacture of gas are situated in Edinburgh. The Assessor's proceeding is directly contrary to the rule laid down in the 23d section of the Valuation Act, which deals with the case of gas companies when the valuation is made by the Assessor of Railways and Canals. The mode of valuing is there stated as follows:—The assessor shall “inquire into and fix in cumulo the yearly rent and value, in terms of this Act, of all lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by such water or gas or other company, and forming part of its undertaking, and shall also inquire into and fix the just proportions of such cumulo yearly rent or value applicable to each parish, county, and burgh in Scotland in which such water or gas or other company is liable to be assessed as aforesaid; and such assessor of railways and canals shall include in the Valuation-roll to be made up by him under this Act all the water companies, gas companies, and other companies whose lands and heritages shall be valued by him as aforesaid, and shall set forth in such Valuation-roll, in columns, the yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, in cumulo, of the whole lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by each such water, gas, and other company respectively, and forming part of its undertaking, the names of the several parishes, counties, and burghs in which its said lands and heritages or any part thereof are situated, and also the yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, of the portion in each such parish, county, and burgh, separately and respectively, of the lands and heritages belonging to or leased by each such water, gas, and other company respectively, and forming part of its undertaking.” Thus, therefore, he is to value the whole undertaking and fix in cumulo the proper sum, and then he is to fix a just proportion of such cumulo value applicable to each parish, county, and burgh. The mode of allocating among the parishes the cumulo value was settled in this Court in the case of the Dundee Water Commissioners v. Dundee Road Trustees, &c. (Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 390), and by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Kinnear) in the case of the Magistrates of Glasgow, &c. (Oct. 3, 1884, 12 R. 3). This is the first time that any attempt has been made by a parish or burgh to have the valuation of a portion of an undertaking like the Edinburgh Gas Company, valued without reference to the cumulo value of the whole undertaking. The Edinburgh Gas Company's undertaking must be held to be a unum quid, which cannot be split up into fragments, and valued according to the cost of construction within the parish or burgh—upon which an arbitrary percentage is then to be put. It is quite plain that such a proceeding is contrary to the rule laid down by the statute, and is, in my opinion, utterly senseless, in respect that an unum quid may be so split up as to be valued according to different rules, according as it goes through a number of parishes.

In the case of the Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hall (Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 319) the Court had under consideration the judgment of Lord Kinnear in the case to which I have referred, and I find these remarks of the Lord Ordinary (Lord M'Laren), which are pertinent to the present case,—“It is plain enough, and it is known to the profession, that the application of the Valuation Act to public undertakings is difficult, and that the value of such concerns is arrived at by a highly artificial system of rules, which, as I have said, are not strictly obligatory, but are used as guides to the ascertainment of a reasonable value. In ascertaining the rent to be given by the hypothetical tenant, every element is taken into account which a tenant would consider preparatory to making his offer. Amongst these, repairs, insurance, maintenance, rates, and taxes, are of course considered, because no tenant in considering what rent he could afford to give would omit to take account of such outgoings. The larger the outgoings the less rent would the tenant be able to give, other circumstances being supposed equal, and therefore outgoings are rightly and necessarily allowed for in making the valuation, as deductions from the gross income of the hypothetical tenant.” I concur entirely in these remarks. There is a very great difficulty in fixing a sum as the yearly rent of great public undertakings; but difficult as it is, it must be faced according to the rule laid down by the statute, viz., What rent shall a tenant give for it? I have explained my views upon this subject in the case of the Falkirk Gas Company (Feb. 24, 1883, 10 R. 651), and I do not mean to repeat the views which I there expressed. It is quite plain that no tenant would take a lease of the subject without knowing what were the returns; and a very striking illustration of the prudence of such a course is to be found in contrasting the income of the year 1885 and the year 1886, there being no less a sum than £15,054 of diminution in the latter year as compared with the former. This would certainly be an important matter for consideration on the part of the intending tenant; and it would not affect his judgment in considering what rent he could afford, that the expenditure in the construction of the works was the same in the second year as in the first.

Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

By lease dated 27th August and 4th September 1874, Sir George Grant Suttie, Baronet, of Prestongrange, let to Richard Kitto and others, All and Whole the coal and other minerals in and under the lands and barony of Prestongrange, and also, inter alia, the dues leviable by the lessor at the harbour at Morrison's Haven (the lessor, his heirs, tenants, and servants, being entitled to use the harbour without payment of any dues), the minerals for the space of thirty-one years from 11th November 1874, and the harbour dues for the space of twenty-one years from the said term, with full power to the lessees "to use, but not to use exclusively, the harbour or haven called Morrison's Haven, for transporting and carrying away the said minerals, or importing any and all necessary materials and things for the purpose of the said works or otherwise in relation thereto; as also power to make improvements on the said harbour by converting the site of the existing dam, or part thereof, into a wet dock, and by extending the piers and otherwise, all according to plans and specifications to be submitted to the said Sir George Grant Suttie, and to be approved of by him before the said improvements shall be commenced; but declaring that such improvements shall be at the sole expense of the said lessees, who shall have no claim for compensation or otherwise against the said Sir George Grant Suttie or his forebears, and the said improvements shall not be commenced until all the requisite notices shall be given by the said lessees to the Board of Trade and Admiralty or otherwise (should such notices be necessary); and it is further hereby stipulated that no one having a right to use the said harbour shall be interfered with or impeded by the lessees in the use of it; and the lessees shall further be bound to relieve the said first party and his forebears from all claims of damages in connection with the said improvements at the instance of any party or parties whomsoever." The rents payable under the lease included "a fixed rent of £20 for the dues at Morrison's Haven."

In the years 1875, 1876, and 1877 the lessees deepened and otherwise improved the harbour at a cost of £8000.

On 14th September 1886 the Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Company, Limited, which had by assignation come into the place of the original lessees, appealed to Haddingtonshire Commissioners of Supply against the first of the following valuations in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1887—there being no appeal against the second:—

Subjects.	Proprietor.	Tenant or Occupier.	Yearly Rent.
Harbour, Morrison's Haven.	Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Company, Limited.	The Same.	£80.

Subjects.	Proprietor.	Tenant or Occupier.	Yearly Rent.
Harbour, Morrison's Haven.	Sir George Grant Suttie.	The Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Company, Limited.	£20.

The Assessor had inserted the valuation complained of on the principle that the lease, not only as regarded the minerals, but as regarded the harbour, was to be construed as a lease for thirty-one years, which entitled him to enter the lessees as proprietors of the improvements executed on the harbour, and these he valued at £80 annually, being the valuation complained of. The valuation in the other entry was the rent payable under the lease to the proprietor. He further maintained that even if the lease of the harbour was to be construed as for twenty-one years only, the power to make improvements on the harbour was a consideration other than the rent on the principle of the cases of Gosnell (No. 2) and the Dundee Harbour.¹

The company maintained, —(1) There was here (a) a lease of minerals for thirty-one years, with the right, but not the exclusive right, to use the harbour for the purposes of the mineral workings, which right was a natural adjunct of a mineral lease,² and was included in the mineral rent; and (b) a lease of the right to levy harbour dues for twenty-one years. The lease, therefore, except in so far as it regarded minerals, or the adjuncts of minerals, was for twenty-one years only, and consequently the company could not be entered as proprietors. (2) The power to make improvements could not fairly be regarded as a consideration other than the rent.³

The company took a case.

At advising, —

LORD LEE. — The point raised in this case is attended with considerable difficulty.

By the lease the appellants enjoy (along with the minerals) the use of the harbour of Morrison's Haven for a period of thirty-one years. If they had the exclusive occupation of it as a distinct subject for that period, the Assessor would be clearly right in valuing that subject, irrespectively of the rent payable under the lease, in terms of the proviso attached to clause 6 of the statute. But this is not the state of the facts. For though they were also tenants of the harbour dues, tenancy of the harbour dues was only for twenty-one years. This is not sufficient, in my opinion, to make them lessees of the harbour under a lease, the stipulated duration of which is more than twenty-one years, and therefore liable to be entered in the Valuation-roll as proprietors of the harbour. I am unable, therefore, to sustain the Assessor's view, in so far as it is based upon the duration of the lease.

The question remains, whether, taking the lease as only a twenty-one years' lease, the power to make improvements was truly a condition of the lease, similar in character to that found to exist in the third case of Gosnell (12 R. 571), and in the case of Stephen & Sons, decided in March last year.

The Committee have affirmed the Assessor's view upon that subject, which is supported by evidence, that the harbour required to be deepened and repaired, in order to make it available for schooners of 90 tons burthen. I think that the determination of the committee must be taken as finding in fact that the harbour dues could not be earned without expenditure upon repairs and improvements, and that the harbour itself could not be used for ordinary coal-carrying traffic without such expenditure. In this view I think the necessary expenditure must be regarded as a condition of the lease, and as it had to be undertaken, and was undertaken, by the tenants in addition to the rent, my opinion is that this was a consideration other than rent, which would have justified the Assessor in disregarding the stipulated rent of £20, and that the annual value ought to have been fixed on this footing, both as against proprietor and tenant. This, however, is not what has been done. The entry of £20 as the yearly rent has fixed the annual value as between landlord and tenant. It is not appealed against, and the proprietor has had no opportunity of being heard against any increase.

Being of opinion that the tenants cannot, in the circumstances, be entered as proprietors of the harbour, I think that the valuation ought to stand for this year as fixed by the Assessor's entry of £20, and that, as regards the other entry, which is the subject of the appeal, the determination of the Committee was wrong.

LORD FRASER.—I am of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners of Supply was right, and that this case is governed by the decisions in Gornell, &c., v. Assessor for Edinburgh (27th January 1885, 12 R. 571), and the Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c., v. Assessor for Dundee (19th March 1886, 13 R. 829). It is perfectly clear that although the improvements upon the harbour were made under what is called a "power" to, and not an express obligation by, the tenant, these improvements were resolved upon from the outset, and the rent adjusted accordingly. The expenditure of such a large sum as £8000 upon the improvements indicates plainly the character of this bargain, and leaves no room for doubt that the tenant got value for this expenditure in the adjustment of the rent. I think, further, that the appellants were rightly entered, in terms of the 6th section of the statute, as proprietors in the Valuation-roll, seeing that the right which they have obtained to use the harbour was practically a lease for thirty-one years.

THE JUDGES being divided in opinion, the decision of the Commissioners stood.

MRS C. M. H. P. BOUVERIE CAMPBELL AND HUSBAND, Defenders (Appellants).—D. F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson—Chisholm.

Reparation—River—Liability of upper heritor in respect of operations in alveo.—A farm road, running midway along the steep face of a hill, was carried through the bed of a little burn upon an embankment or breastwork, built up by the proprietor so as to keep the road on a level, the burn running over the surface of the road. The embankment had been there for upwards of forty years, and had been repaired and strengthened from time to time. In 1884 the proprietor put sheep drains into his farm, and at the same time increased the breadth of the embankment. A lower heritor, who had been injured in the autumn of 1885 by an extraordinary flood in the burn, raised an action of damages against the upper proprietor, averring that the flood had been caused by the flood-water of the burn being obstructed by the stones and rubbish which had gradually gathered across its course upon the embankment, and so diverted out of its proper channel against his property. The Court held that in point of fact the overflow had not been caused in that way, and had not happened at that point. Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, No. 115. and Lord Craighill) that the proprietor would not have been liable even if the flood had been due to the embankment, the operations of the upper proprietor having been lawful and ordinary operations, involving no risk of damage except from some extraordinary cause. Mar. 10, 1887.

Filshill v.
Campbell.

JOHN FILSHILL was the feuar of a villa and garden ground on the sea-shore at Innellan. The ground behind the feu rises steeply, and a small burn runs down the hillside and through the property of Mr Filshill. The proprietor of the ground outside the feu was Mrs Campbell of Dunoon. After an extraordinary fall of rain the burn, on 12th September 1885, came down in spate, burst its banks at a point on Mrs Campbell's property, and flooded Mr Filshill's ground, doing considerable damage. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyll.
I.

Mr Filshill then raised an action in the Sheriff Court against Mrs Campbell to recover damages for the injury so caused. It appeared that a farm road ran along the hillside on the defender's land, and at the point where it crossed the bed of the burn it was embanked or built up so as to keep the level, the burn, which in general was a very small stream, running across the road and falling over the breastwork of the embankment. The road and embankment had existed from time immemorial, but in 1884 the embankment had been repaired by the defender's tenant, and two or three feet added to its breadth. About the same time the defender put sheep drains into the hill farm, which fed the burn.

The pursuer averred that a wire fence put up by the defender along the edge of the road caught rubbish that was carried down by the burn, and that stones and sand brought down by the burn in flood were washed on to the level of the road and heaped up, thereby causing an obstruction.

He pleaded;—1. An opus manufactum having been constructed by the principal defender, or with her knowledge and authority, in the bed or course of the burn in question, she is liable for any damage that may have been occasioned through its presence to the pursuer as a neighbouring proprietor. 2. The pursuer's property having been damaged by the diversion of the water caused by the opus manufactum in question, the principal defender is bound to make good the said damage to the pursuer.

The defender stated that the overflow took place at a point twenty-five yards or so above the road, and was not caused by the embankment. The pursuer's averments as to the accumulation of rubbish on the road were denied.

The defenders pleaded;—3. The overflow complained of having resulted from natural causes at a point removed from the said embankment, the defenders cannot be made responsible to the pursuer for any damage that may have resulted therefrom. 4. Even assuming that the said damage was connected with the existence and construction of the breastwork, the defenders are not liable in damages in respect (1) the flood on the occasion in question was unprecedented, and such as could not have been anticipated, and (2) the breastwork has existed in its present position, and of its present construction, from time immemorial, or at all events anterior to 1880, when the pursuer acquired his property, or otherwise, any changes effected on the breastwork since the pursuer acquired his feu have been executed in the full knowledge and with the acquiescence of the pursuer.

A proof was taken, in which the evidence to a large extent was directed to shew at what point, as matter of fact, the burst had occurred, the pursuer relying on the evidence of an engineer who visited the place two days

No. 115. after the flood, the defender leading evidence as to the levels, with intent to shew that the stoppage could not have been caused at the road, where a very slight rise would have sent the water away from the pursuer's property, but must have taken place at a point twenty-five yards up, just above a "throat" or little gully in the channel, where the banks fell away so as to lead the water on to the pursuer's property.

Mar. 10, 1887.
Filahill v.
Campbell.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campion), after detailed findings, found "that said damage was the result of the operations conducted by defenders or by persons for whom they are responsible, and that they are accordingly liable in the same; assesses the amount at the sum of £70 sterling."*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—First, on the facts, the flood did not occur at the road, but twenty-five yards above. There had not been shewn to be any barrier at the road that would dam the burn.

Second, on the law, the opus manufactum had been there for time immemorial, and was not of a kind to involve liability, for the erection of it was an act of ordinary management. That distinction took this case out of the rule of such cases as *Rylands v. Fletcher*¹ and Kerr v. The Earl of Orkney,² where it was laid down that a person who dammed up water and so created an extraordinary danger, thereby imposed on himself the duty of making his neighbours absolutely safe, just as one did who chained up a wild beast. The principle which ruled the present case was that laid down in Mackintosh v. Mackintosh,³ viz., that one executing a lawful and ordinary operation was only liable if culpa were proved. It had been said that in such cases where an operation was performed for the benefit, e.g., of agriculture, a very substantial amount of damage must be shewn,⁴ and the extent to which the Court had gone in giving damages for the result of ordinary operations even of damming⁵ had been regretted.⁶ [LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—What do you say to Pirie's case, to which the Sheriff-substitute refers?] That case was decided on the ground that no culpa was proved against the defenders, and the Lord Justice-Clerk had taken the view that the extraordinary flood there was a damnum fatale. The result of that case, therefore, was favourable to the defender here.

Argued for the pursuer;—First, on the facts, it had been shewn that the flood took its origin at the road, or, in any event, it could not be denied that the road might have contributed to cause the flood.

Second, in law, that was sufficient; for a heavy responsibility attached to him who meddled with the course of a running stream.⁷ The present case was of the category represented by the case of Kerr v. The Earl of Orkney, the principle of which case had been affirmed in the House of

* "NOTE.— . . . The plea of the unprecedented nature of the flood, amounting to a damnum fatale, is disposed of by various decisions and dicta of Judges which may be briefly summed up in the words of Lord Gifford's interlocutor in Pirie & Sons v. Town-Council of Aberdeen, 18th January 1871, 9 Macph. 412. 'He who meddles with the ordinary course of a stream is bound to provide not only for ordinary but for extraordinary floods, even for those which are so rare that they may only happen once or twice in a century.'"

Lords to be that it is the duty of one who throws a dam across a stream to provide in an efficient manner not only against usual occurrences and the ordinary state of things, but also against things which are unusual and extraordinary.¹ The same principle had been applied to the case of a man lighting a bing of refuse from ironstone.² The distinction was there laid down to be the distinction between the ordinary uses of property and the construction of an opus manufactum. Mar. 10, 1887.
Filibill v. Campbell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I had from the beginning of the argument considerable doubt whether the very foundation of the pursuer's case was not subject to reasonable observation. The defender is the proprietor of the land over which the stream in question flows, and for a considerable time a breastwork, built by the proprietor, had existed across this little stream for the purpose of levelling its bed, across which the farm road passed. The foundation of the action is that that is not a lawful proceeding on the part of the proprietor, unless precautions were taken to prevent regurgitation or damming back of the water in the event of a flood. That is the foundation of the claim by the pursuer; it is said that there was an obligation on the defender not to make or increase this breastwork unless he is careful to prevent the risk of damming back the stream in time of flood.

I am not prepared to affirm that as a proposition in law. I think there is an obligation on the proprietor to prevent the burn from straying on to his neighbour's ground owing to his operation; but there must be bounds to that obligation, and if the proprietor has only used his property in a legal and laudable way for the benefit of himself and his tenants, and of his neighbours too, he is not responsible for an unexpected result of his acts. I am not satisfied that there was any breach of that obligation by the defender. He was entitled to perform the operation, and the result was unexpected.

But, in the second place, I think it is open to the greatest possible doubt whether the breastwork had anything to do with the result. The stream, as it seems, burst its bounds twenty-five yards above the breastwork, altered its channel entirely, and did much damage. It is said that that was caused by the breastwork. I am not satisfied that that is so. It may to a certain extent have contributed to the result, though I am not satisfied that even so much is proved. In cases of wild upland streams like this, when an overflow takes place, the water meets obstacles at every point which alter its course, and it is impossible to say what particular obstacle is the cause of its deviation. But it is enough to say that it has not been shewn that the defender's breastwork was the cause of the damage.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It is a pity that the pursuer, who undoubtedly suffered, did not attribute his suffering to the extraordinary rainfall rather than to the fault of his neighbour.

I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the grounds of action here are not established, and I differ from the Sheriff-substitute. I need not say that if anyone improperly introduces water into a stream and so causes it to overflow to his neighbour's damage, he will be responsible, or, if he makes an illegal erection in the bed of the stream to his neighbour's damage, he will again be responsible.

No. 115.

Mar. 10, 1887.
Filshill v.
Campbell.

The two grounds on which the defender's responsibility is stated to be rested are, first, that she put sheep drains through the ground in 1884. I need not say that sheep drains are quite lawful, and as water must run down hill, the stream will take the water from these drains with it in the way it is going. But that is not an unlawful introduction of water into a stream.

The second ground is thus stated,—“At the point where this farm road meets the small burn the principal defender, or her tenants with her knowledge and consent, have built a stone breastwork across the bed of the said small burn, and have filled up the space behind the breastwork, and have thus carried the farm road as a solid structure across the bed of the said small burn. The burn is allowed to run across the said road and to fall over the breastwork, when it resumes its natural course towards the Newton Burn.”

Now, I do not say that the roadway may not be repaired in an illegal way, so as to impede the course of the stream. But, to begin with, this is a case of a little stream crossing the road, a road which has been there beyond the memory of man. In such a case the road requires constant attention to keep it up, for the stream is constantly engaged in wearing it away. But there can be no question that the defender is not responsible for the road being where it was, or for this stream crossing it. He might have repaired it in an unlawful way in 1884, but I am of opinion that he did nothing illegal in that respect.

The Sheriff-substitute, however, after affirming these two facts, says,—“The effect of these operations was to cause a silting up of mud or sand in the bed of the burn above this structure or breastwork; (6) that on 12th September 1885 there was an exceptionally heavy fall of rain, causing a flood in the burn; (7) that this silting up of the bed of the burn and the stones which, brought down by the flood, collected there, had the effect of damming back the water coming down the burn, so as to cause it to overflow a little distance above where said obstruction occurred”; and so considerable damage was done.

I am not of opinion with the Sheriff-substitute that the effect of the sheep-draining of the farm and the repairing of the road which the burn crosses was to cause or to contribute to cause the overflow which did the pursuer damage. That is quite enough, if it is not proved that the overflow was due to these operations.

But further, the import of the evidence is, that the flood was not caused by these things at all, but was caused by there being too much water for the channel of the burn to carry at the point where the ground descends on each side of it. That is quite irrespective of these operations; it is at a different part of the burn, quite above the defender's operations, to which it is attributed. I should therefore affirm not only that the overflow is not proved to be due to the defender's operations, but also that it is proved not to be due to them.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in thinking that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled. I think he is wrong in regard to the facts, and wrong in regard to the law which he has applied to the facts. I have sat here and listened as attentively as I could to the evidence which has been read and the observations of parties' counsel on both sides, but I am not yet in a position to say what caused the overflow. There are theories given on one side, and there are theories given on the other, but I am not satisfied that that which happened on 12th September would not have happened if that breakwater of which so much has been said had not been there. The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the breakwater was the cause ; I am of a different opinion. I think it has not been proved to be the cause, nay, more, I think it has been proved not to be the cause, and I should concur in a finding to that effect, if such finding is proposed. No. 115.

Mar. 10, 1887.
Filabill v. Campbell.

It is not necessary to go further, but I am of opinion that the erection of the breakwater was a fair exercise of her rights of administration of her property by the proprietor. All that was intended to be done, and all that was done, was to improve the road. If it could have been said that it was probable that injury would accrue to her neighbours from the erection, she might perhaps have been prevented, for she is not entitled to do injury to her neighbours that there might be greater facilities here for crossing the stream. But it does not appear to me that there was any risk to anyone from the exercise of this power by the proprietor.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that the pursuer's case fails entirely in point of fact. I could not conceive that the operation of meddling with the bed of the burn, so as to make it level for a breadth of twelve feet or so, could have had any effect in obstructing the course of the stream. But the case of the pursuer is that upon this level there were deposited sand, stones, and rubbish, which had the effect of obstructing the course of the stream, and made it flow out over the pursuer's land. There is no proof of any such obstruction there, and there is proof of an obstruction much further up, which was not due to the defender's operations.

As regards the questions of law that have been raised, I prefer to reserve my opinion.

THE COURT found that the injury sustained by the pursuer was not attributable to any act or operation of the defender, and therefore sustained the appeal, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, and assoilzied the defender.

Mines and minerals—Support to surface—Support to adjacent surface.—A proprietor of lands sold the surface, reserving the minerals and right to work the same “upon payment to the proprietors of the ground of what loss and damage they shall sustain thereby upon the land.” He then worked out the whole of an upper seam of coal by stoop-and-room. Subsequently he sold a lower seam to a person who worked out the coal therein, leaving, however, a solid mass of coal unworked beneath and fifty yards round a steading which belonged to the owner of the surface. That steading having been damaged by subsidence of the ground, caused by the withdrawal of the lateral support in the lower seam, the owner of the surface raised an action against the owner of the lower seam and his tenant, in which the defenders pleaded that they were not liable for the damage in respect that it was due to the previous working in the upper seam, and that the defenders had left the subjacent support entirely unworked, and were not bound to give support a latere.

Held that the pursuer was entitled to damages from the defenders on the ground that the original proprietor of the minerals after working out the upper seam could not have wrought the lower without being liable for the damage resulting therefrom, and could not transmit his right without that liability.

I.

THIS was an action at the instance of the testamentary trustees of Alexander White, proprietors of the surface of certain lands in Stirlingshire, against the Duke of Hamilton, proprietor of the minerals (other than whinstone and freestone), and his tenants, the Redding Colliery Company. The sole partners of the company were the testamentary trustees of Johan Theodor Salvesen. The summons concluded, first, for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to work the minerals so as not to leave support for the surface above and adjacent to the seams worked by them, and that they were bound to work the minerals so as not to alter the surface of the lands, and for that purpose were bound to leave sufficient stoops, dykes, and pillars to support the surface. There was, in the second place, a conclusion for interdict against working that would have the effect of breaking or altering the levels, "so as to endanger the said surface being injured or altered in level, or so as to injure or destroy any buildings, machinery, or erections on the pursuers' said lands." Finally, there was a conclusion for £5000 of damages in respect of injury done on the surface by subsidence.

The state of title to the property was as follows, viz.:—In 1818 the whole estate, surface and minerals, belonged to Livingstone of West Quarter. In that year a process of ranking and sale of his estate was brought, and under that process, in 1820, Mr Learmonth Mackenzie bought the surface. There was a reservation in his conveyance of the minerals excepting whin and freestone, and also of the right "of making holes and sinks, and setting down shanks, with roads and passages in and to the same, within any part of the foresaid lands, upon payment to the proprietors of the ground of what loss and damage they shall sustain thereby upon the land, according to the determination of two neutral men, one to be chosen by the proprietor of the coal, and the other by the proprietor of the land." Mr Alexander White, in 1863, bought the surface from Mr Mackenzie's trustees, and on his death, in 1870, his trustees came into possession of the surface.

Mr Livingstone, or the judicial factor in the process of ranking and sale, worked out the splint or upper seam of coal all over the lands before 1832, by stoop-and-room working.

In 1837 the whole minerals were acquired at a judicial sale by the Carron Coal Company. In 1854 the Duke of Hamilton, by contract of excambion recorded in 1857, acquired right to the Cocksroad seam, a stratum of coal lying under that which had been worked. In 1858, after working the coal for some years himself, he granted a lease for thirty-one years, and to that lease the Redding Colliery Company acquired right by an assignation in 1865, with consent of the Duke. Throughout the titles of the mineral owners there was an obligation as to payment of damages similar to that contained in the reservation in the conveyance of the surface to Mackenzie, already quoted, and this obligation was by the terms of the lease and the assignations laid upon the tenants also.

The defenders did not resist the conclusions for declarator and interdict. The only question in dispute was the amount due for damage done to the surface by subsidence. The defenders again admitted that some damage had been caused by their operations, and stated that they were willing to pay for it. A long proof was led as to the extent of the damage, but the only point of general importance and interest was the claim for damage done to a farm-steading. The buildings were extensively cracked, and it was alleged that this was due to subsidence caused by the operations of the mineral tenants or of the Duke. As already stated, the splint seam had been worked out by Livingstone, or the judicial factor on the estate, by stoop-and-room. The defenders had worked the Cocksroad or lower seam by long-wall working, but under the steading No. 116. they had left a large mass of coal unworked to support it. There were no workings in the lower seam within fifty yards of the steading.

In these circumstances, the defenders maintained that the damage could not be due to their workings, but must be the result of bad foundations, while the pursuers maintained that by the withdrawal of lateral support the defenders had caused a "draw" in the upper seam by which the stoops were crushed, and the subsidence of the surface ensued.

On this point, and in the view that their theory as to bad foundations failed, the defenders pleaded;—(7) The damage which exists being to a great extent due to workings by the pursuers' own authors, and not to any workings by the defenders, they are not liable in such damage as is referable to these prior workings.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 13th November, as regarded the damage to the steading, adopted the theory of the pursuers, assessing the damage on this head at £200. On the whole matter, he, of consent of the defenders, found, decerned, and declared against them in terms of the conclusions for declarator and interdict, and in regard to the petitory conclusions gave decree against them for £1070.*

The defenders reclaimed.

They did not deny liability generally, but maintained that as regarded the damage to the steading, they were not liable, in respect that the damage done there was not due to their workings, but to the previous workings in the splint coal with which they had nothing to do, and also because they had left the subjacent support entirely unworked, and could not be held bound to give support a latere. A mineral worker was not bound to leave any further support than was necessary to support the land in its natural state; as regarded buildings, it had been held that the right to support depended not on the same considerations as the right of the surface owner to support for the natural surface, but on prescriptive possession.¹ That suggested a rule for the case where upper mineral workings required support, and if that suggestion were followed, there was no absolute obligation to support the splint workings here. The natural state of things having been destroyed, the right to support as an absolute right was gone. Damages could only be recovered so far as the injury was direct, but it was impossible to say that the subsidence was directly caused by the defenders. There was no obligation on persons working minerals under adjacent land to support the surface of their neighbours' property.² Every worker was entitled to work as if things around him were in their natural state, nor was his knowledge that they were not so of any moment. There was knowledge in the Birmingham case.² The pursuers would argue

* With regard to the defenders' plea on this point of the case, quoted supra, his Lordship said,—“An argument in point of law was submitted by the defenders against liability for damages on account of injury to the steading. The coal not having been removed by them underneath the steading, and consequently the subjacent support not being taken away, it is contended that there can be no liability for damages. It is said that injury arising from adjacent operations, which make themselves felt by a draw, is not a ground for a claim of damage. To some extent this might be admitted if the workings which set the strata in motion were at a considerable distance and not strictly adjacent. But the Lord Ordinary knows of no authority for holding that when the workings are immediately adjacent to the shattered building, liability does not exist, and accordingly he rejects this contention in point of law.”

that they had an absolute right of support; if that were so, they could have prevented the stoop-and-room workings in the splint seam, for these, too, would in course of time bring down the surface. Their absolute claim to support was therefore gone, and that being so, they must shew fault or recklessness or an unusual mode of working, and none of these could be shewn from the evidence. The liability for the damage really rested on those who had worked the splint seam, and no conveyance of the subjacent minerals could carry with it a liability incurred in consequence of workings in the superincumbent seam.

As regarded the cases founded on by the other side, in the Duke of Rutland's case¹ an injunction was granted against a proprietor who proposed to derogate from his own grant by making the working of minerals in one seam difficult or impossible by reason of workings in another. *Brown v. Robins*² had been cited in the Birmingham case. In Bald's case³ the mineral worker had not only worked the subjacent stratum, but had taken the accumulated water out of the upper stratum, a proceeding which would have been paralleled in the present case if the defenders had, in addition to working their own coal, taken out the stoops in the upper workings. There was no such recklessness here, and therefore Bald's case was no authority.

Argued for the pursuers;—The mineral owner in acquiring his property acquired it with an obligation to support the surface as it stood,⁴ and he might be interdicted from bringing down the surface,⁵ i.e., from working by long-wall working; the practical result being that all working could be stopped, i.e., the mineral worker compelled to buy the surface. Long-wall working was therefore illegal in a question with the owner of the surface. That had been assumed to be good law in the general case in Henderson v. Dimmack's case,⁶ although interdict was refused there because of the express terms of the feu-contract between the parties. The form of injunction, which would in the ordinary case be granted in England, was to be found in the case of Proud.⁷ The obligation to support the surface lay upon the owner of the minerals, and he could not by dividing the ownership of the different seams contrive to shuffle off this liability,⁸ and it would require the clearest evidence to establish a contract involving such a result.⁹ If he could divest himself of this obligation by selling his minerals, he might thus obtain a full price from a purchaser for what was worth nothing to himself; which was absurd. In *Brown v. Robins*¹ there was a very clear precedent for the present case, for the subsidence there took place in similar circumstances, i.e., there were two series of excavations, and the second worker was found liable. Bald's case³ was also in point, for there was not due care in the working here; a prudent miner would have worked by stoop-and-room. The Birmingham case was not an authority, for, in the first place, there was an intervening

tees v. Duke of Hamilton.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the pursuers, who are proprietors of certain lands in the county of Stirling, sue the Duke of Hamilton, who is proprietor, and the Redding Colliery Company, who are lessees of the minerals below these lands, for declarator, interdict, and damages in respect of alleged injury done to the surface by reason of certain mineral workings.

In regard to the Duke of Hamilton and his lessees, the Lord Ordinary has of consent of these defenders decerned in terms of the declaratory conclusions, and of those for interdict, and on the conclusions for damages he has sustained the claim of the pursuers to the extent of £1070. In this way the case presented to the Lord Ordinary, and as dealt with by him, was simply an assessment of damages, in which, as he explains, no question of law was raised by either side.

I am not surprised that the Lord Ordinary should have so treated the questions in dispute, because in substance no other contention was raised on the record. It is admitted by the defenders that in several instances the injuries complained of were caused by mineral workings. It is alleged as to some of these grounds of complaint that they had been paid for; in regard to others, that these defenders were ready to arbitrate; but nowhere do I find any allegation that they were not due more or less to the operations of mineral working.

I think this course was an honest one; for if I read the titles aright the defenders were working under a title which expressly bound them to compensate the owner of the surface for all damage which their workings might occasion. It may tend to clearness if in a few words I explain how the titles stand.

The property now in dispute belonged to Livingstone of West Quarter, and in 1818 a process of ranking and sale of his estate of Parkhall was raised, which embraced both surface and minerals. The surface was purchased by Mr Learmonth Mackenzie from the judicial factor in 1820, but the minerals continued to be worked by the judicial factor, or a lessee from him, down to 1837, when Carron Company purchased them. At that time it appears that the whole of the upper or splint seam had been worked out, chiefly by the mode of working called stoop-and-room.

It is stated in the defences to this action that when the surface was purchased in 1820 it was under reservation of the coal and other minerals, and the right "of making holes and sinks, and setting down shanks, with roads and passages in and to the same, within any part of the foresaid lands, upon payment to the proprietors of the ground of what loss and damage they shall sustain thereby upon the land, according to the determination of two neutral men, one to be chosen by the proprietor of the coal, and the other by the proprietor of the land." The titles are very scantily produced, but I have looked into a crown charter, which is in process, expedited by Carron Company in 1856, including the whole minerals under Parkhall, and a very complete narrative of the titles since the middle of last century. This charter contains an obligation on the crown vassal in the same terms as the above. By a contract of excambion, recorded in 1857, Carron Company conveyed to the Duke of Hamilton the Cocksroad seam, part of these minerals, which was

No. 116. worked by himself till 1858, when he granted a lease of them for thirty-one years. It is stated in the defences that this lease was assigned to the late Mr Salvesen in 1865, and that the assignation contained "an obligation to settle claims for surface damage caused by workings prior to these dates" (art. 4).

Mar. 10, 1887.
White's Trustees v. Duke of Hamilton.

I conclude, therefore, that the obligation to make compensation for surface damage ran through all these conveyances. In this state of matters it seems clear that Carron Company could not, in a question with the owner of the surface, have so worked the lower or Cocksroad seam as to cause either vertical or lateral disturbance in the worked out waste above, so as to damage the surface, and that they could not confer on their disponent any higher or other right than they had themselves, either at common law or under the stipulations I have referred to. I am therefore prepared to hold, with the Lord Ordinary, that the defence raises no legal question, if it be admitted or proved that damage to the surface has resulted from the operations of the defenders, and that there is no room in this case for the application of the principle on which the case of the Birmingham Gas Company (6 Ch. Div. 284) was decided.

On the real merits of the case I concur without difficulty, though with one exception, with the Lord Ordinary's views. The conflict of opinion is no doubt troublesome, but I am the less disturbed by it on account of one element too common in these cases, and of which the present is an unprofitable example. I have already said that the defenders admit in several instances, and do not on their record vehemently dispute in any, that the mineral workings have caused or tended to cause the results complained of. But when it comes to the experts they at once discover entirely other causes for the appearances in question. Thus the drainage is said to be affected, not by mineral disturbance, but by a weed called puddock pipes. The brick-kiln has simply been overheated, and thus were caused the cracks. The steading, it is said, was badly built on a bad foundation. The Lord Ordinary has without hesitation discarded these theories, and of the last of them he says,—“This suggestion has been clearly disproved, and may be dismissed from consideration.” But in weighing the conflicting testimony I cannot lay out of view that such was the case which these men of character and experience came to support.

But my coincidence with the conclusions of the Lord Ordinary is not, as I have said, absolute. He thinks, and in that I agree with him, that the pursuer's claim is exaggerated. It is my opinion that it should be farther reduced. I propose that we should reduce it from £1070 to £800. With that alteration, I am in favour of adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The only difficulty which I have felt in this case is whether the defenders are liable for the injury done to the steading. That the steading has been injured by the mineral workings I hold to be proved as matter of fact; but it is equally certain that if the upper seam had been entire the steading would not have been damaged. For, on that supposition, it is admitted that the defenders left a sufficient quantity of coal to give all necessary support to the steading, and that it was injured only because the upper seam had been previously worked.

The defenders contend that they are not concerned with the previous workings in the upper seam, and that they were within their legal rights if they did so more than work the seam belonging to them as far as they were entitled to do, No. 116. on the footing of the upper seam being untouched.

I was much impressed by the argument of the defenders and the authority on which it is based, but I have come to be of opinion that it is not well founded. Mar. 10, 1887.
White's Trustees v. Duke of Hamilton.

The upper seam had been worked when the whole minerals belonged to Mr Livingstone, or to trustees for his creditors. I think that he could not give a higher right to any disponee than he himself possessed. If he had continued to be sole proprietor of the minerals, and had worked them as the defenders have done, I am of opinion that he would have been liable to the pursuer for the damage done to the steading. It is said that this liability would have arisen from his working of the upper seam, and not from the working of the lower seam. I cannot adopt that view. It seems to me that a limitation would be put on his right to work the lower seam by having worked the upper seam, and I further think that the defenders, as his disponees, are under the same limitation. If it were otherwise the lower seam would have been more valuable to him for sale than for working. This is, I think, impossible, and hence I hold that his disponees were under the same limitations by which he was himself affected.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, except to the extent and effect of substituting the sum of £800 for £1070.

Magistrates of Writ—Succession—Holograph unsigned document—Revocation by pencil marking—Proof of intention to cancel.—Unsigned pencil alterations made by a testator on his testament written in ink will be presumed to be deliberative merely, but if there is evidence, parole or otherwise, to shew that he intended them to be final they will receive effect.

A trustor in his trust-deed directed his trustees to give effect to "any codicil or separate writing under my hand or signed by me, from which my trustees may be satisfied as to my wishes and intentions, notwithstanding the same may be defective in the solemnities required by law." By holograph codicil written in ink and signed he bequeathed £10,000 to the Magistrates of Glasgow, with directions how it was to be applied in charity. In his repositories these documents were found along with two other holograph pencil documents, which were both undated and unsigned. In one of these, headed "Notes as to settlement and alterations," he stated that he had "now meantime cancelled" his bequest to the Magistrates of Glasgow, "owing to losses on investments." The other was a list of charities to which he had left bequests, but that to the Magistrates was not mentioned. Through the bequest and instructions relative thereto in the holograph codicil were drawn perpendicular pencil lines, and along its margin was drawn in ink a bracket. It was admitted that a few months before his death the testator had called upon his law-agents and informed them that, having lost £30,000, he had resolved to make some alterations on his settlement and codicil, and that he got possession of these documents, which were at that time free from deletions and interlineations. Held that it had been proved that the bequest had been effectually cancelled by the trustor.

Question, whether the first unsigned holograph writing was a valid testamentary writing of the deceased.

No. 117. JAMES CRUIKSHANK, builder, Glasgow, died suddenly at Harrogate on 9th October 1884.

Mar. 10, 1887.
Lamont v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

1st Division.
M.

After his death there were found in his repositories along with other business documents the following testamentary writings:—(1) Trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th October 1874; (2) Separate holograph codicil or letter, written in ink and signed, bearing dates 9th October 1878 and 27th November 1879; (3) Holograph document written in pencil and headed "Notes as to settlement and alterations," unsigned and undated; and (4) Holograph document written in pencil, with one correction in ink, containing list of charitable institutions, &c., with certain sums set opposite their names, unsigned and undated.

Questions having arisen as to the effect of these writings, a special case was presented to the Court, in which James Lamont and others, the trustees under the first mentioned deed, were the first parties, and the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow, who maintained that they were entitled to a legacy of £10,000 under the codicil of 1878-79, were the second parties.

The deceased left property to the value of about £120,000. The following facts relative to the execution of the deeds in question were stated in the case. The original trust-deed was prepared by Mr Cruikshank's law-agents, and remained, after execution, in their custody till 1879, when the testator consulted them as to a holograph codicil which he had prepared, being the document second mentioned above. That document was at Mr Cruikshank's request put up along with his trust-deed, and left in the custody of his agents.

In April 1884, Mr Cruikshank again called on his agents and informed them that having lost about £30,000, he had resolved to make some alterations on the legacies in the holograph codicil. That deed was handed to him and he took it away with him. It was then free from deletions and interlineations.

In July 1884, Mr Cruikshank again called, and, after stating again that owing to losses he wished to make some alterations on his settlements, he took away the original trust-deed, which was also at that time free from deletions and interlineations.

Both these documents remained in his possession till his death.

When Mr Cruikshank's testamentary writings were inspected after his death, it was found that large alterations had been made upon them in ink and pencil, and that the holograph documents mentioned 3d and 4th had been placed along with the others in his repositories.

The question submitted to the Court depended on the following passages in the documents.

The second purpose of the trust-deed was as follows:—"In the second place, I direct and enjoin my trustees to pay and deliver any legacies or bequests, and fulfil all such directions or instructions respectively, as may be contained in any codicil hereto, or separate writing under my hand, or signed by me, from which my trustees may be satisfied as to my wishes and intentions, notwithstanding the same may be defective in the solemnities required by law."

The codicil of 1878-79 contained the following entry:—"To the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow Ten Thousand pounds in trust, the Revenue to be given in small Precepts or Pensions of £4 up to £8 p. an^m to poor old men or women in rather indigent and needful circumstances, not under sixty years of age (except in peculiar or distressing circumstances), and of excellent character, sober and industrious habits, and members of or attached to any of our Presbyterian or Episcopal churches; applicants to be natives of Scotland or England, but must have been resident in Glasgow, or within a radius of ten miles, for at least seven years." No. 117. Then followed detailed directions as to the manner in which this legacy was to be applied; and, towards the end of the deed, a power was given to the trustees in the event of their not having "ample funds at their disposal at the time of my decease" to "pay the bequest to the Magistrates of £10,000 in three yearly instalments if necessary."

Mar. 10, 1887.
Lamont v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

When this codicil was opened after the testator's death, it was found that pencil lines had been drawn perpendicularly or in a slanting direction through the whole of the provisions relating to that bequest, the text of which had further been altered in some small particulars (in figures and otherwise) in ink. Further, along the margin of the whole of these provisions (with the exception of the last mentioned power to the trustees), there was drawn in ink a bracket or circumflex.

There were in other parts of the codicil various alterations in ink or in pencil, and some words were deleted both in ink and in pencil.

One of the holograph documents written in pencil and unsigned and undated, was headed "Notes as to settlement and alterations." It contained this clause:—"As regards my oldest son, his share is to be retained in trust, and only the interest paid him. In the event of his decease, his share to be divided amongst his children when the youngest comes of age, should he have any. If there is none, then the his share will go to my other sons, with the exception of £10,000 which I had arranged to leave to the Magistrates of Glasgow for benevolent purposes, as stated in the manuscript which I handed you, but have now meantime cancelled, owing to losses on investments. . . . Burden this also with the keeping my repair painting monument in the Southern Necropolis in repair, oiling, & painting it, and the inscriptions.

"The $1000 or £500 to Merchant's House to be burdened with keeping my monumt in the Necropolis in good condition, & painting the inscriptions, when required, to have them distinct & readable."

The fourth writing was a list of charities to which legacies were left, and the amount left to them. They, in the main, coincided with those left in the holograph codicil; the legacy to the Magistrates of Glasgow was nowhere mentioned in this writing.

The following question was submitted to the Court:—"Are the parties of the second part entitled to demand, and are the parties of the first part bound to make payment of the said legacy of £10,000 as a valid and subsisting legacy?"

Argued for the first parties;—The legacy in question had been validly cancelled by the truster. The question was, did the truster intend to cancel the legacy? The words of the holograph writing were quite clear. They referred to a deed which had been done, and the only act the truster had done was to draw pencil lines through the part of the codicil which bequeathed the £10,000. They conceded that where a document in ink was scored with pencil marks the presumption was that the pencil markings were merely deliberative,¹ but that presumption could be rebutted by evidence, parole or otherwise, of the intention of the testator that the pencil marks should be considered as final. The mere fact that they were in pencil was of no materiality.² Here the truster not only told his agents he intended to alter his testamentary writings but got them into his own possession on purpose to alter them, and put this holograph writing along with them in his repositories. It was not of great importance to their argument whether the unsigned deed was a valid testament, because it was, at least, evidence of the testator's intention when he made these pencillings, and was quite competent evidence on that point.¹ If, however, it was a valid testament, that would settle the case in their favour, and they submitted that it was so. It was exactly such a document as the truster contemplated in his second direction to his trustees in the original deed.² The words "under my hand or signed by me" evidently referred to holograph deeds unsigned or signed, and deeds not in his own hand, but signed. The heading "notes on settlement and intended alterations" was not enough to take away the character of the writing as a valid testament.¹ In the holograph document the word "meantime" meant that the truster who had admittedly lost much money deleted the legacy, reserving a power to himself to reinsert it if his investments became in the future more valuable. The evidence of the state of the codicil itself was important. The pencil lines were made through every reference in the whole deed to this legacy, and the ink bracket down the margin must have been made to emphasize the deletion.

Argued for the second parties;—Whatever was the intention of the truster, he had failed validly to cancel this legacy. It was admitted that there was no incompetency in cancelling a document in ink by pencil markings, but there was a strong presumption in favour of such cancellation being deliberative and not final. The question was, had that presumption been overcome. The evidence of the pencil marks themselves were against that view. Some of the sums, &c., were altered both in ink and pencil, which shewed that it was only when the truster had finally made up his mind on any cancellation that he used ink. As for the ink bracket, if it was put on after the pencil markings, it shewed that he was deliberating still, because it would have been equally easy to score the writing through with the ink as to make this mark on the margin; if it was put on before the pencil marks the result was the same, because then he could as easily have put an ink line through the writing, and when it was put where it was it only emphasized his deliberative intention. On the unsigned document they maintained that in form it was evidently a memorandum of instructions to his agents.³ No word was inconsistent with that view, and in one case at least "burden this also," &c., the imperative mood was used. The word "meantime" meant "I have cancelled this legacy as a deliberative act," and argued strongly against finality.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears that the testator here had made considerable sums of money in business or otherwise, and he settled his affairs by the trust-deed of October 1874. It would appear from what follows that after that date his property increased in value, for in 1878 he made a separate holograph codicil by which he increased, to a considerable extent, the number and value of the legacies which he had left by the trust-deed. These two writings remained in the hands of his agents till 1884, but we have it stated that in April of that year he called on his agents and stated to them, that having lost considerable sums, about £30,000, through bad investments, he had resolved to make some alterations on his codicil, which he wished to get possession of for that purpose. He accordingly was given the codicil of 1878-79. In July following he again called, and referring again to his losses, he asked to have his trust-deed too. No. 117. After taking possession of these deeds, it appears that he went to Harrogate for his health, and from that time all we hear about him is that he died there on 9th October 1884. It is undoubted that between the time he received back these deeds and his death he had made great alterations on them by cancelling and altering various legacies and sums left by them. What is the effect to be given to these alterations is the question now before us, in so far, however, only as regards one legacy of £10,000 to the Magistrates of Glasgow.

Mar. 10, 1887.
Lamont v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

The alterations made upon the words of this bequest are made in pencil, and I agree that there is a fair presumption when a testator takes his holograph deed written in ink and makes pencil alterations on it, that that was done with a view to future consideration whether the alteration should subsequently be made final or not; in other words, that the alterations are merely deliberative in character. Unless there is something to take off from that presumption I think it would be pretty conclusive of the question, but we are here not left with these deeds alone, for we have two other holograph writings, both of which are in pencil, and undated and unsigned. The first is headed "Notes as to settlement and alterations." The second contains a list of the various legacies to charitable institutions which he intended to bequeath. Both of these papers are, I think, of the greatest importance.

As regards the first, there may be a question whether it is not in itself a valid testamentary writing. The trust-deed directs the trustees to give effect to any directions contained in any codicil or "separate writing under my hand, or signed by me, from which my trustees may be satisfied as to my wishes and intentions, notwithstanding the same may be defective in the solemnities required by law." That is a clause which, so far as I know, has not occurred before in any case before the Court, and it has been well contended that though this pencil document is unsigned it is a valid testament by reason of the clause I have just read, for it is in one sense, being holograph, "a writing under my hand." On the other hand, it has been maintained that it is a mere paper of instructions, drawn up with a view to the preparation of a new settlement, or a memorandum for the testator's own use in giving instructions to his agents, and that the meaning of the clause in the trust-deed is that the trustees are to give effect to any document, whether holograph or not, which was signed by the testator. It is not, I think, necessary to decide that question, and, therefore, I give no opinion upon it. Much may be said on both sides, but it is enough for the present purpose to hold that this document is a proper expression of the testator's understanding with regard to something he had already done, and looking at it in that view, it enables us to consider whether the alterations in question were intended to be permanent and final.

The expression in the holograph paper is,—“As regards my oldest son, his share is to be retained in trust, and only the interest paid him. In the event of his decease, his share is to be divided amongst his children when the youngest comes of age, should he have any. If there is none, then his share will go to my other sons, with the exception of £10,000 which I had arranged to leave to the Magistrates of Glasgow for benevolent purposes, as stated in the manuscript which I handed you, but have now meantime cancelled, owing to losses on investments.” What would be the ultimate effect of that clause if the paper were considered a valid testament is of no consequence. The clause with reference to the decease of the son gives rise to a different question, but what we have to consider is, what is the effect of the statement as to the cancellation. The testator distinctly affirms that he has meantime cancelled the legacy of £10,000, but he has taken only one way of doing so, viz., by the pencil lines drawn through that part of the codicil, and therefore I construe this clause as meaning that the testator intended to cancel and had cancelled that legacy.

The other holograph writing is also important. It seems to have been made about the same time as the writing I have been considering, and is a list of legacies proceeding in conformity with the alteration he had made in his codicil, particularly it omits all mention of the legacy of £10,000.

Taking all these things together, I have come to the conclusion, without much difficulty, that the testator by drawing the pencil lines through the part of his codicil did intend to cancel that legacy, and has recorded in his own handwriting his intention to do so. I think, therefore, we should answer the question in the negative.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. If cancellation by means of pencil marks depended on the fact alone that such lines had been drawn I should have had great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the cancellation had been effected, but we are by the terms of the trust-deed entitled to look at any other documents "under my hand or signed by me from which my trustees may be satisfied as to wishes and intentions." Now, under that clause I think we are entitled to look at the document which refers to the cancellation of the legacy of £10,000, and that without deciding whether it is a valid testament or not. When we look at it we find that the testator distinctly states that he has in the meantime cancelled that legacy. Now, looking at the pencil lines on the codicil in the light of that document, I think there is enough to make it necessary for us to hold that the legacy in question has been cancelled and is not now due.

LORD SHAND.—The parties are agreed in argument that the codicil of 1878-79 is a testamentary writing, and the sole question for us to consider is whether that admittedly testamentary writing is to have effect as it was originally written, or whether the deletion of the £10,000 legacy to the Magistrates of Glasgow is effectual and final, and so is no longer a part of the codicil. In considering that question we are entitled to take all the evidence we can get to enable us to say whether the deletions were deliberative or final. The Court may hereafter have a question before them rising out of the words "under my hand or signed by me" in the trust-deed, as to whether the unsigned holograph deed is a valid testament, but that question has no direct bearing here. We have wider means of getting at the truth, because we may consider parole evidence or anything written by the testator which helps us to a conclusion. Looking at the question so, we have the history of these documents given us by the parties. If with that history we had nothing but the codicil with the pencil alterations on it I should have had great difficulty in holding that the deletions had had the effect of destroying the legacy, but we have in writing a statement in the handwriting of the testator which shews that his intention was that these alterations should be not deliberative but final. Whether that writing is valid as a testament or not I do not consider, and desire to reserve my opinion on the point. There is a great deal to be said for the view that it is, but I take it for the purposes of this case as nothing higher than a mere record of a purpose to alter his settlement. Taking it so, it is the best evidence possible as to the truster's purpose. The important words are "have now meantime cancelled." These words must refer to some prior act of cancellation. No. 117.

 Mar. 10, 1887.
 Lamont v.
 Magistrates of Glasgow.
 If the truster had only regarded this as a note of instructions to his agents the expression would naturally be, "which I intend or propose to cancel," in short, some expression of intention to do something in the future, but the words in the deed, being in the past tense, mark that the alterations are final. I am therefore clearly of opinion that there is evidence that these alterations were intended to be and are final.

The only point which occasions any difficulty is the words "burden this also with" the keeping of his monument in repair. This looks like a direction or mandate to his agents to do something, but that is followed by the words,— "The £1000 or £500 to Merchants' House to be burdened with keeping my monument" in repair, which words are quite consistent with the testator himself doing the act set forth, and I do not think the mere circumstance of that one direction occurring can take away the clear effect of the words stating that the testator had "now meantime cancelled" the legacy of £10,000. On these grounds I concur.

LORD ADAM.—The question here is whether the pencil marks through the bequest of £10,000 to the Magistrates of Glasgow are effectual to cancel it.
 Had the lines been in ink it is undoubted that they would have been sufficient to do so, but being in pencil this question has arisen. If there were nothing before us but the deed with the pencil markings on it I should have been of opinion that the markings were not effectual, for I concur in the law as read to us from Williams on Executors, that where ink is scored out with pencil, and there is nothing to explain the markings, the result is that the markings are looked on as merely deliberative. But it is admitted that we are entitled to look at any evidence we can find, parole or otherwise, to ascertain what the intention of the testator in making the scorings really was. Here the evidence which is most material is the document headed "Notes on settlement and alterations," and I agree with Lord Shand in looking at that document as evidence merely and without regard to the question whether it derives any testamentary effect from the terms of the original trust-deed. Now, that document contains expressions referring back to the codicil of 1878-79, explaining the pencil marks on it, and the writer's intention in making them. He says that he had intended to leave £10,000 to the Magistrates of Glasgow, "as stated in the manuscript which I handed you, but have now meantime cancelled, owing to losses on investments." These words, I think, will bear no other meaning than a statement of a fact that before the document was written he had cancelled the bequest for the "meantime." That word means that in the future, if his investments turned out better than he expected, he might restore it to his settlement.
 Looking at that document, I can come to no other conclusion than that the testator by these pencil markings meant to cancel the bequest. If the pencil markings were not on the codicil, and the case simply rested on the words "have meantime cancelled," a different question would have been raised, but on the only question before us I have no difficulty in concurring.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

Limited v.

(Reclaimers).—M'Kechnie—Shaw.Et e contra.Error—Contract—Records—Plan—Partial reduction of a feu-contract.

By a feu-contract the granter became bound to form certain roads on the ground disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on a plan appended to the contract. On the plan appended a number of other roads were by mistake also tinged brown. The feu-contract, with the erroneously coloured plan, was duly recorded. None of the parties to the contract observed the blunder at the time of signing, and it was not discovered until some years afterwards, when the ground had been sold by the original vassals to a building company. The company then raised an action against the superior for payment of the cost of forming the roads erroneously tinged brown on the plan, and the superior brought an action against the company for reduction of the feu-contract, in so far as it imported an obligation on him to form these roads. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that as the original feu-contract was not intended to impose an obligation to make the roads in question on the superior, and as the company in contracting with the vassals did not stipulate for and did not understand that they were getting such an obligation, the mere fact that such an obligation erroneously appeared in the feu-contract and in the record did not entitle the company, though bona fide purchasers for value, to object to the Court rectifying the feu-contract and the records.

Observed (per Lord Young) that one purchasing on the faith of the records is not entitled to rely on the validity or subsistence of such incidental obligations as an obligation to make roads although appearing on the records undischarged.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
I.

THESE were two actions, which were conjoined. The first, which was raised on 24th February 1885, was brought by the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, against the trustees of the late William Watson, of Overlee, near Glasgow, and concluded for payment of £334, 10s. 7d., as the expense the company had been put to in making certain roads on part of the estate of Overlee feued by Watson to their authors, which roads Watson had, the company alleged, come under an obligation in the feu-contract to make.

The second action, which was raised on 12th June 1885, was raised by Watson's trustees against the Feuing Company, and also against certain feuars from them, Messrs Whyte, Binnie, Neilson, and Livingstone, after mentioned, being also called for their interest. It concluded for reduction of the feu-contract, in so far as it imported an obligation on Watson to form the roads in question, for declarator that the feu-contract was and had from the beginning been null and void, in so far as it imported such an obligation on Watson, and that he never had been and the pursuers were not bound under the feu-contract to form, or pay the expense of forming, the said roads; and for warrant to the pursuers to record the decrees to be pronounced thereon in the Register of Sasines for publication, or for publication and preservation.

The following narrative from the Lord Ordinary's opinion explains the circumstances out of which the actions arose:—"William Watson, now deceased, who is represented by his trustees, was proprietor of the lands of Overlee, near Glasgow, which he agreed to feu to Whyte & Binnie, merchants in Glasgow. Missive letters of feu were entered into between the parties, dated 24th January 1877. The first letter was written by Watson, who thereby offered the lands in feu to Whyte & Binnie in two lots, the first being a piece of ground extending to 3 acres 2 roods and 25 poles, as delineated on the feuing plan of the lands, at the annual feu-duty of £16 sterling per acre. In reference to this feu of 3 acres, Watson came under the following obligation:—‘I bind myself to make the roads free of charge to you, except the sewers, drains, curbstones, and gutters, which you shall pay me for. I bind myself to make the roads firmly bottomed, and well set and covered with ashes.’ No dispute has arisen in reference to this obligation, which Watson duly implemented.

“But Watson also by the same letter offered to feu the remainder of the ground of Overlee, extending to 14 acres 1 rood and 30 poles, at a feu-duty of £20 sterling per acre. In reference to this second lot the following was the stipulation:—‘You (that is, Whyte & Binnie) shall be bound to put in roads at your own expense, of the same description as I bind myself to do to you, as above mentioned.’ A dispute has arisen with reference to the implementing of the stipulation as to the roads,—there being, however, no dispute whatever as to this, that Whyte & Binnie were to make the roads upon this 14 acre lot.

“The offer of Watson was duly accepted on the same date by Whyte & Binnie. The bargain so completed was put into formal shape by the execution of a feu-contract entered into between Watson on the one hand, and Whyte & Binnie, and two other persons of the name of William Neilson and Hugh Livingstone, on the other hand, both of whom were taken into the feuing speculation by Whyte & Binnie. This feu-contract conveyed over to these four persons, first, the 3 acres 2 roods and 28 poles which are said to be ‘delineated and tinged red on a plan thereof indorsed hereon, and subscribed as relative hereto,’ and secondly, the remainder of Overlee, containing 14 acres 1 rood and 30 $\frac{1}{2}$ poles, which also is described as ‘delineated and tinged blue on the foressaid plan, indorsed hereon and subscribed as relative hereto.’ All this is distinct enough, and a reference to the plan No. 11 of process shews the two lots of ground very plainly. This plan, No. 11 of process, was prepared by William Kirkwood, surveyor at Pollockshaws, and shews roads only at one point, viz., upon the 3 acre lot, in the shape of the letter T. If the reference in the feu-contract had been to the plan No. 11, there never would have been any dispute between the parties as to what were the roads which Watson, the superior, was to make, and what were the roads which the feuars from him were to take upon their own shoulders. But the reference in the feu-contract is not to No. 11, but to the plan appended to that contract, which was intended to be simply a copy of No. 11. The feu-contract contains this special stipulation in regard to the formation of the roads, ‘declaring that the first party (Watson) shall, in so far as not already done, form the roads (including the laying of the sewer-pipes, drain-pipes, cesspools, gutters, and kerbstones, but which pipes, gutters, and kerbstones are to be furnished by the second parties) intersecting the pieces of ground above disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on said plan.’ Now, on referring to the plan appended to the contract, of which No. 182 is a copy, it will be seen that the roads there laid down are carried, not merely through the 3 acre lot, but also through the 14 acre lot, and they are all tinged brown. Thus, while the original missives only bound Watson to make the roads delineated on the plan No. 11 in the 3 acre lot alone, he is by the contract, with reference to the plan appended, under obligation to make the roads throughout the whole 17 acres.

“This was a clear error; and Watson’s trustees now seek to set aside the feu-contract, ‘in so far as the same declares that the said William Watson shall form, or imports an obligation on him or his heirs or successors to form, any roads (including the laying of the pipes, sewer-pipes, drain-pipes, cesspools, gutters, and kerbstones) on the said portion of ground containing 14 acres 1 rood 30 poles and $\frac{1}{6}$ parts of a pole or thereby imperial measure, disposed in the second place by the said feu-contract.' And there is further a conclusion for declarator, that no such obligation was incumbent upon Watson or his representatives.

"By an agreement between Watson and Whyte & Binnie, instead of making the roads upon the 3 acre lot in the form of the letter T,—that is to say, a road running from the East Kilbride road direct up through the 3 acre lot to a certain distance and then having two cross-roads on each side, it was agreed that Watson should not make cross-roads, but should carry the road direct through the whole of the 3 acres and 20 yards beyond them, into the 14 acre ground. Nothing turns upon this alteration of the original lie of the roads; the new road was nearly of the same length as the T-shaped roads laid down on the plan No. 11. The new road was substituted for the one originally intended.

"The mode in which the error was fallen into is very clearly traced. Whyte & Binnie, and their two associates Neilson and Livingstone, had entered into the feuing speculation in the year 1877, when there was a good deal of building speculation going on in Glasgow; and the first thing of course that they set about doing was to obtain a feuing plan exhibiting the laying out of the ground for feuing. This was prepared for them by Messrs Kyle, Dennison, & Frew, surveyors, Glasgow; and No. 185 is a lithographed copy of it. These gentlemen were not the persons who made the survey on behalf of Watson; but their services were taken by Watson in regard to the description of the subjects to be inserted in the feu-contract, and in regard to making a copy of the plan to be appended to that deed. Messrs J. & J. Boyd, the agents for Watson, wrote to these surveyors on 22d October 1877,—'We send the draft feu-contract herewith, and will thank you to check the descriptions and contents of ground. We shall afterwards instruct you to indorse the plan on the extended deed. Of course you will charge our client with such a proportion of the expense of the survey as you think fair.' It appears from the diaries kept by Kyle, Dennison, & Frew that they had got verbal instructions—and, as explained by Mr Dennison, these instructions came from Mr Boyd—to indorse the plan upon the feu-contract. On the 17th of October 1879 there is an entry to the effect, 'Indorse plan on feu-contract between Wm. Watson and David Whyte and others, J. & J. Boyd. See former plan and lithograph plan left, also letter by Mr Watson, 26th September 1879, describing line bounding the ground for small houses.' On November 19th, there is another entry in these terms,—'Delineate on reduced plan, endorsed on deed, all the roads as shewn on lithograph plan of Overlee for J. & J. Boyd.' Now this lithographed plan (No. 185 of process), shews the whole roads intended to be made by the feuars through the whole seventeen acres; and on the same 19th of November, Kyle, Dennison, & Frew's time-books have an entry to this effect,—'Delineating and colouring on plan, which was endorsed on deed on 20th October last, all the proposed roads shewn upon the feuing-plan of Overlee Ground.' The surveyors knew nothing of the terms of the missives which had been entered into between Watson and Whyte & Binnie, which limited the former's obligation to make the roads to the three acre lot; and having got instructions to delineate and colour all the roads and ground, they, or their clerks who did the manual work, naturally conceived that it was their duty to colour the whole road contemplated to be made by Whyte and his associates.

"The feu-contract and the plan appended—[the roads being then un-coloured]—were signed on the 15th and 17th of November 1879; but in consequence of an agreement come to among themselves by the feuars, it was necessary to rewrite the last two pages, so as to give effect to the agreement, which had reference to the excluding any person from becoming assignee to the share of any one of the speculators without the consent of the others. A new stamped sheet was accordingly got, the two last pages were rewritten, and the contract as ultimately executed and delivered was dated 31st December 1879, and 5th and 7th January 1880—[and was recorded 30th January]. None of the persons who were present at the execution of the feu-contract took the trouble of looking at the plan—[which had by that time been returned from Messrs Kyle, Dennison, & Frew, with the roads coloured]—when they ultimately signed the deed. It was at the end of the deed; but between it and the two pages which were signed there was an inventory of writs; and so the error which had been committed in tinging brown the whole roads upon the property was not then discovered.

Limited v.
Watson's
Trustees.

"It was not discovered till March 1883. This was done by Mr Crawford, the agent for the defenders, the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, who had come into the place of Whyte, Binnie, Neilson, and Livingstone; and he having communicated this to the directors of the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, he was instructed to call upon Watson to make all the roads through the whole seventeen acres. This he did by letter to Watson's agents, dated 8th March 1883.

"It is necessary now to state how the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company came into the affair. The original feuars, Whyte and his other three associates, soon became desirous apparently to get rid of the speculation in which they had embarked, and for this purpose a limited liability feuing company—[registered on 26th December 1879]—was started. Accordingly a minute of agreement was entered into between Whyte and his three partners, on the one hand, and the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company on the other hand, dated 17th, 18th, and 19th March 1880, whereby the Feuing Company agreed to purchase from Whyte and the others the whole lands contained in the feu-contract.* The disposition following upon this minute of agreement was not executed till 24th November and 2d December 1880. By this disposition Whyte and the others convey over to the Glasgow Feuing Company the two lots of ground, 'with our whole right, title, and interest, present and future, therein, and with the whole pertinents thereof, but always with the liberties and privileges, and under the real liens, burdens, conditions, restrictions, limitations, provisions, obligations, and others specified or referred to in the said feu-contract.' Then followed the specification of a number of agreements by Whyte, &c., to feu parts of the fourteen acre lot, which agreements, inter alia, took the feuars bound to make roads, for the making of which the Company in the present action contended that Watson's trustees were liable.

tion was the payment of the sum of £2378, 6s.; and there was excepted from the conveyance such parts of the lands as had been sold to other persons, by contracts of ground-annual, before the purchase made by the Feuing Company. The term of entry was at Whitsunday 1879." Whyte signed the memorandum of association of the Company, and was one of its directors from its formation until 1882.

In the action of reduction the pursuers, after giving a history of the feu-contract and the previous negotiations, averred—(Cond. 8) "The mistake which had been made as aforesaid in endorsing the wrong plan upon the engrossed feu-contract was not discovered prior to the execution and delivery of the said deed. It was the understanding and intention of both parties to the contract, at and prior to the execution of the deed, that Mr Watson should only be bound to form the roads within the dotted lines on the said plan prepared by Mr Kirkwood, and in particular, that he should not be bound to form any roads, &c., on the said piece of ground containing 14 acres 1 rood and 30 poles, and five-tenth parts of a pole, and that no roads on the said piece of ground should be delineated and tinged brown on the plan. The said feu-contract and plan endorsed thereon were signed by Mr Watson and the other parties thereto under essential error as to their import and effect in relation to the roads, &c., which the superior was bound to form. Both of the parties to the contract believed that the only roads delineated and tinged brown on the said plan were the roads marked on Mr Kirkwood's plan, and situated upon the said piece of ground containing 3 acres 2 roods and 28 poles or thereby, and that no roads upon the said piece of ground containing 14 acres 1 rood and 30 poles and five-tenth parts of a pole were delineated and tinged brown on the said plan, while in fact all the roads on the said plan over the whole ground feued were delineated and tinged brown. Mr Watson being, by the terms of the said feu-contract, taken bound to form, in so far as not already done, the roads, &c., intersecting the pieces of ground disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on the plan endorsed, it was thus made to appear, erroneously and contrary to the understanding and intention of both parties to the contract, that Mr Watson was bound to form all the roads on the whole ground feued. Mr Watson would not have signed the feu-contract and plan if he had known their true import and effect in reference to the roads, &c., to be formed by him." (Cond. 9) "The defenders, the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, were incorporated by registration under the Companies Acts on 26th December 1879. Prior to that date the said David Whyte, who for some time had been endeavouring to get a limited company formed to purchase the whole of the said ground from himself and his co-feuars, and to sell it off in building lots, had adjusted on all essential points with the promoters of the Company the terms on which the Company should acquire the ground, these terms being based on the express footing that the superior was not bound to form any additional roads to those shewn on Mr Kirkwood's plan, and situated on the smaller of the said two pieces of ground. . . . The said Feuing Company, at and before the date of their acquiring the said ground from Mr Whyte and his co-feuars, had been informed by Mr Whyte and his co-feuars and others, and well knew that Mr Watson was not bound to form any greater extent of roads than were delineated on Mr Kirkwood's plan, and in particular that he was under no obligation to form roads on any part of the ground feued other than the 3 acres 2 roods and 28 poles or thereby first disposed in the feu-contract, and they acquired the said subjects on that footing, and not in reliance on the existence of any pretended obligation on Mr Watson to

Mr Watson was only bound to form roads on the said 3 acres 2 roods and 28 poles, and that the said essential error in tinging the roads on the 14 acres 1 rood and 30 and five-tenth poles brown on said plan had been committed."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The feu-contract—including the plan endorsed thereon—having been signed by the parties thereto under essential error as to its import and effect, in so far as it purported to impose on the superior an obligation to form roads, &c., on the piece of ground containing 14 acres 1 rood and 30 and five-tenth poles, it was and is null and void quoad such pretended obligation. (2) The feu-contract having been entered into under the common essential error specified, it ought to be reduced or declared null to the effect concluded for. (3) The defenders respectively having acquired their subjects in the knowledge of the essential error referred to, they are not entitled to enforce or to maintain the validity of the pretended obligation in question. (4) Decree ought to be granted as concluded for, in respect that it would be a fraud on the part of the defenders to enforce the said pretended obligation according to its terms.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers' averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor with expenses. (5) The action, so far as it concludes for partial reduction, being incompetent, the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the foregoing extract from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, and from the rest of the opinion infra.

On 16th June 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"1st, In the action of reduction, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns; and 2d, In the petitory action, appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure, and reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative above quoted]—The question now comes to be, whether redress can be obtained by Watson's representatives against the consequences of the error into which parties fell. The property is now in the hands of an onerous third party, and whatever might have been the pursuers' remedy, had the question been raised as between them and Whyte & Binnie, it is contended that the Feuing Company were entitled to rely upon the records, as indicating the extent of the property they were buying, and the obligations which the superior undertook. It was averred by the pursuers that the directors of the Feuing Company were aware of the error that had been committed before they made their purchase, and if this had been the case, then, according to several decisions, they could not be allowed to retain the property under such circumstances (Lang v. Dixon, 29th June 1813, F.C.; Marshall v. Hynd, 18th January 1828, 6 S. 384; Magistrates of Airdrie v. Smith, &c., 13th July 1850, 12 D. 1222;

No. 118. On 7th July following the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following final interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the conjoined actions, and having further heard counsel in the petitory action, Finds that the whole sum expended by the pursuers, the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, in making roads (exclusive of the expense of kerbstones, sewer pipes, drain pipes, gutters, &c.), is £112, 19s.: Decerns against the defenders Watson's trustees therefor, reserving to the pursuers the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, all claim for any further advances which they may make, or be called upon to make, in the formation of roads: Finds neither party entitled to expenses in the separate actions and in the conjoined actions, and decerns."*

Morrison v. Somerville and Others, 21st December 1860, 23 D. 232; Petrie v. Forsyth, 16th December 1874, 2 Ret. 214; Stodart v. Dalzell, 16th December 1876, 4 Ret. 236). Amongst other matters, a proof was allowed of these averments, with the result that the averments were completely disproved. The persons who were said to have had this knowledge were examined as witnesses, and denied it, with the exception of Whyte, who had become a partner of, and had been a director up to 1882 of the Feuing Company. Whyte further states that Gibson, the secretary of the Feuing Company, and the agent of the Company were aware of the error. Now Gibson was examined, and flatly denied this. Mr Crawford, the present agent of the Feuing Company, also deposed that he had no knowledge of the fact till March 1883; and the Lord Ordinary is constrained to believe these two witnesses rather than Whyte upon this point. The whole correspondence and actings of the parties shew that it was a new discovery in March 1883.

"There thus being no knowledge on the part of the Feuing Company, they are entitled to maintain the position that, as onerous third parties, they had a right to rely upon everything which the record disclosed. If there was an error, they are not to be made the sufferers. The consequences of that error must fall upon the person who committed it (Mansfield (Stuart's Trs.) v. Walker's Trustees, 28th June 1833, 11 S. 813; affd. 10th April 1835, 1 S. & M.L. 203). It is said, however, that the Feuing Company, in point of fact, knew nothing about the obligation as to roads contained in the feu-contract before they made their purchase, seeing that neither the directors nor their agent saw the feu-contract until after the minute of agreement between Whyte & Binnie, Neilson & Livingstone, and the Feuing Company, had been entered into, and the Lord Ordinary holds this to be proved in point of fact. But he is constrained also to hold it to be irrelevant. It is no answer to an onerous third party buying heritable property to say that he had not gone to the records and there read the title of the intending seller to him. If he makes a purchase, the law says that he shall obtain right to all that the record discloses, if conveyed over to him. The case of Stewart's Trustees v. Hart (2d December 1875, 3 Ret. 192) shews how this case would have been dealt with by the Court if the question had arisen between the original contracting parties. When an onerous third party, however, appears upon the scene, different principles must be applied, and a different conclusion arrived at.

"The Lord Ordinary has dealt simply with the action of reduction. In the petitory action he has not pronounced any judgment, because he cannot find in the proof which has been led sufficient satisfactory materials for disposing of the claim made by the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company. Perhaps these parties may be able to shew the Lord Ordinary that there are such materials, about which, however, little or nothing was said at the debate. The attention of parties was very naturally directed to the main question raised by the action of reduction, and the pecuniary demand of the pursuers in the petitory action received but scant notice."

* "OPINION.—The Lord Ordinary does not see his way to decern for payment of any sums of money in favour of the pursuers, other than what they have themselves actually expended in making roads, and the sum decerned for is the sum proved by their secretary.

Watson's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—This was not a case of buying on the faith of the records; the Company bought on the faith of the missives alone, the plan appended to which (No. 11 of process) correctly shewed the true obligation of the parties to the original contract. The Company therefore were not entitled to appeal to the records as the measure of what they got under their contract. Even if they were, an obligation to make roads was merely a personal obligation, the validity of which was not strengthened by its being part of a recorded deed.¹ But to entitle them to appeal to the records the Company must be onerous bona fide third parties, which in fact they were not. They were identical with Whyte and the other original feuars; they were therefore liable to implement all the obligations undertaken by Watson. The evidence shewed that they became owners of the property on the footing of adopting the actings of the original feuars prior to the date of the feu-contract in which the mistake occurred. Further, they had sufficient knowledge of the true contract between Watson and the original feuars, even if they did not know of the way in which the plan had been coloured until 1883. Whyte, whether he knew that latter fact earlier or not, certainly knew the true contract, and he was to be taken as agent for the Company as well as for himself and his co-feuars, and so he infected the Company with his knowledge. Further, the Company must be held to know the contents of the contract to feu which Whyte and his co-feuars had entered into, and these took the vassals bound to make the roads which the Company here said Watson undertook to make. Lastly, if the deed was to be held as delivered on 19th November 1879, at which date there was no wrong colouring on the plan, then the subsequent mistake, with which Watson had nothing to do, could not affect him; if, on the other hand, it was to be taken as delivered on 7th January, then his signature had been appended under essential error of a character which entitled him to have the remedy here sought.² His signature to the plan was not to the plan as coloured.

Argued for the Company;—This was an action for the partial reduction of a deed, but in all cases of mutual error, or of error in which the defender was innocent, he was entitled to have the alternative of having the contract rescinded in toto.³ Even if the Company were to be taken as parties to the original contract, they had had nothing to do with the blunder, which was entirely that of Watson's agent. The Company neither actually nor constructively knew either of the blunder in the plan, or of the true contract between the parties. Whyte, whatever he knew, was not their agent, and the formal disposition by Whyte, &c., to the Company was what was to be looked at, not the minute of agreement which preceded it.⁴ The pursuers averred on record that the Company had purchased knowing of the blunder in the plan. That they did not now appear to press, for they maintained the inconsistent view of the facts that the Company in purchasing knew nothing about the record, and so had

This was not a case of essential error on the part of Watson. He, no doubt, did not, as matter of fact, know of the blunder in the plan, but that was not enough; to entitle him to a remedy, he must not have the means of knowledge.¹ Here he had.

Limited v.
Watson's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The facts of the case are so fully and accurately stated by the Lord Ordinary that I shall abstain from any recapitulation. I agree with his Lordship in the conclusions in fact which he reaches upon the evidence, parole and documentary. These are in substance, 1st, that there is “a clear error” in the feu-contract called for in the reduction, in so far as it imports an obligation on Mr Watson to construct roads on the fourteen acre lot of ground, he having in fact contracted to form roads only on the three acre lot; and 2d, that the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company acquired the property in ignorance of the fact that the feu-contract expressed or imputed any obligation on Watson as to roads, which they only became aware of a considerable time after their acquisition of the property and the completion of their title.

By the defence to the petitory action at the instance of the Feuing Company, and by the relative reduction at the instance of Watson's trustees, we are asked to rectify this “clear error” in the feu-contract.

It is proved, and indeed admitted, that Watson's obligation to form the roads on the three acre lot was duly implemented. I refer to the Lord Ordinary's exhaustive and accurate narrative for all details, only noticing that the mistake sought to be rectified consists in a blunder on the part of the colourist of the contract plan, he having “tinged brown” not only the roads on the three acre lot but also those on the fourteen acre lot, and thereby made the words of the contract (which refer to the roads “tinged brown” on the plan) express Watson's obligation about fourfold in excess of the true contract of the parties.

The mistake is thus of the nature of a clerical error, and indeed a plan colourist's error in “tinging” a road is perhaps of even a more mechanical character. It is not the case of both or either of two parties contracting under the influence of error, for here the parties were under none. It is the case of the instrument which was intended to express their contract, as to which they were quite agreed, failing through the blunder which I have mentioned to express it accurately. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that on satisfactory evidence of such a mistake this Court would not hesitate, as between the original parties, to rectify it. Neither of them would be permitted to take advantage of such a mistake either by cancelling the contract altogether should he have repented of it, or by taking an unconscionable benefit to the prejudice of the other.

In all that I have said I agree with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

But the question is not between the original parties, for the property (the subject of the feu-contract) was purchased in 1880 by the Glasgow Feuing Company, who, accordingly, are the parties now resisting a rectification of the mistake. I think they must be regarded as bona fide purchasers for value, and I attach no importance to the argument that the original feuars (Whyte and his three associates) were truly pioneers of the Company, their intention from the first being to promote and form such a company, as they in fact eventually did, so that (for so ran the argument) they ought to be regarded as agents in advance for the Company before its creation. But, rejecting this argument, and admitting that a bona fide purchaser for value may have, and as a rule has, as strong an equity to resist the correction of a mistake as the party against whom it operates has to demand the correction, and that when the equities of opposing parties are equal the Court will decline to interfere, I am nevertheless of opinion that on the facts of this case there are grounds, worthy at least of careful consideration, for the pursuers' demand, even in a question with a bona fide purchaser for value, to correct the mistake immediately in question.

No. 118.

Limited v.
Watson's

And here I would ask leave to explain some expressions which I have used, and may continue to use. With us "equity" is part of the common law, accompanying and qualifying the administration of it by appeals to just and equitable considerations in every department of it. So also the equitable jurisdiction of this Court is simply part and portion of its common law jurisdiction, and not distinguished by a special name. The terms "equity" and "equitable" are nevertheless convenient and useful in our practice, as common words of the language without technical meaning. The equitable rules and considerations, or, in one word, the "equity" which is part of our common law, is none the less real and valuable, perhaps the more real and valuable, than with us "equity" has never degenerated into a technical system. When, therefore, I speak of "equity" on the one side or the other, or of "equal equities," I desire not to be understood as expressing any technicalities, but merely as referring more briefly and pointedly to considerations of equity and justice (in the ordinary meaning of the words) which the common law requires us to recognise and take account of in given circumstances.

Now, assuming that Watson's trustees have a clear equity to have this mistake to their prejudice rectified, what is the countervailing equity of the Glasgow Feuing Company to resist the rectification and claim the benefit of the mistake? I have already observed that if equal injustice, or injustice of the same character, will be done to them by correcting the mistake, as Watson's trustees will suffer if it is left in operation, we cannot interfere.

The Lord Ordinary, in expressing his own opinion, puts the case for the Feuing Company as clearly and forcibly as it can be put. His Lordship says that "as onerous third parties they had a right to rely on everything which the record disclosed," meaning, of course, that the error is in the feu-contract which is recorded in the Register of Sasines. I rather think that this consideration of the faith due to the "records" (meaning, of course, simply the Register of Sasines) is the ground of his judgment. For his Lordship says that he "holds it to be proved in point of fact" that "the Feuing Company knew nothing about the obligation as to roads contained in the feu-contract before they made their purchase, seeing that neither the directors nor their agent saw the feu-contract until after the minute of agreement between Whyte & Binnie, Neilson & Livingstone, and the Feuing Company had been entered into." It is clearly proved that neither the agent nor the directors of the Company saw the feu-contract, or, prior to the summer of 1882, had any idea that Watson was under any obligation as to roads. It is equally clearly proved that Messrs Whyte & Binnie, Neilson & Livingstone, from whom they purchased, did not intend to sell to them or transfer to them as an accessory of their purchase any obligation as to roads. It is, in short, proved that the sellers to the Feuing Company did not intend to sell, and that the Feuing Company did not intend to buy any such obligation. So that if in the result such obligation shall be held to have been bought and sold it will be contrary to the meaning and intention of both the parties to the contract of sale just as certainly as the original constitution of it by the blundered tinging of the roads on the contract plan was contrary to the meaning and intention of the parties to the original feu-contract. The fact is indisputable that the blunder was not discovered for upwards of two years after the purchase by the Feuing Company, when it came as a surprise to all interested in the matter.

But the Lord Ordinary, while holding this "to be proved in point of fact," feels "constrained also to hold it to be irrelevant," because when an onerous third party buys "heritable property," "the law says that he shall obtain right to all that the record discloses if conveyed over to him." His Lordship's judgment is thus, as I have already observed, put upon the sanctity of the records as, in his opinion, sufficient, at least under such circumstances as occur here, to entitle a party interested to uphold a mistake in a recorded instrument to resist any equity in the sufferer therefrom to have it rectified.

I am unable to concur in this opinion, although admitting that the fact of an instrument being recorded may be a very material circumstance in the question whether the party resisting the rectification of a proved mistake in it has not a strong equity on his side, or, in more popular language, whether a real and substantial injustice would not be done to him by the rectification. I should desire, so far as possible, to confine my observations and the expression of my opinion within the exigencies of the case before us, and with that view I have to point out that the mistake immediately in question occurs in the expression of an immediately prestable obligation to form certain roads, delineated and tinged brown on a plan. The expression of the obligation occurs in a deed of conveyance, but it does not regard the title to the property thereby conveyed, and would have been as valid if expressed in a separate writing even of a character so informal as a memorandum or a letter. Nor is the legal character of the obligation affected by the circumstance of its occurring in a deed of conveyance which enters the record. A seller's disposition of a house might contain an obligation on the seller to put it in good repair, and to paint and paper it before the buyer's entry, which would of course be recorded with the rest of the deed. I should have thought the circumstance immaterial for any purpose. The Register of Sasines is designed to preserve a continuous record of the titles to feudal estate and the burdens on it, and not of such mere incidental obligations as I am now referring to. If the debtor in such an obligation made the road, repaired or painted or papered the house, or paid the expense of the disposition to the buyer, I do not imagine that he would think it necessary to take steps for clearing the record of it, by recording a discharge or otherwise. But the obligation itself would continue to stand on the record, and without anything on the record to shew that it had been discharged on implement or otherwise. Every such obligation, even the most considerable of the class,—an obligation to form a road or to supply the labour, the other party furnishing the materials,—really results in an obligation for money, and would cease at once on payment of a sum satisfactory to the creditor. But would the receipt for the money have to enter the records? Take as an illustration the petitory action now before us, in which the Lord Ordinary has given decree for £112.

Must this decree and a discharge of it be recorded in the Register of Sasines? or, No. 118.
if not, will an onerous purchaser from the feuing company be entitled to say Mar. 11, 1887.
that the record discloses the obligation and discloses no discharge, and that the Glasgow obligation must be made good to him? Feuing and Building Co.
Limited v.
Watson's
Trustees.

Now, I venture to think that these observations, if sound in themselves, do bear on the question before us, for they go to this, that a purchaser does not look to the record alone with reference to obligations of the nature and character of that in which the mistake now sought to be rectified occurs. It is foreign to the purpose of the Register of Sasines to record the course and outcome of such obligations. I am not therefore moved by any consideration of the sanctity of the Register of Sasines in dealing with this case, and I rather think from another passage of the Lord Ordinary's note that his Lordship does not think that this sanctity could have prevailed if it had been proved that the Feuing Company had notice of the mistake before the purchase. But this is very important, for it implies that in the Lord Ordinary's opinion the records will not prevail over the considerations of justice and equity on facts proved by extraneous evidence.

And this leads me to what I shall venture to present as my most comprehensive and final view of the case, which is that the question of rectifying a satisfactorily proved mistake in a written instrument is a question of real and substantial justice and equity, and so depends on the very truth of the matter in the actual case before the Court. If through the blunder of a copying clerk or of a plan colourist (I give them only as instances) an instrument fails to express what the parties to it intended—the mistake will be rectified unless there be good reason to the contrary. The only reason to the contrary with which we have here to deal is that in the meanwhile a bona fide purchaser for value on the faith of the mistake would suffer injustice if the rectification were made. I think this would be conclusive reason to the contrary if it were true in fact. But then I am clearly of opinion that it is not true in fact. I think it is false in fact, being of opinion that it is proved that the Feuing Company (i.e. their agents and directors) had no intention or thought of acquiring what the mistake, if left unrectified, will give them, and that the discovery of the expressions in which the mistake consists, and of the advantage they might take by them (if allowed to stand) came upon them as a surprise.

LORD CRAIGHILL, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors of 16th June and 7th July 1886; in the action of reduction, reduced, decerned, and declared in terms of the conclusions of the summons; and in the petitory action assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions thereof.

geon, who is called strangely enough by the pursuer. He examined the horse in July—the accident having taken place in the previous April—and he gives it a good character. But notwithstanding his testimony I am of opinion that the horse was in such a condition that it ought not to have been used on the tramway; and further, that those in charge of it on the part of the Company must be held to have known of its condition.

The question of law then arises, Are the Tramways Company liable in damages to the pursuer for the accident, which was the natural result of the horse's condition. I think they are. The horses used by a tramway company are part of its plant, and they are bound to employ persons to see that their plant is in a safe condition, with reference not merely to the safety of the public who make use of their conveyances, but also of persons in their employment. And I think that in permitting this horse to be continued in use fault is to be imputed to those whose duty it was to look after the horses of the Company and through them to the Company.

I therefore should propose, if your Lordships agree with me, that the following interlocutor should be pronounced:—(His Lordship then read the interlocutor afterwards pronounced).

The Commissioners under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, having framed a scheme, whereby the administration of a part of the trust-funds (being the average amount annually devoted by the trustees to educational purposes) was transferred to a governing body, and the funds were devoted to the advancement of higher education in the district, the trustees submitted a case to the Court under the Act 1882, pleading, first, that the fund was not an educational endowment in the sense of the Act, and second, that the scheme was not in conformity with its provisions, as having diverted to educational purposes funds in use to be applied to other charitable purposes, and as not having had "regard to the spirit of the founder's intentions."

Held (1) that the fund was in part an educational endowment in the sense of the statute, the discretion given to the trustees not entitling them to withhold all payments from any of the three trust purposes; and (2) that the Court could not review the Commissioners in the exercise of the discretion committed to them by the statute in determining the proportion of the endowment to be applied to educational purposes in the case of a mixed endowment, or as to the proper amount of regard to be shewn to the spirit of the founder's intention.

MR JOHN FERGUSON of Cairnbrock, who died in January 1856, left a trust-disposition and settlement, with codicils, dated in 1853 and 1855, by which, inter alia, he directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate "as a permanent fund, to be called The Ferguson Bequest Fund, and to pay, apply, and appropriate the interest and other annual income, profits, and produce thereof in and towards the maintenance and promotion of religious ordinances and education and missionary operations in the first instance, in the county of Ayr, stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and counties of Wigton, Lanark, Renfrew, and Dumbarton; and thereafter, if my said trustees in Great Britain shall think fit, in any other counties in Scotland; and that by means of payments for the erection or support of churches and schools (other than and excepting parish churches and parish schools) belonging to or in connection with quoad sacra churches belonging to the Established Church of Scotland, and belonging to or in connection with the Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and the Congregational or Independent Church, all in Scotland, or any or either of them; or in supplement of funds collected for these purposes, or in supplement of the stipends or salaries of the ministers of the said quoad sacra and other four churches; and by payments of salaries or in supplement of the salaries of religious missionaries, and of teachers of schools of or in connection with the said quoad sacra churches and the said Free Church, United Presbyterian Church, Reformed Presbyterian Church, and Congregational or Independent Church; and by payments for forming and maintaining, or in aid of funds raised for forming and maintaining, libraries for the use of the general public; such missionaries, schools, and libraries being under the superintendence or management of members in full communion with one or other of the said five churches: Declaring that the application and appropriation of the trust-funds shall be entirely at the option and discretion of the quorum of my said trustees as to the proportions thereof to be applied to the said several objects."

There were also provisions for the permanent trustees being brought up to the number of thirteen, and consisting of members of the five churches in the proportions of three members of the Church of Scotland, four of the Free Church, four of the United Presbyterian, one of the Reformed Presbyterian, and one of the Congregational or Independent Church. The trustees were incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1869.

The total revenue of the trust for twenty-six years from 1858 was £399,164. Of this sum £307,244 was apportioned for religious ordinances, £37,144 for missionary operations, and £54,776 for education, £8300 of this last sum being spent in school buildings and repairs, and £42,203, or about £1623 per annum, in teachers' salaries.

The relative proportions applied in the case of the different churches to education and the other purposes varied very much. About 15·4 per cent of the grant that went to congregations of the Church of Scotland was spent in education, while only 2 per cent of the grant to the Congregational Church was so applied. After the passing of the Education Act in 1872 the amount spent in educational purposes was much reduced, from 1876 to 1880 nothing being so expended, and from 1880 onwards only £300 per annum. The schools towards the support of which the sums spent in education were applied were connected with and under the direct management of congregations belonging to the different churches specified by Mr Ferguson. The education given in them was in most cases substantially the ordinary education and religious instruction given in parish schools. In others, such as mission schools, the education was largely of a religious character. Most of these schools were, after the passing of the Education Act, transferred to the school boards of the districts in which they were situated. Many of the schools were situated either in remote country districts, or in the poorer and thickly populated quarters of large towns, but all of them were connected with the congregations and churches in the locality.

The Commissioners on Educational Endowments framed a scheme, under which it was provided that the Ferguson Trustees should pay £1600 per annum to a new governing body, to be by them applied in grants to assist schools in the counties named by Mr Ferguson, in providing higher education. In determining the amount of the grants the governors were to take into consideration, inter alia, "efficient instruction in the Christian Reformed Protestant religion." The governing body was to consist of fifteen persons, seven of whom were to be elected by the trustees, one by each University Senatus, and the remainder by the chairmen of the school boards in the district named.

The Trustees presented a special case under the 30th section of the Educational Endowments Act. The committee of ministers of the quoad sacra churches belonging to the Church of Scotland, and the representatives of the four other religious bodies concerned, were the parties of the second part, the Commissioners being the third parties.

The first parties contended that the scheme was not in conformity with the statute, upon the following grounds, viz:—(1) That the Ferguson Bequest Fund is not an 'educational endowment' on a sound construction of section 1 of the said Act; (2) that on a sound construction of section 8 of the said Act the said residue is not within the scope of the Act; (3) that the scheme of the third parties is not in terms of the said Act, and particularly section 10 thereof, in respect that it diverts from other charitable purposes money in use to be applied to the same; and (4) that it is contrary to the terms of the said Act, and particularly section 15 thereof, in so far as it does not have regard to the spirit of the founder's intentions, in respect that (first) it renders impossible the exercise by the trustees of that absolute discretion which it was a cardinal point of the founder's scheme should be reserved to them, and supersedes them by a body whose members are not required to have the qualifications of membership of the respective churches which the testator thought essential; (second) it disintegrates the Ferguson Bequest Fund, which it was the wish of the testator to preserve 'as a permanent fund'; (third) it diverts to secular education what the founder enjoined should be devoted to denominational purposes controlled by the various churches alone."

The Commissioners contended that the scheme was in conformity with the Act. They stated;—"In particular, they are of opinion, and contend, that the said sum of £1600 does not exceed the proportions of the whole revenue which has been annually applied to educational purposes, according to the average of years, since 1858."

The question put to the Court (as altered during the debate) was,—“Whether the said scheme in the particulars above mentioned, or any of them, is not within the scope of or made in conformity with the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, or is contrary to law?”

The arguments of the first and second parties proceeded on an analysis of Mr Ferguson's deed to shew that his endowment was truly of a religious rather than an educational character. If this character did not exclude the endowment from the operation of the Act altogether, at all events a scheme that did not maintain it,—and the scheme in question did not,—had not had regard to the spirit of the founder's intention.¹ They also argued from the clauses of the Act that the scheme was not in conformity with it.²

The Commissioners argued upon the statute that the endowment was included in its operation, the education intended by Mr Ferguson and given by the trustees being the ordinary education of Scotland, which included religious teaching. As regarded the other points, they were within the discretion of the Commissioners, with which the Court could not interfere.³ They were directed to secure the end contemplated by Mr Ferguson in disregard of the means prescribed by him, a discretionary power which had even been exercised by the Court at common law.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the argument for the first and second parties here, who are in the same interest, we were reminded that we have a jurisdiction relating to the administration of charity, which has been defined in various cases, and particularly in the case of Clephane v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh (7 Macph., H. L., 7). That jurisdiction, I think, is very well defined in that case. It amounts just to this, that while the Court cannot change the object of a charity, it has jurisdiction to vary the means of attaining that object when circumstances render it necessary or expedient to do so. I mention this at the outset for the purpose of saying that that is not the jurisdiction which we are to exercise in the present case. We have nothing to do here with the equitable

No. 120. powers of this Court, nor can we bring them to bear in any degree, or in any shape, upon the question now before us. We are here to exercise, not an equitable jurisdiction, but, as a Court of law, to construe a statute. This is made very clear by the section of the Educational Endowments Act, which provides for a case being presented to this Court. It is conceived in these terms:—Sec. 30.—“If the governing body of any endowment to which a scheme relates, or any person or body corporate directly affected by such scheme, feel aggrieved by the scheme on the ground of the scheme being one which is not within the scope of, or made in conformity with this Act, such governing body, person, or body corporate may, within one month after the first publication of the scheme or amended scheme, submit a case to the Court of Session, to which the Commissioners shall, and any others directly interested may, be the parties, for the opinion of the said Court on the question or questions therein stated, and if the Court is of opinion that the scheme is contrary to law on any of the grounds in this section mentioned, the Scotch Education Department shall not approve thereof, but they may, if they think fit, remit the same to the Commissioners.” The question before us, therefore, is, whether this scheme is contrary to law as being either not within the scope of the Act, or not made in conformity with the Act. This has been already settled, I think, in two cases—the case of Forrest's Trustees in this Division (11 R. 719), and the case of Donaldson's Hospital in the Second Division of the Court (13 R. 101), and we are therefore to proceed now, just as the Court did in both these cases, to answer that question, and that question only, whether the scheme is contrary to law, as not being within the scope of the Act, or not in conformity with the Act.

Now, the objections which have been stated in this case for the complaining parties are enumerated in the 12th head of the case. The first is that “the Ferguson Bequest Fund is not an educational endowment on a sound construction of section 1 of the said Act.” Now, the first section of the Act provides that “‘educational endowment’ shall mean any property, heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been applied or is applicable in whole or in part, whether by the declared intention of the founder or the consent of the governing body, or by custom or otherwise, to educational purposes.” The section, therefore, contemplates that an educational endowment may be a fund which has been applied to educational purposes, or which is applicable to educational purposes; and it may be applicable to educational purposes although it has not been in fact applied, if it is so made applicable by the declared intention of the founder, or by the consent of the governing body, or by custom. Now, in this case it appears to me that this endowment is in part, although not in whole, applicable to educational purposes, according to the declared intention of the founder, and that, of course, requires to be shewn from the testamentary deed of the founder himself. The disposal of the residue of this estate is made in these terms:—“To hold, retain, set apart, and invest the whole residue,” &c. “as a permanent fund to be called the Ferguson Bequest Fund, and to pay, apply, and appropriate the interest and other annual income, profits, and produce thereof, in and towards the maintenance and promotion of religious ordinances, and education and missionary operations” within certain counties, which are specified, in the first place, and grants are to be made for this purpose to the different Presbyterian churches and the Independent Church in Scotland. Now, if that had stood alone, of course there could be little difficulty in answering the question whether this is in part an educational endowment, because one of the objects of the endowment is expressly said to be education. I do not dispute that what is meant is religious education,—that is to say, education combined with religious instruction; it is not contended, as I understand, that the mere teaching of religion is the object, but education conducted upon religious principles, and embracing religious instruction. I say if this matter had stopped there, I cannot think it at all doubtful that the endowment is partly an educational endowment; but then there is a clause which follows the main clause disposing of the residue in these terms:—"Declaring that the application and appropriation of the trust-funds shall be entirely at the option and discretion of the quorum of my said trustees, as to the proportions thereof to be applied to the said several objects." Now, that has been read, or at least it has been argued that it may be read, as giving the trustees a discretion to apply the whole fund to one or two of the three objects the testator has prescribed, to the exclusion of the third, and that the trustees are entitled accordingly, if they think fit—and they have to a certain extent acted upon that idea—to give the whole funds for the purpose of religious ordinances and missionary enterprises, to the exclusion of education altogether. It appears to me that that is not a sound construction of this clause. The clause merely gives the trustees the power of apportionment, but not power to exclude any one of the three objects from the benefit of the fund; and therefore, I think, we must come to the conclusion that a part of this endowment is applicable to the purpose of promoting education. The discretion which the trustees have as to the proportion to be given is probably superseded entirely by the provisions of this scheme, and whether that is in itself contrary to the scope of the Act, or not within the scope of the Act, or illegal upon any other ground, is a different question; but the first objection, I think, is completely answered by a reference to the deed founded on.

Now, referring to the twelfth head of the case, the next objection advanced is "that on a sound construction of section 8 of the said Act, the said residue is not within the scope of the Act." It is needless to read that section at length, because the meaning of it is plainly this, that the Commissioners are not to interfere with any endowment which is appropriated exclusively to the teaching of theology; and it certainly cannot be maintained, upon even plausible grounds, that the Ferguson Bequest was intended by its founder to be applied to the teaching of theology, and therefore that objection clearly fails.

But then it is said further "that the scheme of the third parties is not in terms of the said Act, and particularly section 10 thereof, in respect that it diverts from other charitable purposes money in use to be applied to the same." Now, that requires a consideration of the 10th section, which provides that "where any part of an endowment is an educational endowment within the meaning of this Act, and part of it is applicable or applied to other charitable purposes, the scheme shall be in conformity with the following provisions (except so far as the governing body of such endowment assent to the scheme departing therefrom),—that is to say"; and then follows a subsection which is not applicable to the present case. But the 2d subsection is thus expressed:—"The proportion of the endowment or annual income for the time being so applicable to such other charitable uses shall be deemed to be the proportion which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, is the proportion which has, according to the average of such number of years as the Commissioners shall determine, been appropriated as regards capital or applied as regards income to such uses, or if that proportion differs from the proportion which ought to have been so appropriated or applied according to the express directions of the instrument of foundation, or the decree of any competent Court, or the statutes or regulations governing such endowment, the proportion applicable to such other charitable uses shall be the proportion which ought, according to the express directions of such instrument, or such decree or such statutes or regulations, to have been appropriated or applied to such other charitable uses." Now, it is quite clear that the second part of that subsection does not apply to the present case, because the proportion has not been determined either by the deed of foundation or by any statute or by anything else. The proportion was left to the discretion of the trustees under the deed, and therefore the proportion now to be settled must be determined by the first part of this subsection, which leaves it to the Commissioners, and to them alone, to determine what is the proportion which has, according to the average of such number of years as they may determine, been appropriated in the past. Now, that is the course which the Commissioners in this case have followed. Whether they have acted prudently or well in the matter, or whether they have fixed a just or expedient proportion, I am not at liberty to inquire. The matter is left entirely in their hands; it is to be regulated by what is their opinion of the matter; and therefore, the discretion being entirely in the hands of the Commissioners, they cannot be said to have committed any illegality as regards either the scope of the statute or the way in which this scheme is framed, by exercising this discretion according to the best of their ability. This is just one of those cases in which there is an attempt to appeal to the discretion of this Court to over-rule the discretion of the Commissioners, but this Court is vested with no such discretion under the statute.

Now, the fourth objection is "that it is contrary to the terms of the said Act, and particularly section 15 thereof, in so far as it does not have regard to the spirit of the founder's intentions in respect that—(first), it renders impossible the exercise by the trustees of that absolute discretion which it was a cardinal point of the founder's scheme should be reserved to them, and supersedes them by a body whose members are not required to have the qualifications of membership of the respective Churches which the testator thought essential; (second), it disintegrates the Ferguson Bequest Fund, which it was the wish of the testator to preserve as a 'permanent fund'; (third), it diverts to secular education what the founder enjoined should be devoted to denominational purposes controlled by the various Churches alone." Now, with regard to section 15, it appears to me to contain instructions or directions to the Commissioners as to what they shall do, but leaves them full discretion as to the manner in which they shall do those things; and therefore, to say as a matter of objection that what they have done in the exercise of that discretion is contrary to their legal rights, is in my opinion not an objection to this scheme, or to what the Commissioners have done, but an objection to the provisions of the statute itself. In short, the whole of this fourth objection is just a complaint that the Commissioners have been vested with the powers which the statute has given them; and therefore the whole of that objection, I think, is just a repetition of the same kind of objection as is maintained as applicable under section 10, and is an interference, or an attempt to get this Court to interfere, with the powers of discretion specially vested in the Commissioners by the Act of Parliament.

I think, therefore, that all the objections are unfounded.

LORD MURK.—By the decisions which your Lordship referred to in the case of No. 120. Forrest's Trustees, and in that of Donaldson's Hospital, the extent to which this Court can go in dealing with questions of this description was pretty distinctly laid down; and the decision of both Divisions of the Court was that, under the statute the power which this Court received to deal with the schemes of the Commissioners, or with objections taken to the schemes of the Commissioners was this, that we could only inquire whether the schemes were within the scope of the statute or in conformity with the rules of the statute, or rather in conformity with the powers given to the Commissioners by the statute, and that if we found they were within the scope and within the powers given under the statute, we had no right to sustain any objection that might be taken to them. Beyond that, the Court have no jurisdiction at all; and, as I understand the statute, it is left to parties who object to the scheme of the Commissioners, to state their objections to the Education Department of the Privy Council in London, which deals with those matters; but Courts of law have no right to entertain them. Now, I have gone over all the clauses in the statute which have been founded upon in this case to shew that the four points that are raised in the 12th head of the case were points in which the Court could interfere, and in which the Commissioners had gone beyond the statute, and I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship, to the effect that in all those matters the Commissioners are in point of fact acting within the powers given to them by the statute, and that therefore this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the objections taken to this scheme. There is an absolute discretion vested by the statute as regards section 10 whereby the proportion to be fixed is left to the opinion of the Commissioners, and they have expressed their opinion, and we have no jurisdiction to inquire in regard to it one way or another. I think the same remark applies to the other objections that have been raised, and I therefore concur with your Lordship as to the manner in which the question should be answered.

LORD ADAM.—The only objections that we can entertain to a scheme are either that it is not within the scope of the Act, or that it is not made in conformity with the provisions of the Act; and these two things are different, because if the fund is not within the scope of the Act then the scheme cannot be altered or amended, while if the objection merely comes to this, that the scheme is not in conformity with the Act, then the scheme might be amended. Of the objections here, I think the first two are objections which come to this, that the fund is not within the scope of the Act; I think the others are objections that the scheme is not in conformity with the Act, and if we think it is not, an amended scheme might yet be prepared. I think there is that distinction between the kind of objections which have been stated.

Now, I agree with your Lordship that the fund we have to deal with is one which falls within the scope of the 1st section of the Act, and is an educational endowment in the sense there stated. I think it is clearly so for two reasons. In the first place, as your Lordship has pointed out, the testator himself has declared his intention to be that this particular fund with which we are dealing shall be applied to religious "ordinances and education and missionary operations"; and I quite think the proper reading of that is "shall be applied to religious ordinances, religious education, and missionary operations"; but even putting that interpretation upon it in the sense in which religious education is used there, I see no reason to suppose that, on that account, it ceases to be an educational endowment. I have no doubt upon that point at all. With regard to religious matters, the only exception I see of an endowment for such a purpose is that contained in the 8th section of the Act, which is referred to in the next objection—namely, that it is a fund solely applicable or applied for purposes of theological instruction. That appears to me to be the only exception in the Act with regard to religious education which can be taken. This fund clearly does not fall within that section, and therefore I am satisfied that the Act applies. I am equally clear, with your Lordship, that the trustees have no option in this matter as to applying part of the fund to educational purposes, because the direction which is given to them is—"declaring that the application and appropriation of the trust funds shall be entirely at the option and discretion of the quorum of my said trustees, as to the proportions thereof to be applied to the several objects"; that is, they have entire discretion as to the proportion, but none as to this—that some portion at least must be applied to each of the three purposes. I think that is quite clear. On that ground I think this is a fund, part of which by the declared intention of the founder is applied to educational purposes; and, therefore, on that ground it falls within the Act. But I think, further, if there was a doubt about that, it would fall within it too upon this second ground, that it has been a fund which has been applied by the consent of the trustees for many years past to educational purposes; and that also would bring it within the 1st section if the intention of the founder had been less clear than it is. That that is so is quite clear from the statements in the ninth article of the case, which give us ever since the foundation of the fund the particular amounts which have been applied to educational purposes. Upon these two grounds I have no doubt whatever that this is a fund part of which is an educational endowment in the sense of section 1 of this Act. This being so, that is an answer to the first two of the objections,—that the fund does not fall within the scope of the Act.

The third objection is that the scheme "diverts from other charitable purposes money in use to be applied to the same,"—that it diverts from the other charitable purposes to which this fund is dedicated an undue proportion of the money, viz., that it diverts from the religious ordinances and missionary operations a larger sum than the Commissioners are entitled to do. Now, that matter depends upon this, whether the proportion of this joint fund which the Commissioners have directed to be devoted is a larger proportion than they were entitled under the second subsection of section 10 to order. That is the question, and it is clear that that depends on the number of years which the Commissioners have taken, or are entitled to take, in order to strike an average. It is pretty obvious, if the Commissioners had limited themselves to some of the later years of the application of this money, the sum brought out would have been very small comparatively; but they have not done that; they have taken the expenditure on educational purposes for the whole period of the existence of the fund, and having done that, taking all those years into the average, it is not said or suggested that they have exceeded the proportion which they were entitled to fix. But if that be so, then the answer to that is, that the number of years which they shall include in taking the average is entirely within the power of the Commissioners, and within their discretion. They might, if they had chosen, have taken the last seven years, if they had thought it a fair way, or the last ten years, or they might have done as they have done in this case, gone away back to the beginning of the trust. It was entirely in their discretion whether they should take that course or follow another course in taking the average number of years. It was a matter which, as your Lordship has pointed out, was in their own discretion, and we cannot interfere with them.

The only other objection is that stated in objection 4, and upon that matter I entirely agree with your Lordship that the powers given to the Commissioners in this Act are of the very widest description. If you once get the fund within the scope of the Act, I should think it very difficult to touch any scheme framed by the Commissioners, because it seems to me upon looking over the whole of this Act that the purpose was to leave the widest possible discretion to the Commissioners, subject to the review of the Education Department and the Houses of Parliament. I think that is the scope of the Act, and that it would be very difficult, if the fund is within the Act, to challenge a scheme. However that may be, I do not think it has been successfully challenged in this case; and I concur with your Lordship that the whole of these objections must be repelled.

LORD SHAND being one of the Commissioners did not hear the case.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced on 17th May†:—"Find and declare that the scheme complained of is not, in respect of any of the objections maintained by the governing body, beyond the scope of or disconform to the provisions of the Educational Endowment Act, 1882, and is not contrary to law."

The scheme of reconstruction having proved abortive, held that the creditors were not entitled to the expenses of the petition and procedure following thereon out of the funds in the liquidation.

On 7th January 1886 James Halden and others, creditors of the Scottish Heritable Security Company, Limited, in liquidation, presented a petition under sec. 156 of the Companies Act, 1862, praying the Court to ordain the liquidator of the company to furnish to the petitioners a list of the creditors of the company in order that they might convene a meeting of the creditors, and, further, to ordain him to give the petitioners access to the books of the company, and to find the expenses of the petition, procedure following thereon, expense of said meetings, &c. to be expenses in the liquidation, and to authorise the liquidator to pay those expenses out of the funds in his hand as liquidator.

Liquidator of

On 20th January 1886 the Court granted the prayer of the petition, reserving the question of expenses.

Subsequently several meetings of the creditors of the company were held, at which reports by the liquidator, made up with a view to putting an end to the liquidation and reconstructing the company, were considered. This scheme ultimately proved abortive.

On 4th March 1887 Mr Halden and others, creditors of the company, presented a note to the Court, in which they prayed the Court to find all the expenses following on the original petition to be expenses in the liquidation, and to authorise the liquidator to pay them out of the funds of the liquidation. The liquidator did not appear in this note.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The original petition here was presented under sec. 156 of the Companies Act, 1862, which gives the Court power to make an order “for the inspection by the creditors and contributories of the company of its books and papers as the Court thinks just, and any books and papers in the possession of the company may be inspected by creditors or contributories in conformity with the order of the Court, but not further or otherwise.” Now, that is of course intended to give creditors the means of ascertaining anything they want to know for their own interests from the books of the company, but it was certainly not intended to be used for the purpose of enabling creditors to consider whether they should put an end to the liquidation and take means to reconstruct the company. That is what was done here. The scheme, however, proved abortive, and was abandoned. The proposal now is, that out of the funds in the liquidation shall be paid the expenses of that abortive attempt. I think that is altogether incompetent and out of the question, and I am therefore for refusing the petition.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the note.

JAMES THOMSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Murray—Grierson.

Husband and Wife—Separation—Insanity.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that an action of separation at the instance of an insane wife is incompetent.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren. I. THIS was an action of separation and aliment, on the ground of adultery and cruelty, at the instance of “Mrs Mary Livingstone M'Callum or Thomson, presently residing at the Royal Lunatic Asylum, Gartnavel, near Glasgow, wife of James Thomson, clothier and outfitter in Glasgow, with consent and concurrence of Duncan M'Callum, wright and builder in Glasgow, her father, and the said Duncan M'Callum, for any interest he has in the premises,” against the said James Thomson.

The defender denied the alleged adultery and cruelty, and also pleaded, inter alia,—(1) No title to sue; (2) The pursuer Mrs Thomson being insane, and therefore incapable of giving authority to raise this action, and the pursuer Duncan M'Callum having no interest or title to pursue it, the action is incompetent, and should be dismissed.

A curator ad litem was appointed to Mrs Thomson before the record No. 122. was made up, and was afterwards sisted as a pursuer.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—*Reid v. Duff*¹ settled that an action in the name of a fatuous person who was not cognosced was incompetent. That case was still law. Here Mrs Thomson had not been cognosced, as she competently might have been, though a married woman, and anyone might purchase a brieve and sue it out.² The tutor-dative thus appointed might bring an action of separation on behalf of his ward. Neither a curator bonis nor a curator ad litem had anything to do with the person of the incapax, merely with her property and with the lis respectively;³ certainly neither could represent the incapax in an action of so personal a character as one of separation or of divorce,—even if the wife were the defender in a divorce. Cognition was analogous to the appointment of a committee in England, which was a proceeding of a very thorough character by way of petition to the Lord Chancellor, with an examination before a master in lunacy.⁴ The absence of cognition here, therefore, took

* "OPINION.—This case was argued on the question of title to sue. It is an action of separation and aliment, instituted in the name of a lady whose state of mind has rendered necessary her confinement in an asylum, and it is instituted with the concurrence of her father, as next of kin or nearest agnate. A curator ad litem was appointed in the course of making up a record, and he also insists in the action. There does not appear to be any precedent in the reported decisions of this Court for an action of separation instituted under such circumstances; and my first impressions were adverse to the claim of a father or guardian to sue for a separation in name of the daughter or ward.

"The arguments against the title are obvious. The action is in its nature strictly personal; and it is easy to see the objections to the prosecution of a claim in the name of an insane wife, which she herself, had she been capable of giving instructions to a lawyer, might have declined to raise, and which, in the event of her recovery, she might disapprove.

"But there are also reasons of expediency in favour of the action. An insane wife might be condemned by fate to suffer every kind of cruelty and indignity at the hands of her husband if the right were denied to her of suing for separation in the only way in which she can prosecute legal measures, that is, through the intervention of her nearest relative or guardian.

"Having regard to the current of English authority, and particularly to the case of Woodgate, 30 L. J. Prob. and Mat. 197, I have come to be of opinion that the action is maintainable.

"The case of Woodgate underwent very careful consideration. The committee of the lunatic wife applied, in the first instance, to the Lords Justices in Chancery for authority to promote the suit, and after a reference to the Master, the desired authority was given. After a trial, the Judge, Sir Cresswell Cresswell, granted decree of judicial separation.

"The practice of the English Courts in this matter rests on their common law jurisdiction, and is not derived directly from the statutes under which the present Court for probate and matrimonial causes is constituted.

"There being no settled principle of the law of Scotland which would debar a lunatic wife from the exercise of such rights against her husband as may be claimed by married women under the circumstances set forth in this record, I am of opinion that the authority which is justly due to the decisions of a co-ordinate Court may be allowed to determine the question in favour of the competency of the action."

Thomson v.
Thomson.

Argued for the pursuers;—The question here came to be merely one of procedure, for it was admitted that the wife could get decree of separation if she had the proper guardian. It was said she must be cognosced, and have a tutor-dative appointed to her. Now, as regarded ordinary actions that was unsound; a pupil might raise an action in his own name and have a tutor ad litem appointed to him afterwards,³ and the same principle applied to an insane wife.⁴ This action, however, was said to be different because it was for separation; but, on the other hand, it was not an action of divorce, and its real purpose was, that the wife might get suitable aliment. The Court would therefore be slow to require such a cumbrous proceeding as the bringing of a cognition of insanity before allowing the wife to get an award of aliment. The law of England was clear. The committee of an insane wife might bring a separation on her behalf,⁵ or a divorce,⁶ or defend an action of divorce for her,⁷ or bring a suit for nullity of her marriage.⁸ It had also been held in England that an ex facie valid appointment of guardian would not be questioned in such actions.⁹

After the hearing the Court gave the parties an opportunity of considering whether they would arrange for the aliment of the wife, but it was intimated that they had failed to come to terms.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this action, both in form and on its merits, is incompetent, and that it should be dismissed.

LORD YOUNG.—That is my opinion too. I think that there are very strong and obvious reasons against allowing an action of separation to proceed in the name of a lunatic wife, who owing to her lunacy is confined in a lunatic asylum. I think that such an action would be highly inexpedient. I know of no instance of it in this Court, and I am not prepared to make one now, nor am I influenced by the English authorities, which have been referred to. I think, then, that an action of separation, and still more an action of divorce at the instance of a lunatic wife, is incompetent. She must of course be alimented, and an action for aliment may be brought in her name with the aid of any guardian whom the Court may assign to her, but this is not such an action. If the parties had agreed to convert it into such an action we might perhaps have entertained it, although I do not know that that is quite clear, because it seems to me doubtful whether we can pronounce a decree although even for aliment only in this action, which concludes for separation, and for aliment merely as an incident of that separation. If there is a dispute between this lady's father and her husband as to the suitable amount of aliment for her in the circumstances, and the question is to be determined of consent, the reference ought to be made to some third party rather than to this Court. But, I think with your Lordships that we of our own proper authority and jurisdiction can regard this action only as an action in the name of a lunatic wife for separation, and for aliment as an incident of the separation, and so regarding it, I think that it is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed.

Thomson.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I confess I was surprised when I saw that this was an action for separation at the instance of an insane wife, and still more so when I found that the competency of such an action had been sustained by the Lord Ordinary. It is an action in which the lady's father has taken the initiative because she herself was not able from mental incapacity to form any judgment as to her rights and interests. In such circumstances, the instance in so far as she is concerned might just as well have been a blank. It seems to me that to allow an action of this character to proceed without the knowledge of the wife would be a very serious matter indeed, and one for which we should require very clear and distinct authority. It is admitted there is no precedent for such an action in Scotland, and although I have the highest respect for the Courts of England, yet their decisions are not binding on us here, and in the present instance I am unable to adopt the principle of the case from that law on which the Lord Ordinary has founded his judgment, for I regard such an action as the present as one contrary to public policy. I therefore agree with your Lordships that it is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion with reference to the competency of the action. I think that we cannot sustain an action of separation at the instance of an admittedly insane wife. There is, I think, no proper action before us. I should, nevertheless, for myself have been glad to prevent further expense being incurred by allowing a remit to ascertain the amount of the husband's estate if the parties had consented to it, but as this is apparently not desired, I think we have no alternative but to dismiss the action.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

Lease—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7—Compensation for unexhausted improvements—Notice.*—The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, requires a tenant who claims compensation from his landlord for unexhausted improvements to give notice of his claim four months before the termination of his tenancy. Held that, in the case of leases which terminate at Martinmas for the arable land, and six months later for the houses and grass, notice given four months before the latter term is sufficient notice.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

By a lease dated 21st and 26th August 1871 for nineteen years Captain Stuart let the farm of Parklee to Mrs Janet Strang. Her son William acquired right to this lease by assignment dated 28th December 1883.

The clause as to entry was in these terms:—The lease was to endure “for the space of nineteen years from and after the term of Martinmas 1871, as to the arable lands, and Whitsunday thereafter as to the houses and grass, all at the yearly rent of £125 sterling, payable half-yearly by equal portions, at Martinmas and Whitsunday, commencing the half-yearly payment at Martinmas 1872, and the next at Whitsunday thereafter.”

By renunciation dated 7th and 9th November 1885, Strang gave up his lease “from and after the term of Martinmas 1885 as to the arable lands, and Whitsunday 1886 as to the houses and grass.” The renunciation made provision for payment of rent and arrears of rent, but contained no reference to any claim for compensation. Captain Stuart accepted the renunciation, “but under the express condition that the offer to lease the farm by William Lawson, blacksmith, Provanmill, by Millerston, will be confirmed by missive.”

In January 1886 William Strang sent to Captain Stuart notice of an intended claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, for unexhausted improvements. Captain Stuart having failed to take any steps to appoint a referee in terms of the 9th section, Strang in July 1886 raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire craving the Court, —“To appoint a competent and impartial person to be a referee, along with William Fleming, farmer, Fulwood, by Linwood, Renfrewshire, the referee appointed by the pursuer, to settle the difference between pursuer and defender arising out of a notice of intended claim by the pursuer and the said James Strang to the defender, specified in the condescendence hereto annexed.”

His claim was thus specified:—

“(1) Value of grass and clover seeds sown in 1885, .	£6 9 0
(2) Repayment of account for fencing, . . .	1 3 11
(3) (a) Sums expended in application to the land

such compensation as is by this Act permitted to be substituted for compensation under this Act), shall, so far as it deprives him of such right, be void.”

Sec. 42.—“ . . . Determination of tenancy means the termination of a lease by reason of effluxion of time, or from any other cause.”

* Sec. 7.—“Notwithstanding anything in this Act a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under this Act unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act.

“When a tenant gives such a notice the landlord may, before the determination of the tenancy, or within fourteen days thereafter, give a counter notice in writing to the tenant of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act.”

	£56 2 4"

The defender pleaded (1) that the claim had been abandoned, and (2) that the pursuer had failed to give notice of his claim in conformity with the Act.

On 24th July the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—“Finds that the said claim is not excluded by the foreshaid renunciation; therefore repels the defender's pleas; and in respect that the defender has failed, for seven days after notice from the pursuer, to appoint a referee for settling the amount and mode and time of payment of compensation under the said Act, appoints Allan Kirkwood, Esq., land-agent, Glasgow, to be referee, to act along with the referee appointed by the pursuer in the premises, and decerns.”*

On 9th November the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.†

* “NOTE.— . . . The notice is said to have been too late, the ish of the lease being at Martinmas 1885, not at Whitsunday 1886. It seems to me that this is the ordinary case of a Whitsunday entry and Whitsunday removal, with the usual provision to enable the incoming tenant to labour the arable land at the preceding Martinmas. See 1 Hunter, L. & T. 384; E. of Hopetoun v. Wight, 1863, 1 Macph. 1097, app. 1864, 2 Macph. H. L. 35. The point is clear, and needs no commentary.

“I do not think I can hold the tenant to be excluded from his statutory right to claim compensation by his having renounced the lease without reserving this claim. The statute which confers the right to compensation on a tenant gives it to him ‘on quitting his holding at the determination of a tenancy’ (sec. 1), and ‘the determination of a tenancy’ is said (sec. 42) to ‘mean the termination of a lease by reason of effluxion of time, or from any other cause.’ There is no more usual or natural cause, apart from expiry by effluxion of time, than renunciation or agreement; and it seems altogether inconsistent with the purpose and intention of the Act, to hold that every renunciation shall exclude its operation, unless the right of the tenant to claim compensation is expressly reserved. In renouncing a lease a tenant is presumably aware of the rights which the law confers at ‘the determination of a lease,’ and there is no reasonable ground for assuming that he waives or abandons them, unless he expressly says so. The recent case of Lyons v. Anderson, June 25, 1886, is different from the present case. However that may be, the principle laid down in that and previous cases (Waterson v. Stewart, 1881, 9 R. 155) that a renunciation of a lease imports a renunciation of all claims under it, cannot, in my opinion, be extended so as to make such a renunciation extinguish the statutory claim for compensation, which comes into existence only by reason of the renunciation itself.”

† “NOTE.— . . . I do not think that the renunciation, by expressly providing for payment of the rent to the landlord, necessarily excludes the tenant's claim under the statute; and were there any doubt on this point, the provision in section 36 of the Act, that any agreement by the tenant depriving himself of his right to claim compensation shall be void, would prevent the tenant from being prejudiced in that way. The other objection is one of more general importance. Under section 7 of the statute, it is required that, to entitle a tenant to compensation, he shall, ‘four months, at least, before the determination of the tenancy,’ give the statutory notice, and the question is, when did this tenancy determine? I am of opinion that it did not ‘determine’

Stuart.

The defender appealed, and argued;—In the first place, this was not a Whitsunday but a Martinmas entry; that followed from the principle on which the case of the Earl of Hopetoun v. Wight was decided,¹ viz., that you must look to the term when occupation actually began as the term of the lease. In the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, it was provided² that when a lease had twoishes notices of removal must be given before the first of them. The period described as “the determination of the tenancy” must be the term of removal. The landlord was entitled to give a counter notice within fourteen days after the determination of the tenancy; that could not mean six months after another tenant had been in possession of the arable land for six months. Further, if the tenant were entitled to give his notice in January, when the whole course of cultivation had been altered by a new tenant, the object of requiring notice, viz., that evidence might be preserved, could not be attained. Besides the renunciation here was not “any other cause” in the sense of section 42 of the statute; that referred to the irritancy commonly following on a failure to pay rent.³ At a renunciation there was a presumption that all claims hinc inde were settled.⁴ The mere fact of the lease coming to a premature termination gave the tenant at common law no right to compensation for improvements; he spent his money under that risk among others.⁵

Argued for the pursuer;—The term before which notice was to be given was Whitsunday; that was the term when the tenant was to quit the houses and the grass, which might be a very considerable part of the farm. This was not a Martinmas entry; in a Martinmas entry a tenant entered to the whole farm at that term.⁶ The analogy of such cases as the Hopetoun case was misleading; there the real nature of the lease was that entry was to the whole farm at Whitsunday with a privilege to the old tenant to come on the lands to carry off the crop which he had sown. Here the till Whitsunday 1886. The renunciation which determined it bears to be ‘from and after the term of Martinmas 1885 as to the arable lands, and Whitsunday 1886 as to the houses and grass.’ Now, although the tenant gave up possession of the arable lands at Martinmas 1885, he remained in possession of the houses and grass till Whitsunday 1886. He did not quit the subjects, therefore, till the latter date, and I do not think his tenancy determined till then. It is true that, as was suggested, inconvenience may arise from the statutory notice being delayed till after a new tenant has interfered with the land. But, on the other hand, inconvenience might arise from requiring that notice be given at a very early date, and in construing the statute we can hardly take a balance of convenience or inconvenience on the one side or the other as a safe guide. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the notice which was given four months before Whitsunday 1886 was given four months before the determination of the tenancy, and was, therefore, sufficient within the statute. The case differs materially from that of Hannan v. Ramsay, March 10, 1885, 1 Sheriff Court Reps. 236, decided in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire, and referred to at the debate. The tenant there had quitted the houses, buildings, and pasture lands at Whitsunday 1884, and had merely a right to use the barns till the 15th March 1885. He was no longer, after the former date, in the position of tenant, and his tenancy had, as the Sheriff held, determined. Here the pursuer remained in possession as tenant of the house and pasture land till Whitsunday 1886, and, as I have said, his tenancy did not, in my opinion, determine till then.” important condition was that the old tenant retained the houses, e.g. for feeding purposes, and for the residence of his family, while the new tenant had the privilege of coming on to the farm to labour it. It would be impossible to give notice before Martinmas, for a tenant might go on earning a right to compensation up to Whitsunday, e.g. by feeding with oilcake or eating off turnips. Again renunciation was included in the term "any other cause." Even if it were not, by the 36th section any contract by which the tenant was deprived of his right to compensation was void. [LORD YOUNG.—But you cannot apply that to a case where a tenant discharges his claim.] The renunciation here was pleaded as a bar rather than as a discharge. This was an entirely different case from a case of a discharge of claims under a lease; a renunciation might well cover them, for it was a renunciation of the lease itself. Again, cases such as that of Lyons, where claims hinc inde had been discussed, were different.

No. 123.
Mar. 16, 1887.
Strang v. Stuart.

At advising.—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff has found that the notice was sufficient, and I agree with him. The statute says that it must be given four months at least before the determination of the tenancy, and it seems to me that the statute would be entirely inextricable unless there were a specific point. It can only mean one point, and I think that the just and reasonable interpretation to put upon the words "determination of the tenancy" is the period after which no possession can be had by the tenant in terms of the lease. In this case, although his renunciation of part of the farm at Martinmas terminated his right to occupy the arable land from that term, the lease was not at an end, and the tenant had right to occupy part of the lands under it till Whitsunday. That seems to me, therefore, to be the determination of the tenancy.

With regard to the second point, viz., whether the tenant has given up his claim by the renunciation, it would have been better if parties had provided for this in the renunciation, for there may be two views of the matter. The landlord might say that the renunciation covered all such claims, the tenant might say that it was hard to take away from him a right which was not expressly mentioned. On the whole I am of opinion that the latter view is the better.

The result is that I agree with the Sheriff on both points.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with your Lordship. The lease here terminated, not by coming to an end according to its own terms, but by an agreement of parties to bring it to a conclusion before its natural termination. In these circumstances two questions are raised, and I think it is well to separate them as your Lordship has done. The first is whether, when a renunciation is made and accepted, there is an end to claims under the Agricultural Holdings Act,—whether that arrangement between the parties extinguishes any such claim. I agree that that is not so. I think the tenant had a right at the time of the renunciation,—the right which the statute gave him. If the unexhausted improvements had been made by him he had a right to compensation for them at the time of the renunciation. If parties meant to discharge that right, which I think it was quite lawful for them to do notwithstanding the provisions of the 36th section, I think they must have expressly excluded the claim. As that was not done, I am of opinion that the claim was not renounced.

No. 123. The other question is quite a general question, and is exactly the same question as would have arisen if the lease had run on to its natural term. In all, or almost all leases of arable farms there are two periods of entry and two periods of removing. The more common case is that the term of entry is Whitsunday with respect to the grass and houses, and the following Martinmas with respect to the arable land, i.e., the land which is under the plough for that year. When the statute prescribes as a condition of the right to compensation for unexhausted improvements that notice shall be given four months at least before the termination of the tenancy, to which of the two periods does it refer? The statute says (sec. 42) "determination of tenancy" means the termination of a lease by "reason of effluxion of time, or from any other cause." That does not make the matter any clearer, for the lease terminates at one period as to one part of the farm and at another as to the rest. It is a pity that the statute did not settle the matter. I think with your Lordship that the argument is not all on one side; there is room for reasonable argument on both.

Mar. 16, 1887.
Stuart.

I prefer the latter term, having in view what is, I think, a legitimate consideration that, whatever opinions may be entertained as to the policy of the Act, and, as we know, there is a difference of opinion on that matter, it was in the view of the Legislature a remedial statute, intended to remedy what in their view was a grievance of the tenant. The rule and principle is that a remedial statute is to have a liberal, as distinguished from a strict, construction. I think, therefore, that the proper construction of the statute is that the termination of the lease is when a total termination takes place,—when an end is put to it. This cannot be reasonably predicated when a tenant, who is still in possession of the houses and a considerable part of the lands, gives the incoming tenant access to the land to sow his crop.

We are determining here a general rule of construction. The term at which the tenant ceases under the lease to be tenant of the lands specified in it is the term referred to.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have come to the same conclusion as the Sheriffs, and think that the appeal against their judgment ought to be dismissed.

With reference to the first of the defences, it appears to me that there is no implication of any abandonment of the pursuer's right to compensation involved in the renunciation of his lease. The renunciation is a bipartite contract. It is given by the one party and accepted by the other, and the terms on which the pursuer gave up the farm are those which are specified in the deed of renunciation. There may be cases in which the renunciation of a lease without the reservation of a claim may bar the tenant from bringing it forward, but, assuming this, the present claim is not of such a nature as to involve this result. The claim was a statutory claim. The amelioration of the farm by manures put into the ground, the benefit to be derived from these in the future so far as unexhausted, are the origin of the right. The claim, therefore, is not for damages, but merely for compensation for benefits conferred. There is in the ground, ex hypothesi, value for all that can be claimed, or will be awarded. Presumptively, therefore, there can be no implication that such a claim was abandoned, because the lease was renounced. Probably there might have been a bargain, had the parties chosen to make it the subject of a special agreement. But neither made any stipulation on the subject, and accordingly, as I think,

renounced had run for the full period of nineteen years.

As to the second of the defences, I have little to add to that which has been presented by the Sheriffs in explanation of their grounds of judgment. The Act provides (sec. 1), "The tenant shall be entitled on quitting his holding at the determination of his tenancy to obtain from the landlord as compensation under this Act such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvements to an incoming tenant," but subject to this proviso (sec. 7)—"A tenant shall not be entitled to compensation unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act." The question is whether four months at least before the determination of his tenancy the pursuer gave the requisite notice. If his tenancy terminated at Martinmas 1885 he was too late, for it was only in January following that notice was given. If, on the other hand, the determination of his tenancy was not until Whitsunday 1886, the notice was within the statutory period. Part of the subject let was no doubt surrendered, or, in other words, the pursuer's tenancy of that part of the farm came to an end at Martinmas 1885, but with reference to the houses and grass the tenancy did not then come to an end. It was continued, and the lease was the title of possession till Whitsunday 1886. Were it enough to shew that the right of tenancy over the farm as a whole had ended at Martinmas 1885, the defender's contention would probably be made good. But there is nothing in the words of the Act which leads to this conclusion. On the contrary, the issue is the determination of the tenancy, and that is defined by the interpretation clause, sec. 42, to be "the termination of a lease by reason of effluxion of time, or from any other cause." The lease was an operative contract after Martinmas 1885. Neither by effluxion of time nor otherwise had the contract been brought to an end. On the contrary, there was possession under the lease; there were rights and obligations resulting therefrom, and, consequently, Whitsunday 1886 was the term four months before which it was necessary, if a claim for unexhausted ameliorations was to be made, that notice should be given to the defender.

JAMES DAVIDSON, merchant, Rothes, died in 1868 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement under which his trustees, John Mantach, the Rev. Alexander M'Watt, and another, were directed, inter alia, to pay to his widow, Mrs Helen Davidson, a certain annuity, and on her death to divide the residue of his estate among his grandchildren then surviving, of whom James Davidson Sharp was one, but under the declaration that the interest of the residuary legatees should vest at his, the truster's, death, and be payable on their reaching twenty-one years of age.

James Davidson Sharp died in 1872, and one-half of his share of his grandfather's estate then vested in his father, James Sharp.

On 26th September 1879, James Sharp by a bond and assignment in security assigned his interest to his son, Davidson Sharp, and this assignment was intimated to Mr Mantach, as James Davidson's trustee, on 1st December 1879. There was another trustee then alive, Mr M'Watt, but he was in bad health, and Mr Mantach was the managing trustee, and had the funds in his hands. On 1st October 1879, James Jameson, solicitor, Elgin, raised an action for payment against James Sharp, and on the dependence used arrestments on 22d October following in the hands of Mr Mantach, as James Davidson's trustee.

On 18th November 1879, Jameson obtained decree.

On 4th June 1880, arrestments in execution, proceeding on that decree, were executed in the hands of both the surviving trustees (Mr Mantach and Mr M'Watt) of James Davidson.

On 21st June 1880, James Sharp was charged on the decree in the action.

On 29th July 1880, James Sharp presented a petition for cessio in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, and James Jameson, the pursuer of the action against Sharp, appeared in that process and opposed the cessio, but finally acquiesced in the decree, which was granted, and thereafter extracted in November 1880. A trustee was nominated, in whose favour James Sharp was appointed to execute a disposition, but no such disposition was executed, and no further proceedings were taken in the process. The arrestments of 22d October 1879 were not founded on, or indeed mentioned in that process.

In May 1883, Mrs Davidson, the widow of the truster James Davidson, died, and his estate became divisible.

Mr Jameson again used arrestments in execution in May 1883, and within five years of the date hereof, and that all arrestments used or to be used upon dependence of actions shall likewise prescribe within five years after sentence is obtained in the said actions, if the said arrestments be not pursued or insisted on within that time." By Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, sec. 22, the period of prescription is limited to three years.

September and October 1884, in the hands of Mr Mantach (Mr M'Watt No. 124. having died on 27th November 1880).

On 1st December 1884, Mr Mantach, sole surviving trustee on the estate, raised an action of multipointing, in which the fund in medio was James Davidson Sharp's share in his grandfather's succession, which had passed to his father, James Sharp. He called as defenders, Mr James Jameson, the arresting creditor, and Mr Davidson Sharp (who was represented by his factor, Mr Neilson), the assignee under his father's assignation above mentioned, who both claimed. Mar. 18, 1887.
Jameson v. Sharp.

The above facts were admitted, and it was further admitted that Mr M'Watt, one of James Davidson's trustees, who died in 1880, was in delicate bodily health for several years before his death, but was able to transact business, and did so till he died. He never resigned the trust, but the whole trust funds were in the hands of Mr Mantach, who managed the trust.

Mr Jameson claimed to be ranked preferably on the fund to the extent of the debt for which he had obtained decree, with all subsequent expenses.

He pleaded;—(1) In virtue of the decree and arrestments libelled, particularly the arrestment used on 4th June 1880 and subsequent dates, the claimant James Jameson is entitled to be ranked and preferred as claimed. (2) The bond and assignation founded on by the claimant Thomas Neilson was not duly intimated, and is inept.

Mr Neilson claimed the whole fund in medio. In answer to the competing claim, he stated,—“The claimant does not admit the validity of said arrestments, of which those executed on 22d October 1879 and 4th June 1880 have become void by prescription. The latter has also become inoperative in respect of said decree of cessio, while the other arrestments are subsequent in date to the intimation to the pursuer of the assignation before mentioned, and to the decree of cessio already referred to.”

He pleaded,—(1) The said Davidson Sharp having acquired, as condescended on, right to the said share of the trust-estate of the said James Davidson, to the exclusion of all other claims, the present claim to the whole fund in medio should be sustained. (2) The arrestments founded on by the claimant Mr Jameson being invalid and inept, and the arrestments specially founded on being posterior in date to the intimation of the bond condescended on, and being also prescribed, his claim is unfounded, and should be repelled.

On 22d June 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) repelled James Jameson's 1st and 2d pleas in law, and allowed proof on a third plea which need not be here specified.*

* “NOTE.—The subject of competition in this case is the interest of James Sharp in the residuary estate of the late James Davidson, merchant in Rothes; and the competing claimants are a creditor who claims a preference in respect of certain arrestments, and the factor and commissioner for Davidson Sharp, a son of James Sharp, who founds upon an intimated assignation.

“James Sharp in 1880 obtained a decree of cessio bonorum, and a trustee was nominated in whose favour he was appointed to execute a disposition. But no such disposition was in fact executed, and no further proceedings were taken in the process. The present process has been intimated to the trustee, but he has not thought fit to enter appearance. The only persons who were stated by the petitioner in the application for cessio to be creditors are the real raiser, Mr Mantach, and the claimant, Mr Jameson; and all parties are agreed that their rights may be determined in this process, and that it is unnecessary to resort to the process of cessio for that purpose.

“The questions argued were, whether the arresting creditor has obtained an Jameson v.

Sharp.

On 2d November 1886 the Lord Ordinary sustained the claim of Mr Neilson, and ranked and preferred him to the whole fund in medio.

Mr Jameson reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The arrestments of 22d October 1879 and 4th June 1880 were not prescribed. The Act of 1669, cap. 9, enacted that if not “pursued or insisted on” within five years arrestments prescribed, and by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, the time was shortened to three years. The question then came to be, had the three years been interrupted by any act of pursuit or insistence? He maintained that they had. No definite rule as to what constituted pursuit could be laid down; it was always a question of circumstances. Undoubtedly some judicial steps required to be taken.¹ Appearance in a multiplepoinding was sufficient. Appearance in a cessio ought to be looked upon as equivalent to appearance in a multiplepoinding.² Thomas's case was a decision on what was pursuit of a debt, but the Act on which that question depended (1579, c. 83) was practically in the same words as regarded this point as the statute regarding the prescription of arrestments. The appearance in the cessio was all the arrester here could do, as the money could not be made forthcoming till effectual preference, assuming the assignation to be valid; and if not, whether the assignation has been duly intimated, so as to divest the cedent.

“The arrestments used on 22d October 1879, and on the 4th of June 1880, are in my opinion prescribed (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, sec. 22); and the assignation, assuming that it is valid and well intimated, is preferable to the later arrestments. It is maintained that prescription was interrupted by the decree of cessio in October 1880. But there is nothing in the proceedings upon which the claimant Jameson can found as being tantamount to his ‘pursuing and insisting on’ his arrestment within the statutory period of three years. The Sheriff found the petitioner entitled to the benefit of cessio on the 7th October, and pronounced decree of cessio on the 22d October 1880; and since then nothing appears to have been done in that process. Mr Jameson made no claim in the cessio, and took no step to make his arrestment effectual, or to found upon it for any purpose, until he claimed in the present action. He appears to have objected to decree of cessio being granted, on the ground that the fund now in medio was not included in the debtor’s statement of his assets. But the Sheriff repelled the objection, first, because the petitioner was not, at that date, possessed of funds to meet his liabilities; and secondly, because in so far as he had a prospective interest in James Davidson’s estate, he had either been denuded of the same by the assignation to his son, or if that assignation were, as Mr Jameson maintained, challengeable as collusive, he would be denuded by the disposition omnium bonorum which he would be required to grant. It appears to me that there is nothing in these proceedings to keep alive the arrestment. It is said that under the Cessio Act then in force (6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56), the decree operated as an assignation of the debtor’s moveables in favour of the trustee for behoof of creditors. But that would not affect preferences already obtained, either by a previously intimated assignation, or by duly executed diligence; nor could it have any effect in perfecting uncompleted diligence.

“The next question is whether the intimation has been duly intimated so as to be preferable to the later arrestment. The objection is that there were two trustees, and that the assignation was intimated only to one of them. But it is admitted that the whole trust funds were in the hands of Mr Mantach, the trustee to whom intimation was made; and that his co-trustee, Mr M’Watt, died in November 1880, before any of the arrestments were used, which were still in force when this action was raised.”

the death of the truster's widow. The cessio was applied for in consequence of the charge which followed on the arrestments. (2) The intimation founded on by the other claimant was not good, being made to only one of two trustees.¹

Argued for Mr Neilson ;—(1) The reclamer had failed to shew that he had done anything to insist in his diligence during the statutory three years. He certainly appeared in the cessio, but he did not found on his arrestments, and merely appeared as a creditor. His proper course would have been to raise a furthcoming, and limit the conclusions of his summons to payment at the death of the liferenter. (2) The intimation to Mr Mantach was sufficient.² He was the managing trustee, and all the funds of the trust were in his hands.

Jameson v.
Sharp.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question in this case is whether the arrestments used by the reclamer on 22d October 1879 and 4th June 1880 are prescribed, and, if that question is to be determined in his favour, of course the arrestments being effectual he will be preferred in this action. The Lord Ordinary has, however, found that they are prescribed, and I agree with him in that conclusion. The Statute of 1669, though it is old, is still in viridi observatione, for not only has effect been given to it in quite modern times, but its policy has been recognised in comparatively recent legislation by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. In that statute, so far from there being any intention manifested of going back on the policy of the older statute, the time of prescription of arrestments is reduced from five to three years. Accordingly, if after the lapse of three years from the laying on of the arrestments nothing has been done to break the period of prescription, the arrestments are prescribed and of no avail. It is said here, however, that the arrestments have been acted on during the prescriptive period, and the question is, has anything been done here sufficient to satisfy the words of the statute?

The Act 1669, chap. 9, provides that any arrestment “already used upon the ground aforesaid shall prescribe within five years of the date hereof, and that all arrestments used or to be used upon dependence of actions shall likewise prescribe within five years after sentence is obtained in the said actions if the said arrestments be not pursued or insisted on within that time.” The statute carefully repeats the words we have to construe, “pursued or insisted on” as regards all kinds of arrestments, (1) arrestments to be used hereafter; (2) arrestments that have been used; and (3) arrestments on the dependence.

Now, what has happened here to answer the words of the statute? It is said that the common debtor applied for cessio, and that decree of cessio was pronounced. That by itself is not a proceeding on the part of the arresting creditor in the way of pursuing or insisting on the arrestments. But it is said, further, that the arresting creditor appeared in the process, and indeed that the foundation of the application for cessio was a charge by him on the debt secured by the arrestments. That may be very true, and he did doubtless appear in the process, but all he did was as a creditor on a debt, and nothing was done in

No. 124. the process of cessio which would not have been done equally had no arrestments ever been used at all. How that can be said to answer the words of the statute, I cannot see. The facts simply come to this, that nothing has been done by the arrester, for in the cessio his arrestments were never even mentioned.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Jameson v.
Sharp.

The arrester next says that he was placed in a very awkward position, because he could not make his arrestments available, as though the fund in question was vested in the debtor it was not payable till the death of a liferenter. No doubt that is a peculiarity in the case, but it is just one of those peculiarities which require great attention on the part of the creditor, in order to avoid prescription of his arrestments. No doubt had there been any double distress, or any competition for the arrested fund, an action of multiplepounding would have been competent though the fund was not immediately payable, but supposing there was no double distress, I do not doubt that it would have been perfectly competent to raise an action of furthcoming, the pursuer guarding the conclusions of his summons in point of time so as not to conclude for immediate payment against the arrestee, but for payment at the death of the liferenter. If nothing else could have been done but to raise a furthcoming, then without doubt such an action would have been competent. Nothing, however, of that kind was done, and I think, therefore, we must give effect to the statute.

The next question relates to the sufficiency of the intimation of the assignation founded on by the other claimant. The fund assigned was in the hands of two trustees, Mr Mantach and Mr M'Watt. The intimation was made to Mr Mantach alone. There being at that time no other surviving and acting trustees than these two, the question is whether the intimation to Mr Mantach was sufficient. It is admitted that Mr Mantach had the whole trust funds in his hands, and was really the acting trustee. Mr M'Watt, though still a trustee,—for he had not resigned,—was in very indifferent health (though fit to attend to business), and obviously left the administration of the trust in the hands of his co-trustee. In these circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that the intimation was good. The doctrine of Mr Erskine (iii. 5, 5) goes even further than is necessary for the present case, and none of the cases cited to us throw any doubt on the soundness of his law, and no case known to me would justify us in saying that when such intimation is made in the hands of a trustee who holds the trust funds, and practically administers the trust, it is not sufficient intimation in point of law. On these grounds, I am for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURK.—I am clear that on the words of the statute “pursued and insisted on,” we can come to no other conclusion than that these arrestments have prescribed. It may be at first sight difficult to see what the arrester could have done to avert prescription, but the words are clear; and I agree that, in the circumstances, nothing would have prevented his raising an action of furthcoming. That being so, the arrestments necessarily fall.

The only question remaining is as to the validity of the intimation of the assignation; on that point I am quite clear that the doctrine of Mr Erskine to which we have been referred is quite sufficient to cover the case. There might be special circumstances in which the intimation might not be sufficient, but there is nothing of that kind alleged here, and, therefore, I think we must hold the intimation to Mr Mantach to be good. On these grounds I concur.

LORD SHAND.—Under the older statute as amended by 1 and 2 Vict. chap. No. 124. 114, it is a condition of arrestments remaining in force, that during three years after they have been used they shall be “pursued and insisted on.” In the ordinary case there is no difficulty in applying those words, but here it is said that the fund arrested being liferented by a lady, it could not be made forthcoming till her death. It may have required some ingenuity to devise some course to prevent the arrestments becoming prescribed, but I think a forthcoming might have been raised, and decree obtained thereunder, subject to the liferent. Nothing, however, was done, and I am satisfied that the mere appearance in a cessio in which no notice was taken of the arrestments is not sufficient.

As to the other question, I do not think we can on the authorities lay down any precise rule for all cases, but as here intimation was made to the only trustee who managed the trust funds, I have no doubt that that intimation was quite sufficient.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in all that your Lordship has said, and I also concur in the Lord Ordinary’s note, with one exception, viz., where he suggests that though the intimation of the assignation might have been bad at first, it became good by the death of the other trustee. That seems to me to be very doubtful law, but I agree in thinking that, in the circumstances, the whole management of the trust being in Mr Mantach’s hands, the intimation given was sufficient.

THE COURT adhered.

Fishings—White fishings—Tidal and navigable river—Acts Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23.—A member of the public brought an action against the riparian proprietor concluding for declarator that he had a right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which were not of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbed and flowed, and as far as the highest point reached by the ordinary spring tides; and averred that the portion of the Doon so described extended from the sea to a distance of about 500 yards inland. The action was founded both on common law and the Acts of Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23, which gave the public right to take “herrings, cod, ling, or any other sort of white fish in all and every part of the seas, channels, bays, firths, lochs, rivers, and other waters where such fish are to be found on the coasts” of Scotland.

The riparian proprietor in defence produced a crown charter of barony, dated 1793, which contained a clause “cum piscationibus yairis et cruives et salmonum et alborum piscium tam in aquis salsis quam dulcibus,” and averred exclusive possession of both the white and the salmon fishings on that title. He further denied that the river was either tidal or navigable beyond a point in line with the line of high-water on the neighbouring coasts, and averred that between the points in dispute floating white fish were not to be found, or at least not in such numbers as to be of any value to the public.

It was proved that no part of the solum of the river for the 500 yards in question was left dry at low-water, although the level of the water rose and fell with the flow and ebb of the tide, and was sometimes found to be brackish up to the extreme point claimed by the pursuer. The defender had let the fishings in question for more than forty years previous to the date of the action, and had granted licences to anglers entitling them to fish there, of which the pursuer at one time held one. Eels, small flounders, and also, to some extent, seath and lythe were caught in the water in question; but the only fish which the defender's tacksmen thought it worth while to keep were fish of the salmon kind and yellow trout, of which last comparatively few were to be caught. Pleasure parties in rowing boats occasionally went up the river at high tide, but there was a bar at the mouth which was an obstacle to more extended navigation, although it was proved that in former years small smacks, and on one occasion a small steamer, had gone a short way up.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) (1) that the Doon between the points in question was neither a tidal nor a navigable river, and that the pursuer was not entitled to declarator either at common law or under the statute; and (2) that the defender under his titles had right to the whole fishings therein, and had had from time immemorial exclusive possession thereof. Defender therefore assolvièd.

River—Foreshore—Line of high-water—Held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the right of the Crown in the sea-shore extends to the line of high-water of ordinary spring tides, and is not limited (as is the rule in England) to the line reached by the average of the medium high tides between the spring and the neap.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Declarator—Sheriff Court Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 8—Value of subjects.—Question, whether in an action of declarator in the Sheriff Court under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1877, the value of the subjects is to be determined by reference to the pursuer's or to the defender's interest.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

M.

In October 1884, James Bowie, who was an upholsterer in Glasgow, but who, in the course of the proceedings to be narrated, came to reside at Ayr, and who, while temporarily living there, had been apprehended on the night of 11th August 1884 by Robert Armour, water-bailiff to the Marquis of Ailsa on a charge of poaching in the river Doon, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Ayr, against the Marquis, also calling Armour as a defender, in which he prayed the Court "to find and declare that the pursuer, as a member of the public, has an undoubted right and privilege of fishing with single rod and line for trout, flounders, eels, and all other fish which are not salmon, sea trout, and whiting, and the young of salmon, sea trout, and whiting, in the river Doon, at least in that part of it within the tidal influence of the sea"; then followed a prayer for interdict against interfering with him in the exercise of that right.

Except that the pursuer in the Sheriff Court did not found on the Acts of Anne and Geo. II. founded on by him in the Court of Session action, the pleadings of parties were substantially to the same effect as in an action in the Court of Session raised subsequently by Bowie against the Marquis, as after mentioned. The question in the actions related to a portion of the river Doon (which flows into the sea about two miles to the south of Ayr), extending for about 500 yards from the bar at its mouth to a mill-dam known as "the lower dam-dyke." The pursuer was found fishing on the night of 11th August above this dam-dyke—between it and a bridge known as the Doonfoot Bridge,—but he pleaded ultimately, at least, that he, as a member of the public, had no right to fish in the Doon above the dam-dyke, because he came to admit that "the tidal influence" (as it was described in the Sheriff Court action) did not extend higher; but on the other hand he averred that the tidal influence reached the dam-dyke, and further that the river had been navigated, or at least was navigable, that distance from its mouth, and therefore he contended that the river to that extent, either as tidal or as navigable, or as both, was a public river, and that as such the white-fishings in it (including the right of fishing for yellow trout) were the inalienable property of the Crown in trust for the use of the public. He further denied that the Marquis had had exclusive possession on his titles.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Bowie v. Mar-
quis of Ailsa.

A question was also raised as to whether the public had a right of access to the river by means of certain footpaths, but as both the Sheriffs and all the Judges in the Court of Session were against the pursuer on that question its details need not be given here.

The defenders founded on the titles of the Marquis to the riparian properties, and particularly on a crown charter of barony, dated 5th July, and written to the seal and registered 2d September 1793, which contained the following clause:—"Una cum piscationibus yairis et cruives et salmonum et alborum piscium tam in aquis salsis quam dulcibus cum cymbis in mari et escis in arena ad capiendos pisces ex adverso dict. terrarum ac cum cymbis una vel pluribus pro piscatione salmonum in flumine de Doon vel in mari inter locum de Greenan et Ecclesiam Sancti Joannis in Ayr et integra piscatione dict. fluminis de Doon ex utraque ripa ejusdem ad altissimam partem dict. terrarum de Greenan." The defenders averred that the Marquis and his authors had had exclusive and uninterrupted possession of the fishings in question on that title. They further denied that the river was a public river, averring that it was between the points in dispute neither tidal nor navigable.

The parties had also the following averments bearing on the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to entertain the action, but the defenders did not plead that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction:—(Cond. 7) "The value of the said right and privilege to the pursuer does not exceed the sum of £50 by the year, or £1000 value."* (Ans. 7) "The privilege of fishing for trout and fish other than fish of the salmon species in the portion of the river Doon referred to is of no value whatever to the pursuer, but if the right of fishing is opened to the pursuer and the public, the defender's salmon-fishings in the Doon will be injured to a much greater extent than £50 by the year, or £1000 value, and that in respect large numbers of salmon and sea trout fry, and of whiting and sea trout, will necessarily be destroyed, and the exercise of the right of salmon-fishing by the defender will be seriously interfered with."

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—The Doon between Doonfoot Bridge and the sea was a favourite resort of salmon fry, which swarmed there at certain seasons, and passed out and in with the ebb and flow of the tide, gathering strength to proceed seaward; and fishing by single rod and line, if carried on to any considerable extent, even without any intention to hook such fry, would destroy large numbers, as they take readily almost any sort of lure, and after being hooked are exceedingly apt to die. Whiting and sea trout were also common between the same points in the river, but yellow trout, though

* The Sheriff Courts Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 8, enacts:—"The jurisdictions, powers, and authorities of the Sheriffs and Sheriffs-substitute of Scotland shall be and the same are hereby extended to—(1) All actions (including actions of declarator, but excluding actions of adjudication, save in so far as now competent, and excluding actions of reduction), relating to a question of heritable right or title, where the value of the subject in dispute does not exceed the sum of £50 by the year, or £1000 value. . . ."

caught there both by anglers and in the salmon nets, were comparatively rare, that species of fish having been almost exterminated in the river through an influx of tainted water from a coal-pit into the upper waters some years previously. Eels, flounders, seath, lythe, and mullet were also to be caught from the dam-dyke downwards. There was some difference of opinion on the point, but the fair result of the evidence was that none of these fish (except perhaps eels) were to be caught in the Doon in such numbers or of such a size as to make their capture of moment to anglers or to the public.*

There was no parole evidence in the Sheriff Court action on the question as to the highest point to which tidal influence reached in the Doon, the parties having agreed to remit to Mr James Morris, architect, Ayr,—“to ascertain and report what is the highest point reached by the ordinary spring tides in the river Doon in the present state of the lower dam-dyke, reserving parties’ pleas on the general question of law on the point.” Mr Morris reported that he had ascertained the lower dam-dyke to be the point in question. This view was assumed to be correct by both

The pursuer himself deponed,—“I have seen shoals of mullet, and shoals of lythe, seath, and lots of flounders and eels between the mouth of the Doon and the dam-dyke. Plenty of them go up within 200 yards of the dam-dyke. I have often fished in the tidal part of the Doon for those flounders and eels, and caught those fish.” Cross-examined,—“I was in the habit of fishing for flounders with rod and line and worms. I did not know whether the flounders were fresh or salt-water flounders. They might be from six to nine inches long. I used them for food. I never fished either for mullet or seath. I have fished for eels with garden worms.”

William Purdie, tailor, Ayr, deponed, in cross-examination by the defender,—“When fishing between the dam-dyke and the sea I generally caught whiting, or yellow trout, flounders, or eels. I got flounders and eels oftener than I wanted them. I generally fished with the fly, and sometimes with bait. It was with bait I caught the flounders. It was whiting and yellow trout I was generally fishing for, and it was when I was fishing for yellow trout and whiting that I got the flounders and eels. I generally threw the eels away, and brought one of the flounders home for a favourite cat. . . . Most of them are too small for human food.”

John Gemmell, an old man who latterly had made his livelihood by fishing, deponed, in cross-examination by the defender,—“I would get from two pounds to half a stone a night. I fished for a living, and sold the fish I caught. Nobody ever stopped me, and I just worked away at the fishing. I generally went to fish a little before sunset. The last time I was out, about five weeks ago, I caught about five stones of flounders, and a cod a stone weight. Some of the flounders were half a pound weight, and some were less. I also got seath and lythe with the worm. I also got cod with the worm. I have got a good when of small yellow trout. I have seen me get fifty in a night.” But it appeared that this witness usually fished close to the mouth of the river.

Samuel Bell, fisherman, employed in 1869 by the tacksman of the fishings, a witness for the pursuer, deponed,—“We caught in the net salmon, grilse, white trout and yellow trout, eels, flounders, mullets and crabs, seath and lythe, and various other kinds of fish. The mesh of the net was, I think, from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. At times we got a good number of yellow trout from about one and one and a quarter pounds down to half a pound. There were a good many flounders. There were a good many eels, seath, and lythe frequented the river for shelter. At times we got a good number of them.” Cross-examined.—“Salmon, sea trout, whiting, and yellow trout were the only fish which the tacksman sold. The white fish the fishermen used for their own eating—at least any that were fit for eating.”

Sheriffs, and their interlocutors contained a finding of fact embodying it. No. 125.

The bar at the mouth of the river was used as a ford for horses and carts at low-water, and could at that state of the tide be crossed only by small boats, and hardly even by them; at high tide there was a considerable depth of water on the top of the bar, and above it up to the dam-dyke the river was at all states of the tide deep enough for rowing boats. Pleasure parties occasionally went up the river in boats from the sea as far as they could, but this took place more frequently in former years, and there was little evidence of the use of the river for the purposes of commercial navigation.*

Bowie v. Mar-
quis of Ailsa.

From 1835 down to 1881 the Marquis of Ailsa and his predecessors let the fishings at large rents, and the tacksmen were in use to watch the river and protect the fishings, and to stop those found fishing, whether by single rod and line or otherwise, unless they had leave either from the Marquis or the tacksmen. It did not appear that the inhabitants of the locality made any protest against the exercise of these alleged rights, but, on the other hand, there was a body of evidence by persons who had themselves fished, and by fishermen who had been in the employment of tacksmen, that single rod and line fishing without leave had been practised to a considerable extent.

On 23d July 1878 the Marquis caused a handbill to be issued, in the following terms, headed:—"Notice to Fishers.—All parties found fishing in the lower portion of the river Doon, without written permission from the Marquess of Ailsa, will be prosecuted," &c., &c. On 12th September 1879, the pursuer received under the hand of the Marquis a written permission in the following terms:—"James Bowie has leave to fish with the rod and fly in the river Doon between the Low Bridge and the sea, subject to whatever regulations have been or may be made by the Fishery Board of Heritors of the river Doon." The pursuer fished the Doon under the authority of that permission, and knew that others had "got

Purdie, tailor, already mentioned, deponed,—“When I lived at Gateside of Bellisle I kept a pleasure boat at the foot of Bellisle Burn, and I was often up the Doon with that pleasure boat as far as the battery—[some distance below the dam-dyke]. We were just rowing up and down the river, when the tide was in, for pleasure. I had a bigger boat, which I kept at the fishers' place at the mouth of the Doon, as it was too large for going up the river. I have seen pleasure boats from Ayr, with pleasure parties in them, rowing up and down the Doon as far as the battery. I have seen pleasure parties row up and down half a dozen times any way, but I cannot say how often. The last time I saw a pleasure party up the Doon was in Alexander Mitchell's time, about twenty years ago. I have since seen small boats belonging to the fishermen and to Mr Wright row up the river. I once saw a small steamer over twenty years ago up the Doon as far as the fishermen's house—[very near the sea]. The steamer belonged to Mr Smith of the Ayr shipyard. Mr Mitchell, tacksman, allowed him to bring the steamer up, and lay it up during the winter.” This was the only witness who spoke to having seen a steamer on the Doon.

Gemmell, also already mentioned, deponed,—“I have gone up the river in my own boat, and many more forbye me, in other boats. Twenty-five or thirty years ago it was a common thing to take a boat there on a Sunday.” Re-examined for the pursuer.—“I had often in my time to run up the Doon in gales of wind for shelter. That was when I was sea-fishing. I have not been much pleasuring for the last twenty years. It is fifty years since I ran for shelter to the water of Doon. I remember once running up there with a cargo of herrings. I ran up to where the fish-house is now.”

leave for asking, and that Lord Ailsa's officers hindered people from fishing who had not leave." He further admitted in evidence that this leave only continued for the current season, and that it "was withdrawn by public advertisement in the following season." Since then the pursuer had not had any permission whatever to fish, but had on various occasions fished without permission, and, as he admitted, he occasionally got whitling when fishing for trout, and when he caught them he kept them. Late on the night of 11th August 1884 the pursuer went to fish the river between the dam-dyke and the Doonfoot Bridge, and therefore above the highest point to which the tide reached, according to Mr Morris' report, with single rod and line, equipped with flies which to his knowledge were well adapted to kill sea trout and whitling at night, although he had bought them for yellow trout night fishing in the Girvan, and between twelve and one on the morning of the 12th August he was found wading and fishing with rod and line in that part of the river by the defender Armour and his assistant, Cunningham. When challenged, the pursuer threw into the river a bag containing five fish, one of which was afterwards got hold of by Cunningham, and proved to be a whitling. The pursuer deponed that he believed all the fish he had caught that night were yellow trout, though there might have been a whitling among them. He did not particularly examine them as he caught them. He at first gave a false name and address, but afterwards, when being taken to the police-station, told his real name and address, and claimed a legal right to fish for yellow trout with single rod and line in the river Doon at the place where he was found.

On 30th June 1885, the Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson) pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after findings in fact, he found and declared that the pursuer as a member of the public had a right of fishing in the terms prayed for, "in that part of the river Doon within the tidal influence of the sea, viz., from the mouth up to the lower dam-dyke," assoilzied the defender from the conclusion for interdict, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

On appeal the Sheriff (Brand), on 13th January 1886, pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds in point of law that the pursuer is not entitled to the declarator and interdict sought for, but reserves to him any right he may have as one of the public to fish in the Doon from the sea-shore, but subject always to the provisions of the Salmon Fishery laws: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action; finds the pursuer liable in expenses; allows," &c.*

* "NOTE.—There can be no doubt that the public have an inalienable right of fishing for white fish in the sea, but does this right extend as far up a river as the tide ebbs and flows, or may the Crown readily convey the exclusive right of fishing in a river at the part subject to the tidal influence? It does not appear to the Sheriff that the opinion expressed by Lord Cairns in McDouall's case, 2 R. (H. L.) 55, was intended to go the length the Sheriff-substitute would carry it. The Lord Chancellor in delivering his opinion was dealing exclusively with the case of a proprietor of lands on the sea-coast, and had not before him such a case as the present. Accordingly, he speaks only of 'the sea,' and of 'a title on the part of the subjects to use the shore.' The ebb and flow of the tide may extend a mile or more up a narrow stream, the land on each side of which belongs to private owners, and it would be a startling thing to say that the public had an inalienable right to catch by single rod and line the fish therein, other than salmon and fish of the salmon kind. There is a dearth of authority on the point, but the Sheriff is of opinion that a grantee may acquire an exclusive title from the Crown to the whole fishings in such a river. In Nicol v. Blaikie, 23d December 1859, 22 D. 335, the Lord Justice-Clerk says,

The pursuer appealed. The defender took the objection that the action No. 125. was not within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, on the ground that the sub-

p. 343,—‘It is important in the present case to observe that the public right of fishing, in aid of which the shore may be used by the public, is the right of white-fishing, which is essentially juris publici, and may be exercised by any one without title, licence, or authority of any kind.’ Inasmuch as there is special reference to the sea and the rights of the public in both these cases, they cannot be taken as in any way deciding the present question, but seem to leave it entirely open. In deciding the case of Gilbertson, 5 R. p. 610, Lord Ormisdale said, p. 615,—‘As a general proposition, I take it to be clear that to fish white fish is a right common to all. Whether it may not to some extent and in certain specified places be appropriated and secured by royal grant, accompanied with immemorial use, is a question which does not seem ever to have been precisely and authoritatively determined.’ The present is a case of royal grant, accompanied by immemorial use, and, as it seems to the Sheriff, the exclusive right of fishing is claimed by the defender in such circumstances as to entitle him to have effect given to his claim.

‘The pursuer says he was fishing for yellow trout; Lord Cairns makes no reference to yellow trout in the opinion above mentioned. He deals exclusively with such white fish as inhabit the sea. If the Sheriff is correct in his views as to the defender’s rights of fishing in the Doon, then the pursuer had no right to carry on such fishing without written permission, trout-fishing being a part and pertinent of the lands adjoining the Doon, through which it flows.—See McKenzie v. Rose, 26th May 1830, 8 S. 816, and opinion of Lord Cringletie, p. 818; Carmichael v. Colquhoun, 20th November 1787, M. 9645; and Ferguson v. Sheriff, 18th July 1844, 6 D. 1363.

‘It is deserving of notice that the terms of the grant to the defender partly coincide with the terms of a similar grant to the Duke of Argyll—See Duke of Argyll v. Robertson, 17th December 1859, 22 D. 261.

‘The grant there was of ‘salmon-fishings and other fishings, as well in salt as in fresh waters.’ This, it was held, did not comprehend mussel-scalps, unless followed by exclusive possession for the prescriptive period. But in the later case of the Duchess of Sutherland v. Watson, 10th January 1868, 6 M. 199, it was held that the Crown may grant to a subject the exclusive right to mussel-scalps situated between high and low-water marks, and that a crown title to a barony with fishings in the Sands of Nigg (Cromarty) was a sufficient title on which to establish by exclusive possession for the prescriptive period an exclusive right to mussel-scalps between high and low-water marks in the said lands. Lord Cowan there reserves his opinion, as the Sheriff-substitute points out, ‘relative to white-fishing or the fishing of floating fish in the sea or along the coast or shore of the sea.’ If the Crown may grant such a right as to mussel-scalps, why not to the white-fishings within the tidal portion of the river Doon, there being reserved to the public the right of fishing at the mouth of the Doon from the shore for fish other than those of the salmon kind, and the whole shore rights of fishing.

‘The Sheriff entirely agrees with the views of the Sheriff-substitute as to the alleged footpath. It is quite clear that the public have not acquired any right of footpath along either bank of the river between Doonfoot Bridge and the sea. That the banks of the river at this point have often been frequented by pedestrians and others may be taken as certain, but they were only there on sufferance.

‘The Sheriff further agrees with the Sheriff-substitute that there is no right of access for fishing the river Doon from the public road, and that between the road and the river there is a stripe of private ground of varying breadth, from which the defender has right absolutely to exclude the public. But the Sheriff-substitute thinks there can be no practical difficulty in getting access from the sea by boats at certain stages of the tide, or from the sea-shore by wading. Possibly, when the river is high and the tide in, small boats may get up to the dam-dyke, and when the river is low and the tide out, wading may be practi-

No. 125. Mar. 18, 1887. Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa. ject in dispute exceeded the statutory value (see Sheriff Courts Act, 1877, sec. 8, quoted, supra, p. 651, note). The Court expressed doubts as to the competency of the action, and agreed to allow the action to stand over to give Bowie an opportunity of bringing an action in the Court of Session.

Bowie accordingly, on 26th May 1886, raised an action in the Court of Session against the Marquis, in which he concluded for declarator "that the pursuer, as a member of the public, has right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which are not salmon, sea trout, or whiting, or the young of salmon, sea trout, or whiting, or fish of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbs and flows, and as far as the highest point reached by ordinary spring tides, and that the defender, or anyone claiming under him, has no right to interfere with the right of the pursuer to fish as aforesaid." There was also a conclusion for interdict.

The averments of parties sufficiently appear from the foregoing narrative, but as means of access they are attended with obvious trouble and difficulty, and, in short, unless the public can get access to the water from the banks (which they cannot legally without permission), they have really no other such mode of access as would enable them to exercise their assumed right to any useful extent. Further, there is very little for the public to catch. The Sheriff is satisfied on the evidence that neither yellow trout, eels, flounders, seath, lythe, nor mullet are to be found in any considerable numbers. And, on the other hand, the presence of boats or persons wading would be highly injurious to the defender's net fishing. Boats seldom or never seem to have been used by the public for fishing purposes, and it may be taken as certain that those who fished with or without leave invariably approached the river from the banks.

"The pursuer's contention that the Doon is a navigable river is extravagant. In coming to a conclusion on this point, the Sheriff has had in view the opinions expressed in the Court of Session in the case of Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr Ewing & Company, 26th January 1877, 4 R. 350, where the Lord President says,—'But I rather think that if a river is navigable at all, and has been enjoyed and used as a navigable river by the public, the right of the public must be judged very much according to the same rule whether the river be capable of being navigated by vessels of one kind or another, by vessels of large or small dimensions.' It has not been proved that the Doon has been enjoyed and used as a navigable river by the public, and in particular it is not and never was 'fit for the transportation of the country products.'—Bell's Prin. 648; see also Erskine, 2, 6, 17. In this respect the Doon contrasts strongly with the Leven, which, it was found in Colquhoun's case, had been for a long period of time navigated by scows or gabbarts, which descended the river by the force of the current, and were towed up by horse haulage, there being a towing-path on the right bank. No doubt the defender's titles provide for the use of boats (cymbæ) in flumine de Doon, and there is not only evidence that the defender or his tenants have been in the habit of using a boat or boats when netting the river below the dam-dyke, and there is some evidence in the pursuer's proof (particularly the evidence of the witnesses Purdie, Ball, and M'Guire) that other boats have occasionally been seen on the river. But when it is remembered not only that there is a bar at the mouth of the Doon, which must seriously impede the ascent of boats, unless in certain conditions of the tide, but that the bed of the river is liable to constant silting up and other changes from floods, that boats cannot get further up than the dam-dyke, which is but a short distance from the mouth, and that it is not proved that boats have ever sailed on the Doon for any practical purpose except netting the river, the Sheriff is of opinion that there are no sufficient materials for enabling him to hold that the Doon is a navigable river."

tive of the Sheriff Court action, except that the pursuer now founded for the first time on the Acts of Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23.* No. 125.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer, as one of the public, having at common law right to fish for all floating fish not of the salmon kind in the tidal portion of the river Doon, is entitled to decree of declarator as craved, with expenses. 2. The pursuer, by virtue of the Acts of Queen Anne and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23, quoted in condescendence 2, is entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the action. 3. The right of white-fishing in the sea (including the tidal portions of rivers) being incapable of alienation by the Crown, the second plea in law for the defender should be repelled. 4. The defender having prevented, or asserted a right to prevent, the pursuer from exercising his legal right of fishing in the tidal portion of the river Doon, the pursuer is entitled to decree of interdict as concluded for, with expenses. Mar. 18, 1887.
Bowie v. Mar-
quis of Ailsa.

The defender pleaded;—1. The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. 2. The defender having in virtue of his titles, and the immemorial possession following thereon, the exclusive right to the fishings in the lower portion of the river Doon, he ought to be assoilzied. 3. The pursuer not having, as a member of the public or otherwise, any right or title to fish in the fore-said portion of the river Doon, the property of the defender, the defender should be assoilzied. 4. The Acts of Parliament quoted by the pursuer do not apply to the defender's fishings in the river Doon, in respect that (1) the said portion of said river is not within the localities mentioned in said Acts, and (2) the fish frequenting said portion of said river are not of the kinds specified in the said Acts. 5. The pursuer's averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, and his pleas untenable in law, the defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was mainly directed to the question of the range and character of the tidal influence in the Doon, which in the Sheriff Court action was held to be settled by Mr Morris' report already referred to. The pursuer adduced several witnesses, who deposed generally † that with all ordinary high tides (unless when the river was

* The Act of Queen Anne, 1705, cap. 2, entitled "An Act for advancing and establishing the Fishing Trade in and about this Kingdom," enacts,—“Her Majesty, with advice and consent of the Estates of Parliament, authorises and empowers all her good subjects of this kingdom to take, buy, and cure herring and white fish, in all and sundry seas, channels, bays, firths, lochs, rivers, &c. of this Her Majesty's ancient kingdom and islands thereto belonging, wheresoever herring or white fish are or may be taken.”

The Act 29 Geo. II. cap. 23, entitled “An Act for encouraging the Fisheries in that part of Great Britain called Scotland,” on the preamble, inter alia, that “the extending and improving of the British fishery is of great importance to this kingdom, as it not only adds considerably to the national wealth, but is moreover a fruitful nursery of able seamen for the public service,” enacts (sec. 1).—“From and after the 25th day of June 1756, all persons whatsoever, inhabitants of Great Britain, shall, and they are hereby declared to have power and authority at all times and seasons when they shall think proper, freely to take, buy from fishermen, and cure any herrings, cod, ling, or any other sort of white fish, in all and every part of the seas, channels, bays, firths, lochs, rivers, or other waters, where such fish are to be found, on the coasts of that part of Great Britain called Scotland, and of Orkney, Shetland, and all other islands belonging to that part of Great Britain called Scotland, any law, statute, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.”

† The following may be taken as samples of the pursuer's evidence on this point:—

William Shearer, cabinetmaker, Ayr, who had been acquainted with the

No. 125. in flood) the level of the water up to the dam-dyke was raised several feet, and also became more or less brackish up to the same point. The defender adduced Mr C. A. Stevenson, C.E., a partner of the firm of D. & T. Stevenson, C.E., Edinburgh, who had made experiments at the river on 22d, 23d, and 24th November 1886, the result of which, according to his evidence, was that he found the highest range of salt water, on an average high tide, to be a line C D, as marked by him on a plan, which line was about thirty feet above a line drawn across the river in continuation of the average line of ordinary spring tides along the coast, as laid down in the Ordnance Survey Map. On his plan he also marked a line A B as the line of the average of ordinary spring and neap tides. The substance of Mr Stevenson's evidence is given below, as also of David Powrie, a river bailiff, the only other important witness for the defender.*

Doon from boyhood, deponed,—“ I have had occasion to notice the tides when I have been fishing in the Doon. I always fished at low-water, and the water generally came up and put me away from the back of the dam-dyke. It got too deep for wading. There are some rocks near the dam-dyke. I was in the habit of standing on them at low-water and fishing. When the tide comes up these rocks are covered, and you have to leave them. I never saw a tide so low in the Doon that it did not get the length of the ford. All the tides I ever observed when I was fishing reached the dam-dyke. I never had difficulty in crossing the ford in a boat when the tide was full, either neap or spring. I have seen the river in summer when there was very little water in it. On these occasions the tide always, so far as I saw, came up to the dam-dyke. Cross.—When I say that the tide comes up to the dam-dyke, I mean that the salt water runs up there. It will be mixed with fresh water there, I daresay. I understand that the sea flows in up to the dam-dyke; it would flow further if it was not for the dyke. The flounders come up from the sea with the tide. (Q.) What does your understanding rest upon? (A.) The flow of the tide up the river. By the Court.—I have seen trouts coming up in front of the tide when I have been fishing, and spluttering amongst the spray, and the water come right up to the dam-dyke.”

John Burn, saw-sharper, who had lived at Ayr nearly all his life and knew the Doon well, deponed,—“ There are some rocks immediately below the dam-dyke. They are uncovered when the tide is out, unless when there is a heavy spate in the river. I have often seen these rocks covered in spring tides when I have been fishing; I have had to come off the rocks because of the tide coming up. At ordinary spring tides the water will rise about $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet up the dam-dyke or more. I never saw the water rise almost to the top of the dyke. I cannot exactly say within what distance of the top of the dyke I have seen the water; I think $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet is hardly half-way up. That is at one side of the dyke. The dyke slants downwards. I have repeatedly seen two currents in the river when the tide was flowing—the one flowing down on the top, and the other flowing up underneath. I have tasted the water below the dam-dyke; it tasted salt and brackish. I have seen it as salt there as lower down on the beach. I have noticed that about the month of August or July—in summer when the water of the Doon was low.”

* Mr Stevenson deponed that he made the investigations into the saltiness of the water on 23d and 24th November. “ The condition of the tide at the time was an average high water. . . . I discovered the point to which high water came by levelling at the sides of the river with a spirit-level, and ascertaining where the coast line was. The water of the sea comes up the channel of the river as far as the line C D—not any higher—that is, the salt water. In droughts it may of course come higher. I ascertained whether there was salt water in that part of the channel by means of a hydrometer, an instrument for determining the specific gravity of water, and a hydrophore, an instrument for obtaining water at different depths. It is necessary to get water from the bottom, as the salt water creeps up the bottom of the river. . . . The influx Except the rocks mentioned by some of the pursuer's witnesses, no part of the solum covered by the river at high-water was left uncovered at low-water, i.e. there was always water from bank to bank down at least to the bar. No. 125.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Bowie v. Marquis of Ailesa.

On the question of navigability there was evidence of the same general class as had been adduced in the Sheriff Court action, the statements there as to the depths of water at the bar and above at the various states of the of the tide affects the fresh water in the stream to a very much higher point than that to which the salt water itself reaches ; in this case as far as the dam. In the Clyde the effect of the tidal wave is felt twenty-two miles from the sea—up as far as the weir which used to be at Glasgow Green—that is, reckoning from Port-Glasgow. In the Nith the effect of the tide goes as far as Dumfries ; in the Severn it goes sixty-eight miles ; and in the Tay thirty-five miles, measuring from Dundee. In the Tay it goes up to a little below Scone Palace, four or five miles above Perth Bridge. When I say that the tide goes up as far as that, I mean that the tidal wave is propagated as far as that in fresh water. The salt water does not go up anything like that distance. In drought salt water might be got beyond the point I have indicated, but I do not consider that should be taken ; the river was neither in flood nor in drought when I took it. In drought the salt water finds its way up an abnormal distance, because there is less fresh water flowing in, and consequently less resistance. The Doon is not a navigable river ; it would be extravagant to call it so, I think. Cross-examined.—The mark C D is . . . the point to which, on an average tide, I say the salt water penetrates, assuming the tide which I observed to be an average tide. I have not made any observations regarding the length to which the salt water penetrates at ordinary spring tide. (Q.) How can you say then it won't reach the foot of the dam-dyke ? (A.) Because of the fresh water running in ; if the river were perfectly dry it would do so. I have not measured the height to which the water will rise on the dam-dyke in ordinary spring tide, but I should say about a foot or eighteen inches. (Q.) If you were told that it actually rises from two to three feet on the dam-dyke, would you have any doubt that the salt water would penetrate very nearly up as far as that ? (A.) It would not penetrate that length. If the water rises to that extent on the dam-dyke, I would attribute it to the filling in of fresh water from above. The fresh water continues to flow seaward the whole time. (Q.) Then how does it dam back ? (A.) The moment you lessen the inclination in the least, you have a rise in the surface of the water. Assuming there was no river there, the average tide would reach the dam-dyke ; it has a flow which, unless prevented, would bring it up that length. I cannot say whether there was rain previous to my making my observations, but the river did not appear to be in flood. The water was quite clear. I had never seen the Doon before. The average tide is the mean between high-water spring tides and high-water neap tides. It occurs four times a month. By the Court.—The river might be abnormally high, and yet the water quite clear. I don't think there was the normal flow of water when I saw the river ; the river was pretty full. By defender's counsel.—The two highest tides of this month were on 13th and 27th. The lowest neaps occurred on the 5th and 22d.*

Powrie deponed,—“I made daily observations [from 2d to 25th November 1886] as to the freshness or saltiness of the water. I brought the water up from the bottom of the river with a bottle. Cross.—I tested the saltiness of the water by taste. I let the bottle down to the bottom, gave it time to fill, and then drew it up. . . . I commenced my tests about 200 yards above the bar, and continued them at intervals down to the bar. I would sometimes make three tests—one 200 yards above the bar, one about 100 yards above the bar, and one on the bar.” Witness embodied the results of his observations in a table produced by him, from which it appeared that only on seven occasions had he found salt water at or above the bar, and then at distances varying from 410 to 445 yards from the dam-dyke.

* The defender's counsel at the hearing maintained that “22d,” looking to the other dates given, was an obvious blunder for “20th.”

tide being confirmed by specific details of soundings, &c. The only additional evidence of importance was that of James Dow, a witness for the pursuer, who deponed that between the years 1838 and 1848 smacks of from eight to ten tons, with corn from the island of Arran for the Alloway mill (which was about 600 yards up the river), of which his father was then lessee, had discharged at a point some way up the river, though much below the dam-dyke. This practice, witness stated, ceased after the building of a mill in Arran.

On 10th December 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares, interdicts and prohibits, in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case seeks to have it declared that he, as a member of the public, has right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish, not being salmon or fish of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbs and flows, and as far as the highest point reached by ordinary spring tides. The defender, on the other hand, claims the exclusive right to the fishings in the lower part of the Doon (that is, the part of the Doon in which the pursuer asserts his right to fish), and denies the right of the pursuer, as a member of the public, to fish there at all. He maintains, alternatively, that, in any view, the pursuer is not entitled to fish in the Doon so far up as the point to which the pursuer claims right to go.

"The river Doon flows into the sea about two miles to the south of Ayr, and is therefore one of the rivers on the coast of Scotland. Access can be had to the mouth of the Doon either by walking along the sea-shore or by boats, without trespassing upon the grounds of the defender. When the mouth of the river has been reached, it can be easily waded as far up as the dam-dyke. That the tide flows into the river is admitted, but how far up the river the flood tide goes is a matter of controversy.

"The exclusive right of fishing claimed by the defender has not, in my opinion, been made out. His title, which is a barony title, no doubt contains the words 'cum piscationibus yairis et cruives et salmonum et alborum piscium tam in aquis salsis quam dulcibus,' but upon that title there has not been any exclusive possession of white-fishing. Indeed, there is no distinct proof of any white-fishing at all by the defender in respect of that title. In these circumstances it does not appear to me to be necessary to decide whether the Crown could grant a title to white-fishing on the shore—that is, where the tide ebbs and flows—which, without possession following thereon, would exclude the public.

"The pursuer bases his right to fish for floating white fish in the part of the Doon in question upon the provisions of the Acts of Queen Anne and King George II., mentioned in the condescendence. The latter of these Acts provides that 'all persons whatsoever, inhabitants of Great Britain, shall, and they are hereby declared to have power and authority at all times and seasons, when they shall think proper, freely to take, buy from fishermen, and cure any herrings, cod, ling, or any other sort of white fish, in all and every part of the seas, channels, bays, friths, lochs, rivers, or other waters, where such fish are to be found on the coasts' of Scotland. I think there is no room to doubt that the primary, if not the sole, purpose of that Act was to encourage the trade or industry of fishing, and had no reference to fishing for sport. But although this is so, the words of the Act do not confine the privileges thereby conferred to fishermen, or persons engaged in the trade of fishing, alone; it confers them on 'all persons whatsoever, inhabitants of Great Britain,' and that without regard to the motive or purpose which leads to the use or exercise of the privilege. It follows, therefore, that the pursuer is entitled to the privilege, whatever it may be, conferred on the inhabitants of Great Britain by the statute. I think it is equally clear that he is entitled under this statute to take white fish

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The Acts of Anne and Geo. II. No. 125. did not apply here. In the first place, they did not include yellow or in the Doon, as the Doon, at least the portion of it in question, appears to me to fall within the words of the statute as a river on the coast of Scotland where such fish are to be found. Of the fact that white fish are to be found there, there can be no doubt. I agree, however, with the defender's counsel that the privilege conferred by the statute will not cover fishing for river or yellow trout. The fish referred to in the statute are 'herrings, cod, ling, or any other sort of white fish,' and in my view that means 'any sort of white fish' ejusdem generis. In a word, I think the statute only confers the privilege of catching fish which are inhabitants of the sea. I shall deal with the right to fish for trout claimed by the pursuer afterwards.

"The next question is—How far up the river is the pursuer entitled to go in exercise of his right of white-fishing? If the right to fish at all is conceded or established, I think the parties are agreed that the right may be exercised on the shore. But how far the shore extends is a question on which they are at variance. The pursuer says that the shore extends as far inland as the high-water mark of ordinary spring tides; the defender confines it to the line which marks the average between ordinary spring and ordinary neap tides. In this controversy I think the pursuer is right; Erskine (B. 2, T. 6, sec. 17) remarking that, under the Roman law, the sea-shore reached as far as the highest spring tide—(the words of Justinian are, 'quatenus hybernus fluctus maximus excurrit')—says 'It goes no further, by the custom of Scotland, than the sand over which the sea flows in common tides.' I take that to mean exactly what the pursuer contends for. The ordinary spring tide is a common tide—as distinguished from an extraordinary or uncommon tide—and therefore as distinguished from the highest spring tide or highest winter flood. So also Bell (Pr. sec. 641) describes the shore as comprehending 'all that is covered by the sea in ordinary tides—the land which lies between high and low-water mark.' Here, again, I think the word 'ordinary' is used as opposed to 'extraordinary,' and means the ordinary spring tides, not the highest spring, or the highest point reached by some unusual tidal wave. In Nicol v. Blaikie (22 D. 542), the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis speaks of the shore vested in the Crown for public uses as 'between high and low-water mark of ordinary spring tides.' The same view was in effect adopted in the case of Smith v. Officers of State, 8 D. 711. I refer especially to the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk (p. 719) and of Lord Moncreiff (p. 721).

"The defender, in support of his view, refers to the case of Attorney-General v. Chambers (23 L. J., Chan. 662), in which it was decided 'that the right of the Crown to the sea-shore is limited to the line reached by the average of the medium high tides between the spring and the neap.' No doubt that is now the law of England, but I cannot accept it as the law of Scotland in the face of the authorities which I have cited. The shore has always been regarded by the law of Scotland as limited to high-water mark, and that might mean either the mark of high-water at ordinary spring or ordinary neap tides. But there is no authority in Scotland which defines the shore as limited to a line which marks the average between these two. Nor can 'ordinary' or 'common' tides necessarily mean neap tides, for spring tides are as ordinary and common as neaps. I therefore hold that to be shore where the tide ebbs and flows up to the high-water mark of ordinary spring tides. As to the exact point reached in the Doon by ordinary spring tides I will pronounce no decision, because it is or may be a fluctuating point. A change in the conformation of the coast, or in the bed of the river, or the course of the river, might make a very material alteration on the line of high-water mark. But it may be for the convenience of parties, so long as the coast and river remain in their present condition, to have my opinion on this point, as regulating at present the rights of parties. The evidence, I think, establishes that ordinary spring tides reach the dam-dyke. Several of the pursuer's witnesses have tasted the water there, and found it brackish,—that is, saltish to some extent. Others have been driven away from

No. 125. river trout, but only sea white fish—on this point the Lord Ordinary was with the defender; and the pursuer was not entitled to use his right to fish for sea white fish, assuming that the statutes gave him such a right, as an excuse for taking yellow trout, on the ground that they were res nullius, and he legitimately fishing in the river;—his right was merely a statutory right, and he could not go beyond what the statute gave him. Secondly, the Acts did not include the stretch of river here in question. The Acts were intended to protect the fishing industry of Scotland, not to facilitate private sport, and in this stretch of 500 yards sea white fish were not to be caught in such quantities as to make them of the slightest commercial value. Salmon and fish of the salmon kind were the only fish of any value to be caught there, and even if the public did not intend to poach for these fish, it had been proved that they would do the young salmon much injury merely by fishing, though for other fish. The mention of “rivers” in the enumeration, “seas, channels,” &c., on the “coasts” of Scotland was merely intended to ensure that all the waters on the coasts of Scotland, whatever name might be given to them should be included. The “river” must be on the coast; that meant that where there was a river, so to speak, seaward of the coast line it was to be included,—that was to say, if at low-water it was uncovered, but at high-water it was covered by the tide. But (2) if the Acts did not apply,—and in any case as regarded yellow trout fishing,—the river must be a public river, if the the rocks just below the dam-dyke by the rising of the tide upon them. The witness Shearer is a good example of this kind of evidence, and he was a very clear and intelligent witness. I think this kind of evidence better than that given by Mr Stevenson and David Powrie. It is the result of a longer and more varied experience. Powrie's observations are not corroborated by anyone, and their value depends largely on the care with which he made his experiments, which were at the best of a very rough-and-ready character. The value of Mr Stevenson's experiments is detracted from by their having been confined to a single occasion, and at a time when (according to his own statement) the river was not in a normal or usual condition. I may notice, in addition to what I have already said, that on the Ordnance Survey map, prepared in 1859-60, the dam-dyke is marked as ‘the highest point to which ordinary spring tides flow,’ affording corroboration of a valuable kind to the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses.

“I come now to the question whether the pursuer is entitled to fish for trout in the part of the Doon in question. This he claims on the ground that the Doon, so far as he claims the right, is a public navigable river, and that therefore the public have a right to fish there.

“One of the defender's witnesses says—‘The Doon is not a navigable river; it would be extravagant to call it so, I think.’ I think so too, if by the Doon is meant the whole river, from its leaving Loch Doon until it reaches the sea. But the same thing might with equal propriety be said of the Clyde. The Doon, however, at the point in question is navigable, and has been navigated by boats for pleasure, and formerly was navigated by smacks taking grain to the mill, although they did not ascend higher than the fisher's house, which is a very considerable way below the dam-dyke. But in the view I take of the case, it is not necessary to determine how far the Doon is navigable, or whether it is navigable at all. According to my opinion, the ordinary spring tide, which is the limit of the shore, flows up to the dam-dyke. To that point, therefore, the river is public, and in the water which covers that part of the bed of the river I think the public have the right to fish for trout (Bell's Pr. sec. 747). That right, however, must not be exercised so as to injure the higher right of salmon-fishing, which is in the defender. I see no reason why trout-fishing should not be carried on without injury to the salmon-fishing, although there may be reason for saying that it has not always been so. If the pursuer does injury to the defender's rights, the defender has his remedy.”

pursuer was to prevail. In order that a river might be public, it must be both tidal and navigable.¹ Here it was neither. Tidal did not mean subject to tidal influence as shewn in the damming back of the fresh water.² That would include in the case of some rivers a stretch of many miles inland, and these it would be absurd to call tidal. The line at which a river ceased to be tidal was the line of the average tides of each lunar period, i.e. the average both of spring and neap tides—in the present case, Stevenson's line A B. That was the rule in England,³ and although the Lord Ordinary had held that it was the average of spring tides only in Scotland, the authorities, whose use of the expression "ordinary" tides the Lord Ordinary had misunderstood, tended the other way.⁴ At all events the highest point at which a river could be called tidal was the highest point to which the salt water extended—in the present case, the line C D of Stevenson's plan. Nor was the river navigable above the bar. "Navigable" did not mean capable of being used by small rowing boats for purposes of pleasure, it must be open to navigation for purposes of commerce; and of use of the latter class there was little evidence, and none at all for anything like the distance of the dam-dyke. The Crown Lands Act, 1866 (29 and 31 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7, shewed that the view of the public authorities when the Crown's right of foreshore was transferred to the Board of Trade, was that the crown right extended only to rivers that were tidal and navigable. (3) Even if the river up to the dam-dyke were held to be public, the Crown could competently grant an exclusive right to the white-fishings in it to a private individual,⁵ and had done so here, taking the titles as interpreted by possession, for the defender had made every use of the fishings of which they were capable, or at least which was worth while, and had excluded the public from them. There was no public access to that part of the river.

Argued for the pursuer;—The public right of taking sea white fish was on a different footing from the public right of taking yellow trout. The former depended on the Acts of Anne and George II., and on these Acts there was really no answer to the pursuer's claim, if in point of fact sea fish were to be found as high as the dam-dyke, and the evidence shewed that they were. The question whether the public had the right of trout-fishing, on the other hand, depended, mainly at least, on whether the river was public or not, though the pursuer also maintained that as he was legitimately fishing as high as the mill-dam (in the exercise of his rights under the statutes) he might keep trout if he caught any, they being res nullius. By "public river" was meant a river of which the alveus was in the Crown in trust for the public. According to the civil law every river

No. 125. was public provided it was perennial, and was a flumen not a rius,¹ which excluded burns. The law of England drew a distinction between a navigable river, which as such was public only as regarded its use of navigation, and a tidal river, of which the solum was in the Crown in trust for the public. The test of the one was navigability, of the other tidal influence, so that if a river was navigable but not under tidal influence its bed was not public property, but if it was under tidal influence, though not navigable, the bed was public property. Even when "navigable" was used as convertible with "public," that really meant "tidal," and a tidal river was prima facie navigable, and actual navigation need not be proved, if the river was fit for navigation. The American law was the same.² The law of Scotland also now recognised the same distinction between rivers merely navigable and tidal rivers,³ but did not limit, as English law did, the crown right to the average of both spring and neap tides. The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the test was the average of the ordinary spring tides. Now, here there could be no doubt that the Doon was up to the dam-dyke both navigable and tidal. It had been navigated not only by pleasure boats, but by a steamer and also by trading smacks, and it could not be disputed that the tide flowed up to the dam-dyke in this sense, that through the influence of the tide the level of the water there was periodically raised and lowered whether the salt water itself actually went so high or not. But even Stevenson admitted that but for the resistance of the fresh water the salt water would have gone up that length, and the pursuer's witnesses, who were people who had long known the locality, and had caught fish of salt water species in the disputed stretch of water, were clear that the salt water reached the dam-dyke. Stevenson, who with Powrie alone spoke to the contrary, based his evidence on the experience of a single day, when he admitted that there was a heavy volume of fresh water, which would keep the tide back, and according to the print of the evidence a neap tide. Besides, even Stevenson stated that his line of highest salt water was taken on the basis of an average tide, not on that of an ordinary spring tide—as it should have been if the Lord Ordinary's law on that point was sound. These being the facts, the river up to the dam-dyke was a public river.⁴ Then as regarded the defenders' claim on his titles to an exclusive property in the white-fishings, if the river was within the Acts that was a conclusive answer to the pursuer's claim, for the Acts unambiguously made such crown grants incompetent. If, however, the river was public merely, but not within the Acts, then even if the Crown could competently grant an exclusive right to white-fishings in a public river (which the pursuer disputed) the defender's title was not in terms exclusive, and had not been interpreted to be so by possession. Indeed, as far as the evidence went, he had had no possession of the white-fishings at all. By English law all grants by the Crown to private persons of public rivers were bad unless made prior to Magna Charta.⁵

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There has been a good deal of procedure in this case, and some difference of opinion among the Judges who have had to consider it. It began with a petition in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire, praying to have it found and declared "that the pursuer, as a member of the public, has an undoubted right and privilege of fishing with single rod and line for trout, No. 125. flounders, eels, and all other fish which are not salmon, sea trout, and whiting, Mar. 18, 1887. or the young of salmon, sea trout, and whiting, in the river Doon, at least Bowle v. Mar- in that part of it within the tidal influence of the sea." After a proof quis of Ailsa. of considerable length, the Sheriff-substitute decided in favour of the petitioner. That judgment was recalled by the Sheriff, whose judgment came before your Lordships by appeal. After hearing parties on the appeal, and having some difficulty as to the competency of dealing with such questions as are here raised for decision in an application to the Sheriff, your Lordships thought that it would be desirable that a declarator should be brought in this Court, and accordingly it has been brought, and the conclusion of the summons in this case is substantially to the same effect as in the Sheriff Court action,—“That the pursuer, as a member of the public, has right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which are not salmon, sea trout, or whiting, or the young of salmon, sea trout, or whiting, or fish of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbs and flows, and as far as the highest point reached by ordinary spring tides.”

It was contended on the part of the pursuer that as long as he confines himself to fishing for white fish, he is entitled to fish anywhere in the river Doon where white fish can be found within the salt water of the sea, and he founds his contention upon two Acts of Parliament of Queen Anne and Geo. II. for the encouragement of white-fishing in Scotland, which certainly give a right to fish for white fish wherever they can be found on the “coasts” of Scotland. The pursuer says further that the Doon at that part of it to which this complaint relates is a public river, and not private property, that the tide ebbs and flows within those limits, and that the solum belongs not to the Marquis of Ailsa, but to the Crown, and therefore that the Marquis of Ailsa has no right to prohibit the pursuer in the exercise of his right to fish for white fish.

The Marquis of Ailsa, on the other hand, says that his titles give him not only right to the solum of both banks of the stream down to a point considerably below the place in question, but also the sole and exclusive right to the fishings of all kinds, both white-fishing and salmon-fishing, and if that contention is well founded the Marquis of Ailsa's right must necessarily exclude the right of the pursuer. The Marquis of Ailsa says besides that the river is neither tidal nor navigable at that part, and that the real object of the proceedings on the part of the pursuer is to obtain the authority of the Court to fish within these limits in order that he may fish for sea trout, whiting, and fish of that kind under pretence of fishing for white fish; that there are no white fish in that part of the river, and nothing that would tempt a man to go there except the opportunity of obtaining that other and illegal kind of fishing. The Marquis of Ailsa says further—and I think that this is a very material part of the case—that there are no means of access to the fishings in question without trespassing upon his private property. It is said on the part of the pursuer that the water may be reached by a public footpath which runs on the north side, or by a public road running upon the south side. Lord Ailsa contends that he is proprietor of the ground between the high road and the river, and that the other access is a private footpath.

These are the questions which your Lordships have to consider. Undoubtedly they touch upon some very important principles of law in regard to property in

No. 125. the sea and in a river. I shall state the opinion I have formed as shortly as I can.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Bowie v. Mar-
quis of Ailsa.

In the first place, I am quite clear that the Acts of Parliament referred to do not affect this case, and are not meant to affect any question about private property in a tidal stream. They are meant to apply to sea-fishings, and to provide protection for the public in carrying on an important article of commerce without interruption. The case of M'Douall, 2 R. (H. of L.) 55, referred to in the Sheriff's note, was a case of that sort, and Lord Cairns' observation was necessarily directed to sea-fishing only. It certainly never was intended to do more than to give a right to the public to fish on the "coasts," as the Act expresses it; and I do not apprehend that the banks of a river, although subject to tidal influence, come within that description.

In the second place arises the important question, whether the river is tidal at the point here in dispute. But before I say a few words upon that subject, I think it not immaterial to see how this question arose, because this may throw a good deal of light upon the real objects of the action, as well as upon the real rights of the parties, and the state of the possession which it is proposed to subvert. The Marquis of Ailsa's titles give him the bank of the river on each side, and also the fishings, and his possession has been, as far as I can see, exclusive, because although it is quite true that some of the public have been in the habit of fishing in part of the stream at the mouth, this was done uniformly by the permission of either Lord Ailsa or his tacksman. This very pursuer himself had such a written permission dated in 1879, which was a clear acknowledgment of Lord Ailsa's right. In this way the state of possession when this question arose was that Lord Ailsa had exclusive right to the whole fishing in the Doon, and that the public fished there only by permission or by trespass. The way in which the question arose was by the pursuer being found by the keepers of Lord Ailsa fishing with a rod and line above the place which he alleges is the ordinary high-water mark—that is to say, above the Doonfoot dam. He endeavoured to escape in the first place. He had some fish in his bag, and he threw these out, but one was taken, and it turned out to be a whiting, not a white fish. He was taken to the police-office, gave a false name, but at last gave his real name; and when he was examined I see that even then he fenced with the question whether it was not a whiting which had been taken by the police. So that the whole conduct of the pursuer shows that he was quite aware that he had been so far trespassing. His conduct, I think, indicates that his real object was not to fish for white fish, but to fish for fish of the salmon kind. That was the object which the pursuer had in view when he brought this action.

The main question in this case is, as I have already said, as to whether this is a tidal river at the point in dispute. The Lord Ordinary holds that it is, and it is quite true that the influence of the tide extends beyond the point contended for by Lord Ailsa in this case. That is to say, the rising of the tide affects the level of the fresh water flowing to the sea. But this must take place in every case where fresh water meets salt water, and the salt water is under the influence of the tide. Without going into the evidence I think it is sufficient to say that the salt water, in my opinion, ceases at a point considerably below the Doonfoot dam, which I take to be the terminus contended for by the pursuer. Of course the hydrostatic effect of raising the level of the salt water through the action of the tide is to raise also the level of the fresh water, which is obstructed by the higher level to which the salt water has ascended; but I think that the result of the evidence is that no salt water, or at least no material saline quality in the water is to be found at Doonfoot dam-dyke, or considerably below it. Now, upon this matter a great deal of legal lore has been expended in other cases, but I do not think that the question has ever arisen as to whether the fact that fresh water has had its level raised through the influence of the tide constitutes it to the extent to which that rising has taken place a part of the sea. I think it does not. The dicta which have been cited from cases relating to the sea margin only have no real bearing upon the question which we have here. I therefore think that in this case the high-water mark of ordinary spring tides is to be found as marked upon the Ordnance Survey, and as it is reproduced in the plans by Mr Stevenson, C.E., put into process, and that the tide does not extend beyond; that in the portion of the river between that point and the Doonfoot dam-dyke there is no salt water, or substantially none; and that the raising of the fresh water by the operation of the obstructing tide is not of itself a sufficient test to shew where the public right in the river ends. No. 125.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Bowie v. Mar-
quis of Ailsa.

If I am right in that, there is no doubt that both upon principle and on the evidence which was led in the Court below, and also before the Lord Ordinary, there is substantially an end of this case, because it follows that the river above the point to which I have alluded is the private property of Lord Ailsa, and not public in any sense. In regard to the question of navigability, I do not think there is any pretext whatever for saying that this is a navigable river. According to the evidence of perhaps the strongest witness for the pursuer on that matter, while he says that there used to be smacks with corn going up the Doon/ he admits that there have been none such for the last forty years. Clearly, it is impossible that your Lordships should hold that this is a public navigable river used as such by the public. I think, further, that the banks of the river are the property of Lord Ailsa. The public have no right to the private foot-path on the north side, and there are no means of getting at the water from the public road on the south except by trespassing upon the bank. It is said, and said quite truly, that boats could reach the point in question, but I apprehend that what I have said, if sound, leads to the result that the channel of the river is private property. The impression made upon my mind is that the view taken by the Sheriff in the Court below in the appeal case is the right one; and although the Lord Ordinary has stated his views with ability and force, I do not think that they are sound. I think that the substantial fallacy which pervades the Lord Ordinary's views is simply this, that although perfectly sound as applied to any question of sea margin, they cannot be applied to the junction of river and sea. Upon the whole matter I am for recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzieing the defender.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I concur exactly in all that your Lordship has said, and I agree generally with the Sheriff in the opinion expressed by him in the Sheriff Court action. It is quite clear, and I have no doubt about it, that the public have a right to fish for white fish in the sea; if it were necessary that I should do so, I should say that they have that right irrespective altogether of the Acts of Anne and Geo. II., which were passed to promote the fishing industry in Scotland; but I agree with your Lordship that the river Doon is no part of the sea. It runs into the sea, but it is not the sea. Nor do I

No. 125. think that it is a river of the kind or class to which the statutes refer. There are rivers in Scotland, as we know, which have estuaries opening out gradually until they really become sea, finishing their course through sand which on either side is uncovered at low water. The Doon is not a river of that kind at all. It is a river with a distinct narrow alveus or channel, very much like a creek, only that it contains fresh water which fills it from bank to bank, and leaves no part dry at any state of the tide. Three or four hundred yards from where the river enters the Firth of Clyde there is a dam, and to talk about the river being a navigable river is out of the question. There is private cultivated property on either bank belonging to Lord Ailsa up to the dam, and beyond the dam no navigation can possibly proceed. Nor does it affect the question, in my opinion, that there is tidal influence here. There is tidal influence in every mere creek. If there is a lower level, the tide, as it rises, will pass into it and fill it up, be it creek, burn, or anything else. A mere pipe conveying fresh water into the sea is as good an illustration as anything else. When the tide flows it will stop the current of the fresh water and dam it back, and possibly in some cases the salt water may contend successfully with the fresh, and give a salt flavour to it. But in many cases that is not so; the tide merely serves to dam back the fresh water; and that is tidal influence. This, then, is not a public river, but a private river as distinguished from a public navigable river, and the fishing industry of Scotland is not to be prosecuted there. "The fishing industry of Scotland" is, no doubt, a very general expression, but according to the statutes, taking the later of them, it applies to herrings, cod, ling, or any other white fish, to the fishing for these in the sea, and to taking measures upon the sea-coast for curing them. Now, a man detected poaching here in the river Doon—possibly a representative poacher with others at his back—appeals to these statutes, and to what I shall assume to be the common law, giving the public a right to fish for white fish in the sea, and brings this action, and I should like to call attention to the conclusions of his summons. The Lord Ordinary in his note says,—“The fish referred to in the statute are ‘herrings, cod, ling, or any other sort of white fish,’ and, in my view, that means ‘any sort of white fish’ ejusdem generis. In a word, I think the statute only confers the privilege of catching fish which are inhabitants of the sea.” Now, observe the conclusions of the summons, in terms of which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced decree. The pursuer asks the Court to declare that “the pursuer, as a member of the public, has right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which are not salmon,” and so on. Why limit it to single rod and line? Is that the way in which herring, cod, and ling are fished for? If this is a place to which the statute applies, the pursuer is entitled to fish with the net, or in any other way that may be practised in order to take herring or cod or ling, or any other fish that are inhabitants of the sea. Single rod and line is all very well for such poaching as the pursuer was detected in, and which he intends to continue if he has this right declared in his favour, but it is an odd idea in herring-fishing. Therefore this judgment of declarator of a right on the pursuer's part to fish with single rod and line is rather singular when contrasted with the Act of Parliament upon which the Lord Ordinary founds. But I need say no more. We all know instances in which the tide has an influence—even a greater influence than here—upon streams not of great magnitude flowing through ornamental parks enclosed with walls. These are not public navigable rivers because the tide flows up them for a short distance, or because a boat can be floated upon them. I think that there has been some misapprehension of the law applicable to white-fishing in the sea, and about the character of the rivers to which these Acts apply. My opinion is that in the declarator the defences ought to be sustained, and the defender assoilzied, with expenses, and that in the Sheriff Court action, if it is before us, the appeal ought to be dismissed, and the judgment of the Sheriff affirmed, also with expenses.

quis of Ailsa.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in all that your Lordship and Lord Young have said. I think that the Doon from its source till it meets the sea is a private river, and it appears to me that it meets the sea only at the point up to which the high-water of ordinary spring tides rises along the shore. No doubt there are many cases in which it may be said that the river still exists after it has met the sea. The present is not of that class at all. There is here but one channel, and that is covered as well at low-water as at high. If it had been the case that at low-water there was left on either side of the channel what would be called shore, then the river would have had its channel, and the rest would have been part of the sea. As it is, the channel is the channel of the river only, and is not a part and pertinent of the sea. I think the judgments proposed are in accordance both with the law and the facts of the case, and ought to be pronounced.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I am clear that the river Doon between Doonfoot Bridge and the high-water mark of ordinary spring tides is a private river in all essential respects, and is in no sense a public navigable river. I therefore think that the Acts of Parliament do not apply to it in so far as between these two points, because it is not there a river in the sense of these statutes upon the coasts of Scotland. That being so, I have no difficulty in concurring in the judgments which your Lordships propose to pronounce.

IN the Court of Session action, the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; sustained the defences; and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.

IN the Sheriff Court action, the Court pronounced this interlocutor: —“Find in fact (1) that the Doon is not a public river, and is not tidal nor navigable; (2) that the defender, the Marquis of Ailsa, is proprietor of the alveus and banks at the point where it reaches the sea, and thence upwards to the Doonfoot Bridge; (3) that under his titles the said defender has right to the whole fishings in that portion of the river, and for time immemorial has had exclusive possession and use thereof: Find in law that neither the pursuer nor any other member of the public is entitled to fish in the said part of the river without leave obtained from the said defender: Therefore sustain the defences: Of new assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.”

JAMES COWAN, Claimant (Reclaimant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Sym.

HENRY COWAN, Claimant (Respondent).—Pearson—Hay.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Intestacy.—A direction by a testator to convert will not affect the legal rights of the heir in heritage or the heirs in mobilibus, unless the succession is given to some other person.

A trustor, by trust-deed and settlement, directed his trustees (1) to pay his debts; (2) to deliver to his wife his furniture and personal effects; and (3) "as soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate and effects, and divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof in such manner" as he might direct by any writing under his hand. By subsequent codicil he directed his trustees "to dispose of the nett proceeds" of his estate "as follows:—To my widow an annuity as long as she lives of £70." He further left legacies to a considerable extent. At the death of the widow, and after the purposes of the trust were all fulfilled, the moveable estate was exhausted, but the heritable estate remained unsold. In a competition between the heir-at-law and the next of kin held (1) that the direction of the testator to realise the estate must be held to have been carried out, and (2) that the balance of the fund thus formed, after payment of the annuity and legacies, fell to be divided as intestate succession between the heir in heritage and the heirs in mobilibus in the proportions in which the fund had been derived from the testator's heritable and moveable estates respectively.

1st Division. DANIEL COWAN, merchant, Broughty-Ferry, died on 19th December 1881.
Lord Trayner. without issue, but survived by his wife, Mrs Isabella Drummond or Cowan.

By trust-disposition, dated 29th December 1880, he disposed to and in favour of his wife, David Scott Cowans, and others, as trustees for the ends, uses, and purposes therein specified, All and Whole his estate, heritable and moveable. He further appointed his trustees to be his sole executors.

The trust purposes were "(First), To pay all my just and lawful debts, sickbed and funeral charges, including suitable mournings to my said spouse, should she survive me, and the expenses of carrying these presents into effect; (Second), To deliver over to the said Mrs Isabella Drummond or Cowan, immediately after my death, in the event of her surviving me, my whole household furniture, personal and other effects whatsoever, within or about my dwelling-house at the time of my death. and (Lastly), As soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate and effects, and divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof in such a way and manner, and to and amongst such parties as I may direct by any writing under my hand, though not holograph or tested, found lying by me, or in the custody of any other person for my behoof, and which shall be construed with and form part hereof, notwithstanding it may be of an informal nature; and I hereby declare that my said trustees, or those to be assumed by them, besides the powers, privileges, and exemptions conferred on them by statute as gratuitous trustees, shall have full power to dispose of my said estate and effects, either by public roup or private bargain, in such lots and at such prices as my said trustees shall think proper, and generally, in the execution hereof, shall only be bound to act as honourable men."

He further left ten holograph codicils, the first of which was in these terms:—"I, Daniel Cowan, merchant in Broughty-Ferry, and residing there, desire the trustees under my settlement to dispose of the nett proceeds of my estate and effects as follows:—To my widow, an annuity as long as she lives, of £70, payable quarterly in advance, beginning as on the day of my death, for the quarter then commencing, as witness my hand at Broughty-Ferry, Oct. 26, 1880."

By the other codicils he left five legacies of £100 each, and four No. 126.
legacies of £50 each, to persons therein named, of which legacies to the amount of £450 were to be paid at his wife's death, the rest at his own.

Mar. 19, 1887.
Cowan v.
Cowan.

The trustees accepted office, and ingathered and realised the whole estate with the exception of the heritable property, being house property at Broughty-Ferry.

The annuity of £70 was paid to the widow till her death on 3d May 1884.

The whole of the legacies, and all debts due by the deceased were paid and also the expenses of the trust down to 23d April 1886.

The whole estate (other than the heritable property), together with the income of the moveable and heritable property, was exhausted by these payments, and a balance was at that date due to the trustees of £14, 16s.

In these circumstances, disputes having arisen between James Cowan, the truster's heir-at-law, and his next of kin as to the disposal of the heritable property (which was valued at £350), or of the proceeds thereof, the surviving trustees, on 3d June 1886, raised an action of multiple-poining, in which they called James Cowan, the heir-at-law, and the next of kin, as defenders.

James Cowan claimed the whole fund in medio, and pleaded ;—(1) On a just construction of the trust-disposition and settlement, and codicils of the said Daniel Cowan, the heritable property thereby conveyed to his trustees is not converted, and separatim the trustees' power to sell not having been exercised, the same remains heritable, and passes, in the circumstances stated, to the claimant as his heir-at-law. (2) The heritable estate remaining unsold, and the whole debts and legacies directed by the truster to be paid having been satisfied, the trustees, real raisers, are bound to convey the said heritable estate to the truster's heir-at-law.

He pleaded ;—(1) On a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils of the said Daniel Cowan, the said heritable estate falls to be realised by the trustees, and is divisible among the truster's next of kin. (2) The whole estate having been conveyed by the truster with a direction of sale and realisation for division, the same falls to be realised by the trustees, and after defraying the balance of trust debt and expenses, falls to be divided among the truster's next of kin as his heirs in mobilibus.

On 9th November 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the property in Broughty-Ferry, which forms the fund in medio in the present process, is to be regarded and dealt with as moveable succession : Therefore repels the claim by James Cowan, as heir-at-law of the truster, and finds him liable in the expenses of process, so far as incurred in the competition between him and the claimant Henry Cowan." *

* " OPINION.—The late Daniel Cowan, by his trust-disposition and settlement, conveyed the whole of his estate, heritable and moveable, to the pursuers as trustees. The estate so conveyed, with the exception of a small property at Broughty-Ferry, was moveable. The purposes of the trust were as follows :—The truster appointed his trustees (1) to pay debts, including the expenses of the trust ; (2) to deliver to his widow the household furniture and other effects in his dwelling-house ; and (3) 'as soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate and effects, and divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof, in such way and manner and to and amongst such parties' as he might direct by any writing under his hand. By subsequent testamentary writings he directed payment to be made of the annuity to his widow, and of the legacies mentioned in the summons.

Cowan v.
Cowan.

The claimant James Cowan reclaimed, and argued;—The view of the Lord Ordinary was that, where there was a direction to sell, that of itself

“The trustees realised the estate, except the property in Broughty-Ferry, and have paid the annuity (the annuitant is now dead) and the legacies as directed. The heritable property is still in their hands, and the present action is brought to determine to whom that property belongs. The claimant James Cowan, the heir-at-law of the truster, claims it, on the ground that it has not been disposed of by the truster, and that, being heritage, it falls to him. The claimant Henry Cowan claims one-fourth of the fund in medio, as one of the truster's next of kin, on the ground that the property in question must, quoad this succession, be regarded and dealt with as moveable. This he does on the ground (1) that the truster directed the sale of the property, which operated conversion; or otherwise (2) that the truster gave a power of sale, and that the exercise of that power was necessary to the execution of the trust, which also operated conversion. The heir-at-law maintains, on the other hand, that there is no direction to sell, and that sale was not necessary to the execution of the trust.

“(1) I am of opinion that the trust-deed contains a direction to sell the heritage. After directing his trustees to deliver the household furniture to his widow, the truster directs (the word used is ‘appoint,’ but that means the same thing) his trustees ‘as soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate’—that is, everything conveyed to the trustees beyond the household furniture, ‘and to divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof,’ as he should subsequently direct. The word ‘realise,’ in its ordinary and popular sense—in which sense I think the truster must be held to have used it—is ‘to convert into money.’ I therefore come to the conclusion that when the truster directed his trustees to convert his estate into money, he expressly directed the sale of his heritage, as it could only be converted into money by a sale. The words ‘divide and pay over’ do not of themselves imply a direction to sell, because division and paying over may be accomplished by a conveyance to the beneficiaries pro indiviso. Yet when, in addition to these words, you have the others to be found in this deed, it becomes, I think, plain that what was to be divided and paid is money, and not the estate in forma specifica. The direction is to divide and pay over ‘the nett proceeds’ of the estate. Now the proceeds of the estate is not the estate itself, but that which it has produced by the realisation on sale thereof, after deducting the expenses of sale. I think, farther, that the intention of the truster that his heritage should be sold, appears farther from the fact that the whole of the benefits conferred by him on the beneficiaries are payments of money. The whole purpose of his settlement (with the exception of that which has regard to the household furniture) is that his trustees shall pay money. They are to pay his debts, pay the widow's annuity, pay the legacies. They are not even directed to hold the heritage in security of the annuity. They are to get the whole estate into their hands in money, and therewith to pay the annuity and legacies at the time and to the persons as directed.

“It is said that the direction I have referred to cannot be so read, because the settlement in a later clause confers a power of sale, which is superfluous if a direction to sell had already been given. I think a mere power of sale after a direction to sell would have been superfluous; but superflua non nocent. Still, as a seeming contradiction or inconsistency, this subsequent power of sale deserves notice. The alleged inconsistency disappears, I think, when the clause is fairly read. It declares that the trustees, ‘besides the powers’ conferred by statute on gratuitous trustees, ‘shall have full power to dispose of my said estate and effects, either by public roup or private bargain, in such lots and at such prices as my said trustees shall think proper.’ I pass over the fact that this is one to a great extent merely of style. Being there, it must receive effect. But, to my mind, it only adds to the direction already given—a power to the trustees to sell, according to their discretion, by public roup or private bargain, at such prices and in such lots as they may think proper. In short, I read this clause not so much as conferring a power of sale, as conferring a discretion on nade the succession moveable, and conferred rights on the next of kin No. 126.

to the exclusion of the heir. But this was not so, unless the estate was not only directed to be sold but given away from the heir. The whole move- Mar. 19, 1887.

the annuity, &c., and a balance of the whole estate—viz., the house pro- Cowan.
perty—being left, it was conceded that the estate was affected by those debts and legacies, according to the quality of the estate and the quality of the debts. The heir would be liable to pay the annuity, or at least so much of it as the testator had not, by directing the legacies to remain unpaid till the widow's death, laid by implication on the moveables, but he was not liable for other debts or legacies, which primarily fell on next of kin, whom there was nothing in the settlement to relieve. Alternatively, the direction here amounted to a direction to the trustees to mass the estate, and pay the legacies, annuity, &c., out of the massed estate indiscriminately. Now, if there was no indication to the contrary in the deed, the annuity would, from its nature, naturally fall on the veritable property, but after bearing its burden of that annuity the heritage, or the price obtained for it, belonged to the heir-at-law. He admitted that during the continuance of the trust the moveable property had borne burdens which properly fell on the heritage, and he was willing to recoup that to those entitled to the moveables. On the heir-at-law paying this sum, he was entitled to obtain a conveyance of the heritage unsold. The two kinds of estate should bear the burden rateably. The direction to sell did not convert the heritage, nor cut out the heir-at-law and substitute the next of kin. A testator could not, by a mere direction the trustees to carry out the sale already directed in such mode as they think best.

"If this view of the truster's settlement is sound, the direction to sell operated conversion, and the claim of the heir-at-law is excluded.

"(2) But assuming that there was no direction to sell, but merely a power of sale, I am of opinion that conversion was operated, because the exercise of the power was indispensable to the execution of the trust.

"The first purpose of the trust was to pay the truster's debts, &c., 'and the expenses of carrying these presents into effect.' After paying the annuity, the legacies, and the expenses of the trust management up to 23d April 1886, there was a debt due to the trustees, to the extent of about £15, 'to which will fall to be added the expense of the present action, and of winding up the trust.'
This debt and these expenses fall to be provided out of the trust-estate, and to be paid out of that trust-estate by the trustees. The only part of the trust-estate still in the hands of the trustees is the property now in question. Accordingly, out of that property the trustees must provide the money to meet the debt and expenses I have mentioned. They can only do this by selling the property, for they have no power to borrow. Indeed, it is only because the trustees advanced funds of their own that they were able to fulfil the trust purposes up to the 23d April last. If they had not so advanced their own funds, the property would of necessity have been sold before now to enable them to fulfil the trust purposes. The sale of the property is therefore indispensable to the execution of the trust.

"I do not take into account as of any moment the readiness of the heir-at-law to refund the trustees the amount of their advances, and to pay the expenses of the action. He is under no obligation to do so, and probably would not offer to do so if he was not thereby, by a payment of £50 or £60, to secure to himself a property worth £350. But the trustees are not directed to take a donation from the heir-at-law; nor, if they did, can they thereby affect the legal rights of the next of kin.

"On both the grounds stated, I am of opinion that the property which forms the fund in medio must be regarded and dealt with as moveable."

No. 126. of that kind, disinherit his heir; he could only put heritage past the heir by giving it beneficially to someone else,¹ which he had not done here. Lord Deas' opinion in Gardner v. Ogilvy, which was adverse to this view, was a solitary opinion in favour of the argument of the next of kin, and had found no favour elsewhere. In the case of Dick v. Gillies,² the opinions of the Court were very divided, and besides this question was never raised there, as that was a case of heritable or moveable in the estate of a beneficiary. In English law, where estates were massed and legacies and annuities were paid out of the massed estate and a balance was left, it was held that the two estates must contribute rateably.³ In the case of Bowie v. Bowie,⁴ the view contended for by the claimant was assumed as the law. The question came to be whether the testator had expressly directed that the estate should be massed, and that all the burdens should be paid out of the massed fund irrespective of where the fund came from, and that the balance should be moveable. It required very strong words to shew that,⁵ and there were none such here. The word "realise" was simply inserted to insure easier division and payment, and not with any such marked intention as to lay on heritage what were properly burdens on moveable estate.

Argued for the next of kin;—The question was whether the testator meant the succession, though in his lifetime heritable in form, to go to heirs or executors. He distinctly directed that the heritage should be sold, and that being so, the effect upon succession was precisely the same as if he had sold it himself.⁶ The trustees were bound to convert to meet the annuity, as the payment was to be out of the nett proceeds. The annuity was a burden on heritage, and therefore the heritage should have been sold and applied so far as it would go in paying the burden.⁷ After the fund produced by the heritage was exhausted, the executors would then, of course, have to go on to exhaust the moveable estate. In Dick v. Gillies the question, though it rose as regarded the succession of a beneficiary, did not rise owing to her having succeeded under the trust-deed, but ab intestato as here. Neither in the case of Finnie's Trustees, nor in that of Neilson v. Stewart, was any doubt thrown upon the authority of Dick v. Gillies, as was generally alleged. In the latter case it was not even mentioned. The claimant here did not argue that the trust-deed amounted to a clear disinherison of the heir, but the words used necessarily amounted to a preference for the next of kin.

No. 126.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr Daniel Cowan, on 29th September 1880, executed a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees nominated therein, whom he also appointed his executors. He appoints them (First), “To pay all my just and lawful debts, sickbed and funeral charges, including suitable mournings to my said spouse, should she survive me, and the expenses of carrying these presents into effect; (Second), To deliver over to the said Mrs Isabella Drummond or Cowan, immediately after my death, in the event of her surviving me, my whole household furniture, personal and other effects whatsoever, within or about my dwelling-house at the time of my death; and (Lastly), As soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate and effects, and divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof in such way and manner, and to and amongst such parties as I may direct by any writing under my hand, though not holograph or tested, found lying by me, or in the custody of any other person for my behoof, and which shall be construed with and form part hereof, notwithstanding it may be of an informal nature; and I hereby declare that my said trustees, or those to be assumed by them, besides the powers, privileges, and exemptions conferred on them by statute as gratuitous trustees, shall have full power to dispose of my said estate and effects, either by public roup or private bargain, in such lots and at such prices as my said trustees shall think proper, and generally in the execution hereof, shall only be bound to act as honourable men.” Now, I think it right, in the first instance, to consider what would have been the effect of that deed if the testator had died immediately after making it and without executing the further deed he contemplated. I do not think it is doubtful what the effect would have been. There is no doubt that he directs his trustees to realise his estate, and to divide and pay over the residue thereof as directed. As I understand the Lord Ordinary’s ground of judgment, the effect of that, in his view, would be to convert his heritable estate into moveable, and in the event of the heritable property remaining unsold, it would be given to his executors instead of to his heir-at-law. I cannot concur in that view. If that deed stood alone it could not, in my opinion, have the effect of disinheriting the heir-at-law, and just as little could it interfere with the rights of the heir in mobilibus as regards the executry estate. In short, the rule of law is clearly established, that to disinherit the heir, or to defeat the executor, it is necessary not only so to deal with the estate as to effect conversion, but to give it to some other person. So I think if this deed had stood alone it would only have been effectual as a direction to pay the testator’s debts, and to give his widow the whole furniture, &c., as a specific legacy. On this point I entirely agree in the law stated by Lord Curriehill in the case of Gardner v. Ogilvy (20 D. 105), and by Lord Neaves in Neilson v. Stewart (22 D. 646).

But Mr Cowan did execute a codicil or codicils, in which he gave several legacies to various people, and provided an annuity to his widow of £70 per annum.

If these bequests had been sufficient to exhaust the entire estate, no question would have arisen for dispute; but the estate is not exhausted. There is a balance left, and to the extent of that balance the testator died intestate. The question then comes to be, how is that balance to be disposed of? It does not affect the question what the amount of that balance is. If Mr Cowan had only

No. 126. left one small legacy, and had left the great bulk of his property to the question would have been exactly the same. The principle. But so far as the trustor's intentions can receive effect, the directions in the original deed. Those directions are that the trustees are to realise and divide and pay over the residue of the estate, and to mass the proceeds together. The words "realise and pay over" are important. They plainly mean that the main purpose of division. The object, and the only object of the estate shall be the more easily divisible. The heritable estate, point of fact, been realised, but that is of no importance, for the given directions (as he was quite entitled to do) to his trustees to mass his whole estate together, we must, according to the principles of trust law, hold that that has been done which he directed to be done.

Cowan.

In these circumstances the undisposed of residue is just as much an estate in which, in consequence of the non-disposal of it, there is an interest who would have had an interest if the entire estate had been disposed of—that is to say, the heir and the executors. It seems to me that the realisation of the heritable estate was not necessary to pay the residue; the interest of the heir is not ousted, and so far as the executor's right is concerned for the purpose of enabling the trustees to pay the legacies, his right is not affected. The right of the heir and that of the executor if the estate had been entirely undisposed of would have corresponded to the respective values of the two estates. As it happens, the moveable estate was the more valuable, and the interest of the heir in the case of total intestacy would have been less than that of the executor; and it appears to me that the way in which the balance falls to be divided is to be ascertained by taking into account the relative value of the two kinds of estate before they were disposed of, or before they were disposed of, for the purposes of the trust; and therefore the proportion of the balance is to be divided between the heir and the executor must be in proportion to the proportionate value of the two estates. I therefore propose to make findings to this effect, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to effect to them.

LORD MURE.—The circumstances of this case are peculiar, and it is not to be disposed of according to the general rules applicable to the conversion of heritable estate into moveable estate. Here the main deed is blank as to the disposal of any of the property of the testator, excepting as regards his furniture, and, therefore, if there had been no additional deed, the whole estate would have gone to the heir-at-law. I think, however, that the rule of law referred to by Lord Curriehill, as stated by Lord Curriehill and Lord Neaves in the cases of Graham v. Neilson, is well founded, and that the direction here amounts to a direction to realise the whole estate and mass it together for the payment of the annuity. When I first applied my mind to the case I thought it was an occasion for the application of the rule laid down in the case of Wallace, 8 D. 1038, in which it was held that, as an annuity is heritable, it falls to be charged on heritage, and legacies, being in the nature of moveables, fall to be charged to the moveable estate. If that rule were applied it would probably leave the heir and the executor in much the same position as they will be in as the result of the course proposed by your Lordships, and I therefore concur in that proposal.

quite entire. —The balance of the estate which is not disposed of belongs to the heir, as to heritage and the heirs in moveables respectively. As to the proportion to be divided, that is a question of intention. The undisposition here is quite clear, viz., that the whole estate shall be realised and out of the massed fund, and that out of the massed fund the legacies and annuity shall be paid without distinction. The testator did not mean that what would naturally fall on the heritable estate should be paid out of heritable, and that what naturally fall on the moveable estate should be paid out of moveables.
In my opinion, that the legacies and annuity should be paid integrally out of the whole massed fund. The result is that, if, as is the case here, there is a balance over, we must ascertain to what extent the heritable estate has been contributed by the heritable estate, and to what extent the moveable, and then there will be division according to the proportions of the two funds contributed to the whole.

COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that under the trust-disposition, settlement, and codicils of Daniel Cowan, the trustees were entitled and bound to realise the whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the purpose of division among the legatees and annuitants named in the codicil: Find that, although the heritable estate has not in fact been converted into money, it must, for the purposes of the present competition, be held to have been so converted:
Find that there is residue of the entire estate, heritable and moveable, undisposed of, and that, quoad said residue, the testator died intestate: Find that the undisposed of residue falls to be divided between the competitors, the heir and executors of the testator, in proportion to the value of the heritable and moveable estates respectively left by the testator at the date of his death after fulfilling the two first purposes of the trust, and decern:
Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Quoad ultra find no expenses due, and left one small legacy, and had left the great bulk of his property undisposed of, the question would have been exactly the same. The question is one of principle. But so far as the trustor's intentions can receive effect, we must look at the directions in the original deed. Those directions are clear enough. The trustees are to realise and divide and pay over the remainder of the trustor's estate, and to mass the proceeds together. The words "realise and divide and pay over" are important. They plainly mean that the realisation shall be for the purpose of division. The object, and the only object, of realisation is that the estate shall be the more easily divisible. The heritable estate has not, in point of fact, been realised, but that is of no importance, for, as Mr Cowan had given directions (as he was quite entitled to do) to his trustees to realise and mass his whole estate together, we must, according to the well-known rule of trust law, hold that that has been done which he directed to be done.

In these circumstances the undisposed of residue is just that part of the estate in which, in consequence of the non-disposal of it, those parties have an interest who would have had an interest if the entire estate had been undisposed of—that is to say, the heir and the executors. It seems to me that, in so far as the realisation of the heritable estate was not necessary to pay the legacies, the interest of the heir is not ousted, and so far as the executor's right is not ousted for the purpose of enabling the trustees to pay the legacies, his right subsists. The right of the heir and that of the executor if the estate had been altogether undisposed of would have corresponded to the respective values of the two estates. As it happens, the moveable estate was the more valuable, and therefore the interest of the heir in the case of total intestacy would have been smaller than that of the executor; and it appears to me that the way in which the balance falls to be divided is to be ascertained by taking into account the comparative value of the two kinds of estate before they were disposed of, or held to be disposed of, for the purposes of the trust; and therefore the proportion in which the balance is to be divided between the heir and the executor must correspond to the proportionate value of the two estates. I therefore propose that we should make findings to this effect, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to give effect to them.

LORD MURK.—The circumstances of this case are peculiar, and it cannot be disposed of according to the general rules applicable to the conversion of heritable into moveable estate. Here the main deed is blank as to the disposal of any of the property of the testator, excepting as regards his furniture, and therefore, if there had been no additional deed, the whole estate would have gone to the heir-at-law. I think, however, that the rule of law referred to by your Lordship, as stated by Lord Curriehill and Lord Neaves in the cases of Gardner and Neilson, is well founded, and that the direction here amounts to a direction to realise the whole estate and mass it together for the payment of the legacies and annuity. When I first applied my mind to the case I thought that this was an occasion for the application of the rule laid down in the case of Ritchie v. Wallace, 8 D. 1038, in which it was held that, as an annuity is in its nature heritable, it falls to be charged on heritage, and legacies, being in their nature moveable, fall to be charged to the moveable estate. If that rule were applied it would probably leave the heir and the executor in much the same position as they will be in as the result of the course proposed by your Lordship, and I therefore concur in that proposal.

LORD SHAND.—I not only concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived, but in everything that has been said in your opinion. The testator here has directed that all his estate shall be realised and massed together for the purpose of paying legacies and the annuity to his widow. That must be done. All the legacies have now been paid, and the annuitant having died, it appears that there is still a balance of the estate left for distribution. Now, so far as the proceeds of the massed estate have not been already disposed of, they fall into intestacy. As the heir has not been displaced, so far as the balance is the proceeds of heritage he is entitled to get it, and so far as it is the proceeds of moveable estate the next of kin get it.

Cowan.

LORD ADAM.—The balance of the estate which is not disposed of belongs to the heir in heritage and the heirs in moveables respectively. As to the proportions in which the balance shall be divided, that is a question of intention. The intention here is quite clear, viz., that the whole estate shall be realised and massed together, and that out of the massed fund the legacies and annuity shall be paid without distinction. The testator did not mean that what would naturally fall as a burden on heritage should be paid out of heritage, and that what would naturally fall on the moveable estate should be paid out of moveables. He intended, in my opinion, that the legacies and annuity should be paid indiscriminately out of the whole massed fund. The result is that, if, as is the case here, there is a balance over, we must ascertain to what extent the whole fund has been contributed by the heritable estate, and to what extent by the moveable, and then there will be division according to the proportions in which the two funds contributed to the whole.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that under the trust-disposition, settlement, and codicils of Daniel Cowan, the trustees were entitled and bound to realise the whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the purpose of division among the legatees and annuitants named in the codicil: Find that, although the heritable estate has not in fact been converted into money, it must, for the purposes of the present competition, be held to have been so converted: Find that there is residue of the entire estate, heritable and moveable, undisposed of, and that, quoad said residue, the testator died intestate: Find that the undisposed of residue falls to be divided between the competitors, the heir and executors of the testator, in proportion to the value of the heritable and moveable estates respectively left by the testator at the date of his death after fulfilling the two first purposes of the trust, and decern: Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Quoad ultra find no expenses due, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause as shall be just and consistent with the above findings, and with power to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the expenses found due."

Black v. Expenses—Arrestments on the dependence—Maritime cause.—Held that the Framjee & Co. are not recoverable by the pursuer as expenses of process.

1st Division. ON 8th September 1886 the barque "Huron" of Persia was arrested Lord Fraser. ad fundandam jurisdictionem while lying in Lamlash Bay, Arran, at the
M. instance of Thomas Black, sailmaker, Greenock.

On the same day Black raised an action against Bryson, her master, as representing her owners, for payment of £190, 2s. 10d., being the amount of an account for furnishings supplied to the vessel while lying at Ardrossan, and for expenses.

On the same day the pursuer obtained from the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Fraser) a warrant to arrest the vessel on the dependence of the action. The warrant was to pass on board the vessel, to raise her anchor and "bring her to and moor her in safety in one of the docks of the port of Greenock, and there to dismantle the said vessel."

The warrant was duly carried out, and the vessel dismantled at Greenock.

The owners of the vessel, Messrs Jehangeer Framjee & Company of London, sisted themselves as defenders.

On 5th October 1886 the defenders tendered payment of the account sued for, with expenses of process, as the same should be taxed by the Auditor of the Court. This was refused, and on 8th October the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on the application of the defenders, loosed the arrestments on condition that £400 was consigned. This sum was not consigned, and on 16th October a renewed application for the loosing of the arrestments was refused in consequence of the previous interlocutor requiring consignation.

On 11th October Black's agent rendered his account of expenses, which amounted to £199, 11s. 9d., and asked the defenders' agents to refer it for taxation to the Auditor. This was done, and on 12th October the Auditor taxed it at £21, 7s. 7½d., disallowing the expenses of arresting and dismantling.

On 15th October the defenders tendered the amount of the account, with interest, and the amount of the expenses as taxed.*

This offer was also declined.

In their defences to the action the defenders did not dispute that the account sued for was due, but set forth the tender above explained.

On 14th January 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) decerned against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remitted an account thereof to the Auditor to tax and report.

The defenders, Jehangeer Framjee & Company, reclaimed, and the question came to be whether the expenses of arresting and dismantling the ship were proper expenses in the first action.

Argued for the reclaimers;—These expenses were not proper expenses of process. It was well settled that in the ordinary case of arrestments on the dependence the expense of laying on the arrestments was not recoverable as one of the proper expenses of process.¹ It was, however, No. 127. said that this being an Admiralty action, and therefore an action in rem, the case was outwith the general rule. But, in the first place, there was ^{Mar. 19, 1887.} Black v. Jehangeer Framjee & Co. no case which laid down any such rule, and in the second place, not all Admiralty actions were actions in rem. Where the creditor had a lien over the ship, e.g., in actions for seamen's wages, the action was undoubtedly in rem, but in actions where, as here, there was no lien over the ship, the action was in personam.² It was distinctly laid down in one English case that an action for damages for running down against the owners of a ship was an action in personam.³ The expenses of arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa were proper expenses of process, because they were necessary to enable the pursuer to obtain decree for his debt, while arrestments on the dependence were only for the pursuer's security—(See Lord President in Symington's case).

* On 11th October Black again arrested the vessel ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and on 20th October 1886 raised an action against Jehangeer Framjee & Company for the expenses of arresting and dismantling the ship, which had been disallowed by the Auditor. The ship was again arrested on the dependence of this action.

Argued for the respondents;—The Admiralty Court had quite a different jurisdiction to that of any other Court, and in maritime causes arrestments were a real diligence carried out against the ship herself. Actions in that Court were directed against the ship, and the summons included warrant to arrest and dismantle the ship.⁴ The dismantling had invariably to be carried out skilfully and in a safe port,⁵ and therefore the cost of taking her to such a port (here it was Greenock) was a necessary expense. There was no case settling the practice as to expenses of this kind in Scotland, but in England the marshall's (i.e., the messenger of the Admiralty Court) fees were charged in the bill of costs as expenses of process. Arrestments on the dependence in the ordinary case were merely for the security of the creditor, but in Admiralty causes they were more—they were a real diligence—and therefore the cases of Symington and Taylor were not in point.

It was admitted at the bar that in practice the expenses of arrestments on the dependence and of dismantling were not charged as expenses of process.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first action here is at the instance of Thomas Black, sailmaker, against the owners of the ship "Huron," the account sued upon being one for furnishings to the vessel while she lay in port in this country. The "Huron" is a foreign vessel, her owners being also foreigners. On the dependence of that action the ship was arrested and dismantled, and the question which is raised by the respondent is whether the expenses of the arrestments and dismantling can be recovered in this action as part of the expenses of process. The Lord Ordinary has allowed the pursuer his expenses, but he evidently did not intend that that should cover the expenses here in question. In the ordinary case it is fixed quite definitely that the expense of arrestments used on the dependence of an action cannot be recovered as part of the expenses of process. That is settled by two cases, the latest of which is

No. 127. Symington v. Symington. The rule there laid down is rested on the principle that "the using of diligence on the dependance, however necessary it may be to make a pursuer's decree effectual when obtained, has nothing to do with obtaining that decree, which is the sole object of the action." Now, the way which the pursuer here endeavours to obviate the application of that rule to the present case is by saying that in maritime causes the rule is different, but he has not been able to find any case in which a different rule is laid down as applicable to that class of cases, and he does not deny,—in fact he admits,—that the practice is not what he contends for. In these circumstances I think we must follow the ordinary rule and hold that the expenses here are no more proper expenses of process than they are in the ordinary case of arresting funds in the hands of a third party. It seems to me that as the tender of October 15th is a tender of principal and interest, with the expenses, other than those which I am for disallowing, the pursuer is only entitled to his expenses up to the date of the tender, and that thereafter the defender is entitled to his.

Mar. 19, 1887.
Black v.
Jehangeer
Framjee & Co.

LORD MURE.—I agree in thinking that the expenses of the arrestments and dismantling of this ship must follow the ordinary rule as laid down in the case of Symington. That being so, the tender by the defenders is good, and they must be found entitled to their expenses from its date.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The only ground on which it is maintained that the arrestments here differ from ordinary arrestments is that this action was an action in rem. Whatever may be said of other actions which were formerly proper to the Admiralty Court, this action is merely a personal claim for furnishings to the ship "Huron," and the arrestments were just arrestments in an action to enforce a personal claim. If the pursuers had had to proceed to a sale of the ship, a question might have arisen as to whether the expenses of the arrestments and dismantling might not have been proper expenses in the process at that stage, just as in a forthcoming and sale. But, however that may be, I agree that those expenses were not proper expenses in this process, and it therefore follows that after the date of the tender expenses must be given to the defenders.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, found the pursuer entitled to expenses down to the date of the tender of 15th October, and quoad ultra found the defenders entitled to expenses.

No. 128. THE GLASGOW ROYAL INFIRMARY, Petitioners.—R. V. Campbell.

Mar. 19, 1887.*
Glasgow Infirmary.

Trust—Charitable Trust—Alteration of purposes—Nobile officium.—The Court approved of a scheme by which a trust constituted in the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, "for a fever convalescent home when erected," was altered into a trust "towards payment of the cost of a nurses' home," the purpose of erecting a fever convalescent home, which was in the mind of the directors of the infirmary when the original trust was constituted, having been abandoned as unnecessary.

By his trust-disposition, which was dated in 1858, Mr Alexander Mitchell, merchant in Glasgow, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate "among such benevolent and charitable institutions as they may judge most proper, for which purpose I hereby confer upon them the most absolute power and discretion"; and in the exercise of this discretion the trustees, in 1872, allotted the sum in question to the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, "for a fever convalescent home when erected." A receipt was granted by the treasurer of the infirmary, bearing that the money had been received for that purpose, and the money was deposited in bank on a receipt in similar terms. At the time when this was done the managers of the infirmary contemplated the erection of a fever convalescent home. But their scheme was not carried out in consequence of difficulties which arose from the opposition of the inhabitants of the locality in which they proposed to build the home. Subsequently this design was entirely superseded by the action of the Local Authorities, who undertook the treatment of infectious fever cases in the exercise of the powers and obligations created by the Public Health Act of 1867, and erected a Fever Hospital, with accommodation which the managers of the infirmary considered ample for convalescents. The managers of the infirmary therefore ceased to treat fever patients in that institution, and the specific purpose to which Mr Mitchell's trustees had appropriated the sum in question consequently failed.

In these circumstances the infirmary managers, being advised that a trust had been constituted in the infirmary corporation for the purpose declared by Mitchell's trustees, and the receipts granted by them, applied to the Court by petition in name of the corporation for their sanction to the fund, now amounting to upwards of £1300, being devoted to another purpose.

The petitioners stated that they were about to build a nurses' home on the infirmary grounds, that the cost of it was estimated at £5000, and that to meet this cost they had already received a donation of £500, and were to apply to the public for the balance. The petitioners stated that the provision of such a home was "among the most pressing necessities of the infirmary." If necessary, they could draw upon the capital stock of the infirmary, which amounted to more than £100,000. They, therefore, submitted to the Court this scheme, viz., "that the whole fund, principal and interest, should be applied towards payment of the cost of a nurses' home to be erected by the petitioners, and that decree and warrant should be granted accordingly."

The Lord Ordinary to whom the petition was presented reported the scheme to the First Division. The petition had been intimated to the Lord Advocate, who had intimated by letter to the petitioners' agents that the proposed alteration of the bequest was one which, under the circumstances, fully met with his approval.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is quite a reasonable and appropriate mode of disposing of the fund.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT approved of the scheme.

DECREE of divorce on the ground of adultery was on 17th November 1886 granted by Lord M'Laren (Ordinary) in an action at the instance of William Steedman, Lochgelly, against his wife, Mrs Magdalene Brown or Steedman.

The reclaiming days expired without a reclaiming note being lodged, but on 13th January 1887 the Lord Ordinary granted leave to reclaim.

When the cause came before the First Division objection was taken to the competency, and the defender was allowed to lodge a minute stating the cause of the delay in lodging the reclaiming note.

The minute stated that the defender was entitled to be reponed under sec. 16 of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151,* on the ground of mistake, she having been informed that she could not reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary without providing money to pay for the expenses of printing the proof, which she was unable to do.

The pursuer maintained on the merits that the defender was not entitled to be reponed, and further, that at all events, the Court was bound to find her liable in expenses up to that point as a condition to reponing her.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating his opinion that the defender was entitled to be reponed on the ground of mistake)—With regard to the question of expenses, it is not to be doubted that in ordinary cases the payment of expenses up to date is the condition on which the party to a suit is reponed, but that rule does not apply to the cases between husband and wife, for if we ordained the wife to pay the expenses she might demand that her husband should be ordained to supply her with funds to enable her to obey the order of the Court. The order would, in short, be implemented by the husband, and not by her.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT allowed the reclaiming note, and sent it to the roll for discussion.

By feu-charter dated 2d and recorded 3d April 1877, Beattie disposed

No. 130. part of the ground thus acquired by him to James Cowan, contractor, Edinburgh, inter alia, with and under the conditions and obligations specified in the charter from the Magistrates, the obligation to erect buildings to the value of £12,000 being imposed on Cowan to the extent of £4000.

Mar. 19, 1887.
Cowan v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

In October 1886, Cowan, who by that time had erected buildings on the ground feued to him of the value of £4000, and of the character specified in the feu-charter, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh for warrant to erect buildings one storey in height on a portion of this ground still unbuilt on fronting Easter Road. These buildings were to be occupied as stabling and premises in connection therewith, and were to be built of brick and slated roof, and they were to be brought up to the extreme margin of Cowan's property fronting Easter Road, but they were not to rise above the top of a low wall which separated Cowan's feu from Easter Road, the level of the feu being considerably below that of Easter Road.

The Magistrates and Town-Council opposed this application, on the ground that the erection of buildings of one storey in height fronting Easter Road was a contravention of the feu-charter. They did not dispute that Beattie and Cowan had duly implemented the obligation to erect buildings to the value of £12,000 at least, but they maintained that "the petitioner is restricted to build a range of four-storey tenements similar to those already built on the frontage along the continuation of Albert Street and Easter Road. . . . The reference in the feu-charter granted by the respondents as to the minimum value of the buildings to be erected on the ground feued did not affect the character of the buildings which were to be erected along the continuation of Albert Street and Easter Road, all of which were to consist of a range of four-storey tenements." They further maintained that the petitioner was bound to leave eight feet of his property fronting Easter Road for a foot-pavement, and was not therefore entitled to build thereon as proposed.

On 9th December 1886, the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the operations in question are confined to the petitioner's own property, and can be executed without danger: Finds that the proposed buildings are not a violation of the feu-charter granted by the respondents: Therefore repels the pleas in law for the respondents: Grants warrant as craved: Finds the respondents liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The Dean of Guild is of opinion that the nature of the obligation therein specified was to build, within a certain time, houses of a certain architectural character, and to the value of £12,000, on the frontage along the continuation of Albert Street and Easter Road; and all these requirements have been observed, thereby securing the feu-duty to the respondents. It may be that the respondents meant that after these were built all other houses to be built in Easter Road should be of the same character, but the charter does not say so, either in this clause, or, as will appear directly, in the other clauses of conditions. On the other hand, all that is actually stipulated for is a range of buildings of £12,000 value, and the respondents must have known that such a sum would only provide buildings of such a character on a part of the frontage of the area disposed, and ought to have expressed clearly their intention that even after the stipulated buildings were built, none were to be erected on the rest of the frontage but buildings of a similar character.

"If this is so in regard to the first of these clauses, the question comes to be,—Is there anything in the other clauses of the charter to support the respondents' contention that the petitioner can build along the Easter Road nothing else than four-storey houses as aforesaid? The second clause of the charter is an irritant clause, declaring that the feu shall be forfeited 'if the said William Beattie and his foressaids shall fail to erect on the said piece of ground buildings as stipulated for.' Now, this draws back to the first clause of the deed, which

The Magistrates appealed, and argued;—The object of the first clause of the feu-charter was to preserve the uniformity of Albert Street and Easter Road, and that object had been attained by prohibiting the erection of other than four-storey buildings similar to those already built in Albert Street. That was the plain intention of the parties, and the Court ought therefore to give effect to it, even if the prohibition were not express, but the true construction of the clause was to read the passage from “of the value of £6000 at least,” down to “of the value of £12,000 at least” as a parenthesis; the “which buildings” which followed then referred back to the “buildings” first mentioned in the clause, and made the obligation as to the character of the buildings to be erected universal. Even if the clause merely had reference to the value of the buildings, the value of those already erected might be depreciated below £12,000, if the petitioner were allowed to erect inferior or objectionable buildings. In any event, under the third clause the petitioner was bound to leave eight feet of frontage to Easter Road.

Cowan v.
Edinburgh.

Argued for Cowan;—The first clause was not prohibitory, merely obligatory,—obliging the feuar to erect buildings of a certain value, which had been done. That of course was to secure the feu-duty. Except in so far as he was expressly restricted in the feu-charter, a vassal was at liberty to put up such buildings as he pleased on his ground.¹ There were well-known styles of restriction, which ought to have been used if restriction was intended. On third clause the petitioner did not maintain that he was not bound to leave eight feet for the foot-pavement, if (whether in implement of the obligation or not) he de facto proposed to erect houses fronting Easter Road, but he contended that these stables were not houses, and secondly that they did not “front” Easter Road, as they were below its level.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I see no reason for differing from the judgment of the Dean of Guild.

LORD YOUNG.—I have had great difficulty in regard to this case I must say; but I rather think, although I should gladly have thought otherwise, that the view of the Dean of Guild is the right one. I think that this is a blundered deed, and that the whole matter is rightly put by the Dean of Guild’s assessor when he says,—“It may be that the respondents meant that after these were built all certainly stipulates that the buildings shall be of four storeys, but also that they shall be of the value of £12,000, the proportion of which transmitted against the petitioner he has more than made good.

“The Dean of Guild is of opinion that there is nothing in this clause to extend the view of the disponee’s obligations which he has already expressed. The third clause provides in certain proportions for the expense of forming roadways and drains therein. By this clause also, Beattis is bound to form and maintain foot-pavement and water-channel in front of the houses to be built on the said piece of ground facing the continuation of Albert Street, Easter Road, and other streets, like those already made in Albert Street; the foot-pavement towards Easter Road being kept eight feet within the area of the ground disposed.

“So far as the petitioner’s range of building turns into Easter Road, this condition has been implemented, but it will be observed that the clause only demands that the pavement shall be laid ‘in front of the houses to be built,’ leaving it to be determined by the first of the clauses prescribing the nature of the buildings what the character and extent of the buildings are to be.

No. 130. other houses to be built in Easter Road should be of the same character, but the charter does not say so." I cannot resist the argument that that was the intention of the framers of this charter, but the charter does not say so, and we are not at liberty to gather the intention of the parties apart from the words of the charter. I therefore think we should adhere.

Cowan v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot find in this deed any prohibition such as that on which the appellants in this case must rely. Any such prohibition must be clearly expressed, but I cannot find any clear expression of it—indeed I doubt if there is any expression of prohibition in the deed at all. It is said that we may gather what may have been the intention of the framers of the deed, and from that intention may gather what the deed proposed to do. That is a mode of construing a feu-charter to which we are unaccustomed, and there is here nothing in favour of that mode of construction; on the contrary, the rule is in favour of liberty to the vassal. All such clauses of prohibition must be strictly construed. The more troublesome question is as to the footpath, but neither here do I find any clause of prohibition on which the appellant may rely. It may be that if the petitioner comes to erect buildings of the sort specified in the charter which require an access to Easter Road, he may be obliged to leave the required space for a footpath, but until he does so, I do not think that we can enforce this clause. I think the note of the assessor is not only well put, but is sound law.

THE COURT adhered.

SUMMER SESSION.

No. 131. ROBERT BETHUNE AND OTHERS (on behalf of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club), Pursuers (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—G. R. Gillespie.

May 13, 1887.
St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

JAMES GLOVER DENHAM, Defender (Appellant).—M. Kechnie—C.S. Dickson—Salvesen.

Property—Servitude—Golfing Links—Possessory judgment.—In 1799 the Magistrates of St Andrews granted a feu-disposition of a large part of the Pilmour Links, belonging to the burgh, "reserving the bleaching ground, as particularly marked out by march-stones placed therein, on which the inhabitants of St Andrews are to have the liberty and privilege of bleaching in all time coming"; and also, inter alia, "under the reservation always that no hurt or damage shall be done thereby to the golf links, nor shall it be in the power of any proprietor of said Pilmour Links to plough up any part of said golf links in all time coming, but the same shall be reserved entirely, as it has been in times past, for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants and others who shall resort thither for that amusement."

In 1881 the successor of the original disponee, with consent of his grazing tenant, let a portion of the ground to the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club for seven years from Martinmas 1880, at a rent of £4 per annum, payable to the grazing tenant. The lease excepted "from said piece of ground hereby let any portion thereof over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching" under the feu-disposition, and declared that "the piece of ground hereby let is to be made use of for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow, but by no others," the pasturage being reserved to the grazing tenant. The club had from 1867 had possession of the same piece of ground under a missive offer of lease with similar conditions. No. 131.

In 1885 the club brought an action in the Sheriff Court to have an inhabitant of St Andrews, who was not a member of the club, interdicted from golfing on the ground let to them. May 13, 1887.
St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

The defences were (1) that the lease was ultra vires of the granter, in respect that the right of golfing reserved in the original feu-disposition extended over the whole Links, or at all events over the ground said to have been let to the pursuers; (2) that the lease expressly excluded the bleaching ground, and that the bleaching ground included the whole or a part of the ground claimed by the pursuers; (3) that the pursuers had not proved exclusive possession.

It was, in the opinion of a majority of the Court, proved in point of fact that the public golf course was defined and marked out by march-stones, that the ground in dispute formed no part of that course, and that since 1880 the pursuers had had exclusive possession of that ground under a lease granted by the proprietor thereof, and for thirteen years previously under a missive of lease with him.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the pursuers were entitled to a possessory judgment.

PRIOR to 1799 the Magistrates of St Andrews, in virtue of successive charters granted by the Scottish Kings, and by the bishops and arch-bishops of St Andrews, were proprietors of the Links of St Andrews, otherwise called Pilmour Links, an area of about 280 acres in extent, lying along the sea-shore to the west of the city. On 4th December 1799 the Magistrates granted a feu-disposition of the portion of these Links (amounting to about five-sixths of the whole) lying to the west of a burn called the Swilkin Burn, in favour of Charles and Cathcart Dempster, merchants, St Andrews. This feu-disposition contained the following clause:—"Reserving always to the town of St Andrews the whole ground to the eastward of the Swilkin Burn, . . . as also reserving the bleaching ground to the west thereof, as particularly marked out by march-stones placed therein, on which the inhabitants of St Andrews are to have the liberty and privilege of bleaching in all time coming; as also reserving to the burghesses of said city standing on the stent-roll alienary power and liberty to cast and win divots upon the said Links and commonalty for flanking and rigging, conform to use and wont, as also for repairing the town's mill-leads and dams, under the reservation always that no hurt or damage shall be done thereby to the golf links, nor shall it be in the power of any proprietor of said Pilmour Links to plough up any part of the said golf links in all time coming; but the same shall be reserved entirely, as it has been in times past, for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants and others who shall resort thither for that amusement." 2d Division.
Sheriff of Fife-
shire.

In 1820 the ground thus feued to the Dempsters was acquired by Mr Cheape of Strathtyrum, under the same reservations and conditions.

By lease, dated 15th and 19th February and 2d March 1881, Cheape, with consent of John Millar, his grazing tenant of this ground, let a portion of it to Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Bethune of Nydie, Major Robert Tod Boothby, and Henry S. Crawford Everard, both residing in St Andrews, on behalf of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, in the following terms:—"All and Whole that small piece of ground forming part of said Links, and lying on the east side of the golfing course of St Andrews, and immediately northward from the Swilkin Burn at the point where said burn discharges into the sea on the West Sands of St Andrews, said piece of ground being bounded as follows:—On the west by a line extending in length 158 yards or thereby, measuring from the west end of the retaining wall erected on the north side of the said burn (near to the mouth thereof), northwards along the east side or margin of the ordinary or public golfing course; on the north by a straight line drawn from the north end of the said western boundary as before defined, eastwards to the West Sands; on the east by the West Sands or sea beach; and on south by the Swilkin Burn, all lying in the parish of St Andrews and shire of Fife: But excepting from said piece of ground hereby let any portion thereof over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching under the feu-rights of the said Links granted by the Town-Council of St Andrews in favour of the proprietor's authors and predecessors, and declaring that the said inhabitants shall not be interrupted or molested in exercising such liberty and privilege, and also that burgesses of the city of St Andrews standing on the stent-roll allenarly shall have power and liberty to cast and win divots on said piece of ground for the purposes specified in said feu-rights, conform to use and wont"; the lease to be for seven years from Martinmas 1880, but with power to Cheape or his successors in the subjects to terminate it at any prior period of Martinmas on giving one month's notice. The lease then continued:—"Which piece of ground hereby let is to be made use of for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow, but no others; the pasturage of the ground being hereby reserved to the said John Millar and his heirs and successors in the lease of the pasturage of the said Links." The lessees then bound themselves to pay Millar, or the grazing tenant of the Links for the time being, during the currency of the tack, the sum of £4 yearly as the rent of the subjects let.

The St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club was formed in 1867, and prior to the date of the lease the piece of ground thereby let, or substantially the same ground, had been held by or for behoof of the club from its formation, under a missive offer of lease, dated March 1868, for five years from Martinmas 1867, at a rent of £2 per annum, payable to the grazing tenant, which was followed by possession during these five years, and was continued by tacit relocation from its expiration to the commencement of the lease just quoted.

The club was a voluntary association, with a membership of 1000, of whom not more than one-half might be ladies, the remainder being men. Admission was obtained by election by the committee, and the annual subscription was half-a-crown.

In June 1885 Colonel Bethune and the other lessees on behalf of the club brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Cupar against James Glover Denham, of No. 3 Pilmour Place, St Andrews, who was not a member of the club, praying for interdict against the defender golfing or putting on the piece of ground leased to them under the above lease, or in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers and the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club in the possession of the same.

The pursuers, after setting forth their lease, averred,—(Cond. 3) "A golf course has been formed on the said piece of ground, and the exclusive right of golfing or putting thereon is by said lease confined to 'the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow.' Denied that the defender has been in the habit of golfing or putting on the Ladies' Golf Course or ground in question ever since it was formed. The St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club was instituted in 1867, and since that time, or for at least seven years prior to June 1885, the pursuers and the said club have been tenants of and paid rent for the ground in question, and have enjoyed uninterrupted peaceable possession of the same for golfing or putting. Quoad ultra denied. No. 131.

The defender answered,—(Ans. 3) “Admitted that a golf course has been formed on the said piece of ground. Denied that the granter of the said pretended lease had power to confine the exclusive right of golfing or putting on said piece of ground to the members of the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club, and such other persons as the said club may allow. May 13, 1887. St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club v. Denham.

Not known, and not admitted, that the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club was instituted in 1867. Denied that since that time, or for at least seven years prior to June 1885, the pursuers and the said club have been tenants and paid rent for the ground in question, and have enjoyed uninterrupted peaceable possession of the same for golfing or putting. The ground in question is part of the bleaching ground reserved to the inhabitants of St Andrews.”

The parties further averred and answered,—(Cond. 4) “On or about the 13th day of June 1885 the defender, after being duly warned by Thomas Morris, golf-club maker, St Andrews, the custodier of said golf course, golfed or putted on the said piece of ground or golf course, and refused to desist, although requested by Morris to do so. Counter statements denied.” (Ans. 4) “Denied that on or about the 13th day of June 1885 the defender trespassed on the said piece of ground or golf course here mentioned. Denied that Thomas Morris, golf-club maker, St Andrews, is the custodier of said golf course. Admitted that the defender golfed or putted on said course on or about said 13th day of June, as he had been in the habit of doing in common with the other inhabitants of St Andrews for many years. Admitted that he refused to desist when requested by Morris, and averred that Morris had no right or authority to make such a request.” (Cond. 5) “The defender is not a member of the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club, and had no authority from the pursuers or the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club, or right of any kind, to golf or put on the said piece of ground or golf course, and his doing so is injurious and prejudicial to the pursuers as representing the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club. Denied that the defender is either an inhabitant or citizen of St Andrews.” (Ans. 5) “Admitted that the defender is not a member of the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club. Averred that he did not require any authority from the pursuers or the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club to golf or put on the said piece of ground. Averred that as one of the inhabitants of St Andrews he has an inalienable right to golf or put on said ground, and that neither the proprietor, Mr Cheape, nor the pursuers, can deprive him of that right. Denied that by putting or golfing on said ground the defender in any way injured or prejudiced the pursuers or the rights and interests of his fellow-citizens.”

In his statement of facts the defender also averred that “the golf links” referred to in the clause of reservation in the feu-charter of 1799 were co-extensive with the Pilmour Links. The pursuer in answer stated “that the golf course or golf links, over which the inhabitants of St Andrews and others have a good and undoubted right and title to exercise the privilege and enjoy the amusement of playing golf, extends from 10 to 12 acres, and is specially marked off by march-stones.”

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers and the St Andrews Ladies’ Golf Club having been tenants of the ground in question and having enjoyed uninterrupted, peaceable, and exclusive possession thereof for golfing or putting since the institution of the club in 1867, or for at least seven years prior to 13th June 1885, they are entitled to a possessory judgment.

 St Andrews
 Ladies' Golf
 Club v.
 Denham.

The defender pleaded;—(2) No title to sue. (4) The ground in question forming part of the Links of St Andrews, otherwise called Pilmour Links, having been conveyed to Mr Cheape's predecessor, and being held by him under the condition that no part of said golf links should be ploughed up at any time, but that the same should be reserved entirely as it had been in times past for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants of St Andrews and others who should resort thither for that amusement, it was ultra vires of Mr Cheape to grant the lease No. 5 of process conferring the exclusive right of golfing or putting on said ground on the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and such other persons as the said club might allow, and the same must therefore be held pro non scripto. (5) The inhabitants of St Andrews and others having enjoyed the right of bleaching clothes, of walking, of playing golf, and of otherwise amusing themselves on the ground in question from time immemorial, the pursuers are not entitled, by interdict or otherwise, to prevent the defender exercising these rights. (6) The rights of the defender and of the inhabitants of St Andrews in and over said Links, and the said portion thereof, being as hereinbefore set forth, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (7) The defender not having trespassed on the ground in question, and not having done anything but what he was legally entitled to do, interim interdict ought not to have been granted against him, and the same will fall to be recalled, and the defender assolizied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the interlocutor and note of the Sheriff. The evidence bearing on the averments in cond. 4 is quoted in the opinion of Lord Young.

On 6th November 1886 the Sheriff (Mackay ) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings setting forth the pursuers' and the defender's titles):—Finds “(5) That the piece of ground in question, although situated within that part of the Links now commonly called the St Andrews or Pilmour Links, which form a portion of the subjects contained in the feudisposition of 1799, is entirely outwith the ordinary golf course marked out on the Links at some date prior to the year 1821, and also outwith the course now used, which, with one or two deviations in the form of widening the course, is the same as that so marked out; (6) that some portion of the said piece of ground in question was at one time used for the purposes of bleaching in respect of the servitude of bleaching contained in the title of the proprietor of the Links, but that the practice of bleaching has considerably diminished in recent years, and, so far as regards the ground in question, practically has ceased for nearly twenty years; (7) that no person has come forward to assert the claim of the inhabitants to any part of the ground in question for bleaching purposes, and that there are neither the parties nor the materials in the present process necessary for defining the extent of the bleaching servitude; (8) that the defender has not proved possession, by himself or any of the inhabitants of St Andrews, of the piece of ground in question for the purpose of playing the short or putting game of golf, or any possession by him or them of such a kind as to restrict the proprietor from granting the exclusive use thereof to the pursuers' club for the purpose of playing the said short or putting game; (9) that the defender has not proved that the use of this piece of ground for the purpose of the short or putting game is inconsistent with, or will in any way interfere with, the ordinary and habitual practice of the game of golf as played from time immemorial, or, at all events, for much more than the prescriptive period, by the inhabitants of St Andrews and others, on the golf course and parts of the Links adjacent thereto: In these circumstances, finds in law that the pursuers are entitled to interdict against the defender: Recalls the interim interdict granted on 21st July 1885, and in lieu thereof interdicts the defender from playing the putting or short game of golf on the piece of ground described in the prayer of the petition, or from in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers and the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club in the possession or occupation of the said piece of ground for the purpose of playing the putting or short game of golf: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.

* "NOTE.—This is a petition for interdict against the defender golfing or putting on a part of the Links of St Andrews belonging in property to Mr Cheape of Strathtyrum, and let by him to the pursuers, the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club. The defender, who is an inhabitant of St Andrews (for the plea against his title has been waived), claims, as such, a right to golf on any part of the Links, and to use any holes, by whomsoever and wherever made, for the purpose of the game. He accordingly played, on the occasion referred to in condescendence 4, upon the ground here in question, and was turned off by Thomas Morris, who has been employed since the commencement of the Ladies' Club in 1867 to take charge of the ground for it. He still asserts his right to play the putting game at this place, although not a member, and without leave of the club, and the present action has been brought to prevent him. His defence is founded upon a reservation contained in the title of Mr Cheape, whose author, Dempster, acquired this part of the Links which lies west of the Swilkin Burn under the reservations quoted in the first finding of the interlocutor. The reservation in favour of golfing is that which the defender specially seeks to vindicate for himself and the other inhabitants. But he refers to the other reservations, and specially that in favour of bleaching, in support of his argument. He also led proof as to the possession for the prescriptive period in support of his construction of the title.

"The pursuers put their case chiefly—indeed, almost exclusively—upon their right to a possessory judgment, but their proof also covered the prescriptive period. They have a lease from the late Mr Cheape of Strathtyrum of the piece of the Links in question, for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, 'and by such other persons as the said club may allow,' but under an exception of any portion over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching, and a declaration in favour of the burgess' right of casting and winning divots according to use and wont. Prior to their entry at Martinmas 1880 under this lease, the term of which is seven years, the Ladies' Club had possessed the ground for five years under a missive offer, dated 'March 1868, agreeing to take the ground in question (or almost the whole of it) for the purpose of golfing and putting by the members of the Ladies' Golf Club, and by such other persons as the club may allow, for five years from Martinmas 1867.' Tacit relocation followed on the expiry of the five years down to the commencement of the present lease. It is contended by the pursuers that their possession has been in conformity with the leases, and that the Ladies' Club has had exclusive possession for the special purpose claimed since its formation in 1867, and certainly for the last seven years. A lease is a sufficient prima facie title to support a possessory judgment—Hume v. Scot, Dec. 1, 1676, Mor. 10,641; Young v. Cunningham, June 22, 1839, 8 S. 959; Anderson v. McCallum, Nov. 3, 1857, 20 D. 2; Begbie & Co. v. France, Nov. 24, 1857, 20 D. 81; and on the question of possession the Sheriff is of opinion that the pursuers have proved exclusive possession of sufficient quality for such a judgment. It is needless to go into the details of the proof. There is undoubtedly evidence of toleration of play by others, and a good deal of play appears to have gone on at times and seasons when the members of the club were not playing. But it is very clear that the only habitual and regular play in assertion of a right was by the members of the club, and there was constant practice of challenge when strangers or persons ignorant of the club rules played so as to interfere with the play of the members of the club. No one refused to leave when challenged, according to the evidence of Thomas Morris, and his evidence on this point is confirmed by the pursuers' other witnesses, and not contradicted by the defender's. The evidence as to the players of the ordinary game following their ball when it lit on the ground in question is irrelevant, for this is not the right either asserted or denied in the present case. The right asserted is a right to use the holes made, and the ground prepared, by the Ladies' Club for the short or putting game. If the case had been one of heritable property, the Sheriff would therefore have held the pursuers clearly entitled to a possessory judgment.

"But the question relates to a servitude. No doubt the point has been mooted whether the right of golfing is a proper servitude, and there may be cases where it is, strictly speaking, rather a qualification or condition of a trust title like that of the magistrates for behoof of the community, but where, as here, it is imposed by reservation on the property title of a third party in favour of the inhabitants of a burgh, there is a dominant and servient tenement, the latter of which is subject to a burden in favour of the former restricting to that extent, but not otherwise, the right of property. This is just a description of a real servitude, and there appears no reason why it should not be called by that name. It is in fact included in the category of servitudes, both by Judges and legal writers in modern times. It is not a servitude known to the Roman law, but it has become well known in Scots law, and though its character differs from ordinary servitudes, in respect that its immediate object is amusement merely, it does not appear to differ in any other essential respect.

"Now, the Sheriff Court Act of 1878 extends the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to questions touching either the constitution or the exercise of real or prædial servitude, and it was held in Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, 2 R. 729, that where it was competent for the Sheriff to decide on the merits on a claim for servitude, it was incompetent for him to decline and confine himself to merely a possessory judgment. The question of the merits was raised in that case by the pursuer, and it is here raised by the defender, but the proprietor's titles have been produced, and proof has been led relative to the prescriptive period as well as to the possessory period. It may be a disadvantage for the defender that no decision in the present case will be res judicata in a question with the proprietor of the Links, but it is the defender who asks for a judgment on the effect of the titles and prescriptive possession. No motion has been made by him to have the proprietor sisted, or intimation made to him of the present process. The Sheriff, though with some difficulty, has come to be of opinion that he is not entitled to decline to consider the larger question which the defender has raised. The case appears to come within the rule stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk in Gow's Trustees,—'When a possessory judgment regarding an heritable right is made the foundation of action in the Sheriff Court, it is implied that the Sheriff is not in a position to settle the ultimate dispute between the parties, but he can only regulate possession ad interim until the parties have obtained a decision of the Supreme Court on the merits of their case. But here the question is one of servitude; the Sheriff is competent to deal with it unreservedly, and ought to have entertained and disposed of the merits of the question.'

"It at one time occurred to the Sheriff that, as a declarator before the Supreme Court would undoubtedly have been a more appropriate mode of settling the question as to the exact limits of the rights of property and servitude respectively in this portion of the Links, and as neither the Magistrates of St Andrews, nor the proprietor of this part of the Links, are parties to the present proceedings, he might, without deciding the case expressly upon the possessory judgment, hold that the status quo should be preserved until a declarator had been brought. But to decide nothing except the question of the appropriate form of action would scarcely be satisfactory to anyone, and certainly not to the defender.

It is not his fault that, contrary to the more usual practice, the interdict process has been brought in the name of the tenant only, without the concurrence of the landlord. The parties have supplied the Sheriff with materials and argument sufficient to decide, in a question at all events with the defender, the issue he has raised, and the Sheriff has felt bound to decide it. His opinion is, that the servitude of golfing imposed upon the property title of the Links is not such as to prevent the proprietor from granting the possession of the portion here in question to the pursuers' club, for the purpose of playing the short or putting game, to the exclusion of its use for that purpose by the defender, as an inhabitant of St Andrews, so long as the possession so granted does not interfere with the ordinary course of the game on the Links, as played by golfers generally, and required for the number of persons who are in the habit of playing. The Sheriff further thinks that the evidence of possession during the last forty years is not in the least inconsistent with, but, on the contrary, confirms this view of the title.

"It was contended for the pursuers that the 'Golf Links' in the proprietor's titles were not identical with the Pilmour Links, and did not include the piece of ground in question, which is admittedly outwith the golf course, as pointed out by the stones placed there prior to the year 1821, and they tried to limit the term 'Golf Links' to the 'Golf Course.' There is certainly room for argument on the question, whether the Golf Links are not a more restricted area than Pilmour Links in the widest sense of the term. But for the purpose of this case it is sufficient to say that, in the opinion of the Sheriff, the term 'Golf Links' cannot be restricted to the 'Golf Course,' or strips of the Links varying from 72 to 195 yards in breadth, marked out by stones, on which the ordinary game is generally played. A golf course is not like a race course, a limited space, passing beyond which is the loss of the game. It happens frequently with bad players, and sometimes in bad weather with good, that the ball falls outside of the course. This, in fact, is one of the hazards of the game, and the practice of following the ball wherever it falls on the Links has always been allowed, and is the only penalty on the unskilful or unfortunate player. The title from the burgh in favour of Mr Cheape's authors is quite wide enough to cover under the expression 'Golf Links' the whole Links on which any part of the game is played, in the manner in which it is played, according to use and wont, and this includes a much larger tract of ground than the course proper, and cannot be held to exclude in this sense that part of the Links here in question, where the ball has frequently to be followed. But it does not follow that the extent of the servitude over the Links outside the golf course and that over the course itself is the same. This point was very carefully considered in the recent case of Paterson v. The Magistrates of St Andrews, 27th July 1881, H. of L. 8 Rettie, p. 117, particularly by Lord Watson. That learned Lord observed,— 'Then it is said you must leave untouched everything outside of that course which can be shewn to be a part of the Links to which a ball may be driven in playing the game of golf. I entirely demur to that proposition. The contention to which I am prepared to give effect really comes to this, that whatever is outside of the proper golfing course may be turned to various purposes so long as these are not inconsistent with the game of golf.' If this observation had been merely an obiter dictum of so distinguished a lawyer, it would have been entitled to the highest respect, and the Sheriff would have been very slow to decide anything which could conflict with it. But it was in reality the ground of judgment in that case, which is a binding, and the Sheriff thinks a conclusive, authority on the present. For the decision in that case was that the Magistrates of St Andrews were entitled to use or allow the use of a portion of the Links outside of the proper golf course for the purpose of a road, so long as this use did not interfere with the game of golf, to which that part of the Links, including the site of the road, had been dedicated by immemorial usage. It is true that case related to part of the Links east of the Swilkin Burn retained by the magistrates, and not to the part here in question, which they alienated to a third party. It is settled law, and was assumed by all the Judges, both in the Court of Session and House of Lords, that such alienation, if absolute and total, as in the case of feus for houses, though open to challenge prior to the years of prescription, was not so after they had run. Here the alienation to Mr Cheape's author was not absolute or total, for while the magistrates in 1799 transferred the property, they reserved certain uses for behoof of the inhabitants, one of which was golfing, as the inhabitants had exercised it according to the use and wont of such exercise. It necessarily follows that the measure of the burden or restriction on the property of their disponee is precisely the same in extent as the qualification of their own title prior to the disposition. The use of a portion of the Links as a private or semi-private ground for the practice of the short or putting game, without interfering with the right of the golfers to follow their balls outside of the course, cannot be said to be in any way inconsistent with the game of golf as habitually played on the Links. If the defender had considered this case, the course of which was followed with great interest by the golfing public, and its necessary consequences, the Sheriff cannot help thinking that he would not have challenged the present proceeding, in which, though nominally defender, he is really the pursuer, for on the occasion referred to in the pleadings and proof he played or attempted to play the putting game on this ground for the purpose of being, and with the knowledge that he would be, prevented.

"It is unnecessary to enter minutely into the evidence of possession during the prescriptive period. The Sheriff does not doubt that, with such titles as are here in question, a servitude right might be modified either by extension or restriction, upon clear proof that there had been the exercise of a wider right by the persons entitled to the servitude, or a further limitation of the right of property by the owner of the property subject to it. But there is no evidence whatever adduced by the defender to shew that the proprietor of the ground, who prima facie on the titles has the whole uses not reserved, was restricted de facto by the exercise of such a right as the defender here claims. His claim amounts to this, that any inhabitant of St Andrews might make on any part of the Links outwith the golfing course a set of holes for the purpose of playing the short or putting game, without the consent of the proprietor of the ground. Nothing of this sort has ever been attempted. The ground was open, and no one was prevented from walking on it. Games, such as football and cricket, which are played on the surface, and require no operations on the soil by digging, were challenged, though not always with complete success, by the Strathtyrum watchman, Robert Hunter. But no one tried to play the short game of golf at this place, which implies cutting holes in the ground, and dressing and preparing the green, until the pursuers' club did so with the sanction of the proprietor and the grazing tenant. It would be a more delicate question whether, if the number of players, or possibly improvements in the game, required an extension or enlargement of the course, this might not be claimed on the part of the inhabitants; but no such question has been raised. Apart from the decision in the case of Paterson, the view of the law to which effect has been given in the present judgment derives strong support from the opinion expressed by Lord Eldon in the case of Dempster v. Cleghorn, Nov. 29, 1813, 2 Dow's App. 40, as to the Links here in question, and the procedure adopted by the Court of Session in the case of The Magistrates of Earlsferry v. Malcolm, June 12, 1829, 7 Shaw, 755, Nov. 23, 1832, 11 Shaw, 74.

"In the case of Dempster there was no final decision, but Lord Eldon's opinion, when he remitted the case to the Court of Session, was very adverse to any limitation of the proprietor's right of property, except what was established by the actual exercise of the servitude right.

the defining the course by stones may have been a consequence of that remit, and of some arrangement between the parties as to the course upon which the game was to be played. This, however, is not established by proof, and all that is certain is, that no further judicial proceedings were taken by the pursuers to limit the proprietor's right. As to the decision in the Court of Session (Cleghorn v. Dempster, M. 16,141), which was practically superseded by the remit, it may be observed that it proceeded upon the basis, whether well or ill-founded, that the golf ground had been damaged by the rabbits of the proprietor,—that is to say, damaged for the purposes of golf. There is no room in the present case for pretending that there has been any damage done by the use the proprietor has granted of a portion of the Links to the Ladies' Club. In the Earlsferry case, in which it was decided that the burgh of Earlsferry had a servitude of golfing over the Ferry Links, the property of which was claimed by Malcolm, the Court itself took the necessary steps for marking out a course. A remit was at first made 'to Mr Jameson, then Sheriff-substitute of Fife, to settle the best and most convenient track for the exercise of golfing,'—7 Shaw, 755, and the burgh having thereafter objected to his report, and craved a new remit to experienced golfers, 'the Court remitted to Messrs Walter Cook, W.S., and John Taylor, Attorney in the Exchequer, to examine the ground in question, to lay out a proper course thereon sufficient for the due exercise of that amusement, having a due regard to all the circumstances of the case, and to the mutual rights and claims of the parties,' and their report being returned, the Court decreed in terms of it—11 Shaw, 74.

"The defender raised a side issue, which, although it bulked a good deal in the proof and argument, is of a somewhat singular character. He contended that part, or possibly the whole, of the ground now used by the Ladies' Golf Club was subject to the servitude of bleaching, and had been constantly used for that purpose, and that it was impossible that the short game of golf could be played consistently with the exercise of the servitude of bleaching. The result of success in this argument would be to exclude not only the Ladies' Club but also the defender from the ground, or so much of it as is subject to the bleaching servitude, although the object of the defender is to obtain for himself and the other golfers the right to play the short game there. There is undoubtedly a servitude of bleaching on part of the Links, and one of the reservations in the title of Mr Cheape's author is of the bleaching ground to the west of the Swilkin Burn, as particularly marked out by march-stones placed therein, on which the inhabitants of St Andrews are to have the liberty of bleaching in all time coming. The proof as to bleaching, shortly, was that about twenty years ago there was a good deal of bleaching on both sides of the Swilkin Burn, and, in particular, on a part of the ground now used by the Ladies' Golf Club, which went by the name of the dining-room, as marked on plan No. 39 of process, and probably also on other convenient spots within that ground. The neighbourhood of the burn from which water was got naturally made this a suitable place for bleaching. The evidence as to the march-stones defining the bleaching ground is by no means clear and consistent. Some of them have been removed, and there is a conflict about at least one still extant, whether it was a march-stone of the bleaching-green. It would be a waste of time to go into minutiae on these points, but the Sheriff thinks that the three stones in a line still remaining tend to confirm the fact deducible from the other evidence that a part of the ground in question had been used for bleaching. They indicate the line, or a portion of the line, of the south boundary, and the Swilkin Burn may be taken as the east boundary in a question with the proprietor of this part of the Links. But the northern and western boundaries are not made out by existing march-stones or any other clear evidence. The parties described the boundaries in this way, as the Swilkin Burn is called the east boundary in the titles, and the Sheriff has followed their example, although more strictly, according to compasses, this part of the burn would be called the south boundary, and the other boundaries relatively altered. If this case had been a declarator to establish the extent of the bleaching area it would probably have been necessary to dismiss it for want of sufficient evidence. But no such declarator has been raised. On the contrary, the persons interested in the servitude of bleaching have from motives of good neighbourhood or policy abstained from interfering with the sport of the Ladies' Club, and changed to some extent the part of the Links used for bleaching. The bleaching here practised was never for wholesale or manufacturing purposes, but only for family purposes. The old-fashioned mode of exposing clothes or linen for a considerable period in the open air, to whiten the colour, has gradually become little more than ordinary washing and drying. Other sources of water supply and facilities for washing have to some extent lessened the use of the Links for this last purpose, but it is still practised to a considerable extent. Those practising it probably suffer a little inconvenience from now using part of the Links somewhat further from the burn, but, on the other hand, they are nearer the whins on which the clothes are dried. While the Sheriff thinks it right so far to explain the practice disclosed by the proof led in this case, he feels bound, in the absence of the proper parties raising the proper issue, not to express any opinion as to the local limits of the servitude of bleaching, or how far these might be altered by custom short of the years of prescription, or be subject to regulation by the Court. He thinks it enough to say for the disposal of this part of the case, that the defender is not here vindicating the right of the inhabitants of St Andrews to a bleaching ground, but is asserting a right to play golf in a particular way on a portion of the Links outside the ordinary course. His right to do so either upon the titles alone or upon the titles and prescriptive possession are the issues which he has raised, and, in the opinion of the Sheriff, failed to establish. A special argument with reference to the bleaching servitude was founded upon the terms of the pursuers' lease, which excepts from 'the ground let any portion over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching under the feu-rights of the said Links granted by the town in favour of the proprietor's authors and predecessors, and declares that the said inhabitants shall not be interrupted or molested in exercising such liberty and privilege.' It was argued upon this clause that the present pursuers had no title to sue, in so far as the ground used by them, or part of it, was de facto part of the portion of the Links subject to the servitude of bleaching. This no doubt is the most plausible mode of bringing the bleaching question into the present case. It must be kept in view, however, that bleaching is not practised at all times and seasons, and possibly the clause of exclusion may be qualified by the declaration of its purpose, namely, 'to prevent the inhabitants from being interrupted or molested in exercising the privilege of bleaching.' But however this may be, the clause was evidently inserted for the benefit of persons claiming the bleaching privilege, and for the protection of the proprietor in case any claim was made by them. No claim has been made, and the present judgment will not affect such claim if made by the proper parties. The present position of matters is that the ground in question is not used for bleaching. There are not, as explained in a former part of this note, materials in the present process for defining the limits of the bleaching servitude. Nor is this the proper process for doing so. In these circumstances it does not seem legitimate to the Sheriff for the present defender to use this clause as a defence to the present action. The pursuers are therefore, in the opinion of the Sheriff, entitled to interdict, but the terms in which it is to be granted require careful consideration. The prayer originally was to interdict the defender from 'trespassing and golfing or putting' on the ground in question, or in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers and the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, in the possession of the same. The words 'tre-public right was raised. It was said there was nothing but a possessory question raised, but even in such a question the character of the possession and its origin might be looked at.¹ As a matter of fact the complainers had not had exclusive possession, but, even if they had, it was unlawful, for the title of their author was funditus bad, resting as it did upon an alienation of burgh property by the magistrates. They could not grant any such right, as Grahame's and Sanderson's cases shewed.² Grahame's case was of great importance, because it fortified the respondent in affirming that the conveyance by the magistrates, which was admitted to be under some reservation, must be under the reservation of the public rights over the whole territory, which had been enjoyed by the inhabitants both before the sale and since. A minor point was to be found in this, that the bleaching green which was reserved, i.e., the property of which was reserved from the grant, had been shewn to form part of the ground here in dispute. If that were so, Mr Cheape could not grant the title he was said to have granted, nor could the complainers maintain their case, for the bleaching green was excluded from their lease.

Argued for the complainers;—The Court could pronounce no more than a possessory judgment here, for the proprietor was not a party to the case. The case of *Mealls*³ referred to by the Sheriff was distinguished from the present by the fact that in that case both parties were proprietors of the tenements connected with the servitude claimed. No doubt the complainers must shew a colourable title. They had, however, satisfied that obligation, for in the title of their author, Mr Cheape, only two restrictions were found, and neither of them affected the present case. First, his right of property in the "golf links" was not absolute. But the "golf links" was obviously not co-extensive with Pilmour Links, and as he was a limited owner of the golf links so he was unlimited owner of the rest, and might plough them or let them for what purpose he pleased. That they had in part been cropped was proved by the interlocutor of the Court in 1806.⁴ Even if the course was not defined by the titles it would be restrained by the Court within reasonable limits, as in the Earlsferry case,⁵ passing and' were deleted by amendment before the record was closed, and the pursuers explained at the debate that by the word 'golfing' was meant only putting or playing the short game. An interdict should, however, be free from any possible ambiguity, and the right of following the ball in the ordinary game is not intended, any more than walking on this part of the Links, to be prohibited. The only things which the defender is prohibited from doing are playing the short game at the set of holes and on the ground prepared and kept up by and at the expense of the Ladies' Club outwith the ordinary course, and from interfering with the members of the Ladies' Club in their play. The interdict will accordingly be slightly modified in its terms. The Sheriff has considered whether this modification and the original prayer having been too wide should lead to any modification of expenses, but the defender having failed in the substantial issue in the case, which he himself raised, the Sheriff is of opinion that he must bear the whole expenses."

where an undoubted right of golfing over the whole links was limited to a reasonable course. The same principle had been approved by the House of Lords in the recent St Andrews case.¹ Whatever incapacity there might have been in the magistrates to sell the Links had been cured by the long prescription, but it could not be maintained that magistrates were absolutely incapacitated from selling the town's patrimony; that depended on circumstances, for where there was a vast stretch of land it would be absurd to retain it all for amusement. The second restriction had reference to the bleaching green. On the evidence that had been shewn to be outside this piece of ground, but in addition the reservation was the reservation of a privilege merely, with which the complainers had no desire to meddle. If the complainers had shewn a colourable title they had shewn also peaceful possession. It had been said that the present case involved an important question of public right. That was not so, for there were several other places on the Links where the respondent might play as he pleased.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case relating to certain proceedings as to the Links of St Andrews. The pursuers of the action are the representatives of a certain association called the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, the object of which is to provide and maintain a green for the playing of the short game of golf by the ladies who are members, and to secure not only that the ground shall be made fit for that purpose, but that there shall be a certain amount of protection and privacy in the pursuit of the game. That is the object of the association, and although called a ladies' club, it is an association to which men as well as ladies are elected. The persons who make this application to the Sheriff are members and office-bearers of this club, and the object of the application is to prevent the defender from using the ground in question for the purpose of playing the short game, and from obstructing the members of the club and the persons who have the charge or control of the green in the exercise of what they regard as their proper rights.

It seems that the title of this club, and of their representatives and office-bearers, who are the pursuers of the action, to the ground in question is a lease to the club from the tenant of Mr Cheape, the proprietor, who holds a title to the Links as a whole. The direct right on the part of the association is that of tenants under a sublease granted by the agricultural tenant of a certain portion of the Links for the purposes I have mentioned. I do not know that we have any distinct statement as to the actual extent of the ground, but out of a large portion of waste ground running along the sea-margin for a couple of miles or so, I suppose there cannot be more than a couple of hundred yards which are dedicated to the purposes of this Ladies' Association. The defender, Mr Denham, appears on the part of himself and the public, and he says that as a member of the public he is entitled when he pleases, and as he pleases, to walk over this portion of the Links, and use it for playing golf or in any other way in which it is capable of being used, and that the members of the association have no right, and that the tenant has no right, to exclude anybody from any part of the Links for such purposes.

I must say that I regret that a question of this kind, which really after all is nothing but a social dispute, and involves no practical or substantial right that

I can see, should have been made the subject of litigation. It appears to me— and I make the remark with reference to both sides—that a little tact, a little gentleness, and a little good feeling on either side, might have adjusted this very keen dispute without the intervention of a Court of law. But since we have it here, we must decide it.

Denham.

On the whole matter, I agree with the Sheriff, and substantially on the grounds on which he has placed his judgment. I shall only make one or two remarks on the more salient points.

In the first place, I think that it is not unimportant to keep in view that there is no large legal question here involved—I mean no right of a substantial interest. Mr Denham does not say that he himself suffers any injury through what is being done. He does not say—at all events he could hardly say—he wants to play on this ground at the short holes, for he says in his record, and he has led proof to establish it, that this part of the Links is used as a bleaching green, which of course he does not mean to use for the purpose of playing golf, for it would then be as much interfered with by him as by this association. That is not the nature of his case. He says that the public have a general right, a jus spatiandi, over the whole of these Links, and that nobody is entitled to obstruct him or them in the exercise of that right.

In the next place, this is a possessory question, and the question to be answered is, Has there been possession upon the alleged right, and for what period? The right itself, as I have already had occasion to remark, depends upon the lease which the agricultural tenant granted to this Ladies' Club. The lease is dated 15th and 18th February and 2d March 1881, and it professes to proceed between George Clarke Cheape, Esquire, of Strathtyrum, proprietor of Pilmour Links, with consent of John Millar, sometime residing at Luthrie House, by Cupar, the tenant of the said Links, of the first part, in favour of trustees for behoof of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, on the second part. Therefore both proprietor and tenant unite in giving this right. The ground is described as lying on the east side of the golf course. The period of entry was at Martinmas 1880, and the lease was to endure for seven years. But there is this exception—"But excepting from the said piece of ground hereby let any portion thereof over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching under the feu-rights of the said Links granted by the Town-council of St Andrews in favour of the said proprietor's authors and predecessors, and declaring that the said inhabitants shall not be interrupted or molested in exercising such liberty and privilege, and also that burgesses of the city of St Andrews standing on the stant-roll alienarly shall have power and liberty to cast and win divots on said piece of ground for the purposes specified in said feu-rights, conform to use and wont, . . . which piece of ground hereby let is to be made use of for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow, but by no others." As far as a direct right is concerned, I assume that this right of occupation for five years and use for the purposes therein described is sufficient. Whether the tenant and proprietor had a right to grant it is another affair; but that there is an ostensible apparent colourable title on the part of the persons who have made this application seems to be undoubted. The defence to the action is substantially a defence to the effect that there was no power on the part either of the tenant or the proprietor to grant the right, but if there has

No. 131. been possession on that title, I think it doubtful whether this is a relevant plea on the part of the defender.

St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

This Ladies' Association has now existed for twenty years. It was formed in 1867, and it has remained in the exercise of these or similar rights ever since, and that without any challenge, and therefore I think that it may very fairly be maintained that in this possessory action the grantees, the Ladies' Association, were entitled to maintain their title till the title of their authors had been directly challenged and set aside. I do not think it necessary to found very strongly upon that view, however, because apart from it I can see no ground upon which the prayer of this petition can be refused.

As regards the right of Mr Cheape, the proprietor, and the agricultural tenant to grant this right, the question seems to stand thus :—It is not pretended, and cannot be pretended, that the agricultural tenant is bound to keep the Links which are under his lease free from all obstruction to persons who were walking on the Links. There are two conditions in his title, and of any breach of them no doubt the public would be entitled to complain. But beyond that, I imagine that for the fair purposes for which the lease was granted, it is impossible to say that he was bound to prevent all obstructions to the public using the Links. The reverse is quite manifest, because he is entitled to plough up the ground—he is entitled to use it for cropping. There was no restriction of any kind or description upon that use of the ground. The restrictions which do exist are, in the first place, that the tenant must not interfere with the golfing course, and secondly, that he must not interfere with the bleaching green. Apart from these restrictions he is entitled to crop the ground and to use it for any purpose available to an agricultural tenant holding the ground. If that be so, then this proposition on the part of the defender must be thrown aside. The defender has no right to say that he has an absolute right to walk over every part of this ground. He may walk over it if it is not used for a purpose which renders walking over it improper or inexpedient, but the right of the proprietor, and of the tenant acting in the proprietor's right, entitled them to possess and enjoy the ground in all respects not inconsistent with the rights of golfing and bleaching belonging to the inhabitants.

This is not the first time that the nature of these golfing links has been the subject of judicial inquiry. As far back as 1814 there was a case with a predecessor of Mr Cheape's, the well known case of Dempster v. Cleghorn, which went to the House of Lords, 2 Dow's App. 40. The complaint there was on the part of the persons acting for the golfing public, that an inroad of rabbits had taken place in consequence of the tenant's operations, which threatened to destroy the golfing-course itself, and put an end to the enjoyment of the inhabitants in that particular. That case came to an end apparently by the rabbits coming to an end. But there are some remarks by Lord Eldon in remitting the case to this Court that are not unworthy of notice. The title of the Dempsters was substantially conceived in the same terms as those which we have here, and Lord Eldon made this remark about the right of the public as in a question with the proprietor and tenant after stating all the views that had been suggested on the part of the complainer,—“But the question was whether the right to play golf was not to be enjoyed only consistently with all the uses to which the land could be properly applied,” and he goes on,—“The strong impression on my mind was that this right could not be supported to the extent of depriving the defenders of the use of their property.” So I conclude that if the golf course is kept unimpaired.

and the bleaching is not interfered with, there is no such limit as the defender contends for to the proprietor's or tenant's use of the subject. It is not the law of the case, and it is not the nature or principle of the right that the tenant can do nothing to prevent the public from walking over such parts of the Links as are neither part of the golfing course nor of the bleaching green. Ladies' Golf
Denham.

Some criticisms have been made on Mr Cheape's title and the tenant's title as to what the golfing links consist of. Mr Cheape's right comprehends a larger area than the golfing links. The "golfing links" mean the golf course, and the tenant is taken bound not to plough that up, implying that he may plough up the rest. The bleaching green again is protected, and the tenant has no right to encroach on it. If there were any good ground of complaint on the part of the bleachers, that would be a breach of this condition on which the ground is held. Something also was said implying that the magistrates had no right to bestow on Mr Dempster—Mr Cheape's predecessor—or on Mr Cheape, anything of the kind—that the public had entire control of the Links. I am afraid it is too late to maintain that. The long possession is sufficient, at all events, for this case.

Now, if all that be so, the next question is—Does the use of this ground, let for the purposes I have mentioned to the Ladies' Club, interfere with golfing, or with the bleaching to which the inhabitants are entitled? I am of opinion that it is proved, as clearly as anything can be proved, that playing the short game on this ground does not interfere in the slightest degree with the golfing course. There has been no complaint from any quarter that it does, and the description of the Links which we have in the evidence makes that very plain. If by any chance a high wind is blowing, a ball may be blown on to the ladies' ground, and the golfer may have to follow it in order to play it off; but beyond that there has been no interference with the public, and there cannot well be, because the ladies' course is between the general course and the sea, in a detached and remote portion of the Links. Then, if that is so, what is the complaint? It is simply this, that Mr Denham is not allowed to go upon the course which has been made on behalf of the Ladies' Club, and is prevented from playing golf there. But the question is, whether it was a reasonable use for the tenant or proprietor to set apart this piece of ground, which did not interfere with the bleaching green in any reasonable way, for the purpose of securing the comfort and privacy which were essential if the objects of the Ladies' Club were to be carried out. I think it was, and when I find that this use has existed for twenty years, and that no injury, intelligible or stateable, has been sustained by anyone; when I find, on the contrary, that it has been found to be a proper and pleasant mode of enabling ladies to take part in the great social staple, if I may so say, of St Andrews, I must own that I do not come to the consideration of the question with any prejudice or bias in favour of the defender. It seems to me that it was an unnecessary question to raise, and that there is no substantial interest involved in it. But, apart from that, I am of opinion that this was a just and legal use of the tenant's right and possession. I will not say what the case might have been if the ground had been of any material extent. That might have raised another question, but that the tenant might for his own use have set apart a lawn-tennis ground, for example, or a cricket ground, or anything of that kind, I do not for a moment doubt, or he might have enclosed a part of it and put it under crop, without making himself liable to interference on the part of the public. Although the case here in question is not of the nature of an agricultural use, I think the tenant's right of possession, as long as his landlord is satisfied, is amply sufficient to maintain him in what he has done.

That is the general view of the case which I take. The question is an interesting one, and I think it has been well decided by the Sheriff.

LORD YOUNG.—If the appellant has no legal right to go upon the piece of ground in question, or (assuming his right to go upon it) has no right to play the short game of golf upon it, he may no doubt be interdicted from going, or playing as the case may be, at the instance of the proprietor or any other having lawful title to prevent him. But the interdict complained of is—from playing the short game of golf on the ground—"or from in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers and the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club in the possession or occupation of the said piece of ground for the purpose of playing the putting or short game of golf." Now this language which I have quoted from the Sheriff's interlocutor creates a confusion of which I think the case ought to be cleared. If the question regards the appellant's right to be on the ground at all, it is simple enough, whatever difficulty there may be in answering it. If again it assumes his right to go upon it, and only negatives his right to play short golf on it, it is still simple, although the answer may be more difficult. But if it is only sought to negative his right to "interfere with and disturb" others in making a similar use of it—I have to observe that the appellant never asserted, and before us distinctly disclaimed any such right, so that there is no question before us at all, and we should only have to recall this negative by interdict of a right to interfere with and disturb others, which was never asserted.

I did what I could in the course of the argument, but unsuccessfully, to bring the case to a single issue. The respondents' counsel seemed to me to maintain their case thus, 1st, The appellant is not entitled to go on the ground at all; 2d, at least he is not entitled to play short golf on it; 3d, and still further, at least he is not entitled to disturb or interfere with the members of the Ladies' Golf Club in so playing, and has in fact done so or asserted a right to do so. Each of these three contentions was of course accompanied by the further contention, that the respondents are entitled to prevent him by interdict at their instance.

The ground which is thus sought to be fenced and protected by interdict is a part of the Links of St Andrews, not enclosed or defined by any natural or apparent boundaries. Something was said in the course of the argument about its being formed ground. It is not formed ground in any sense. The outside limit of the expenditure on it may have been £10 for many years; and it may have cost a few pounds to clear away hillocks and whins, but ground formed so as to present a different appearance from the rest of the Links it is not. The limits of it, however, are capable of being ascertained by measurement. It was in 1881 let by the proprietor of the Links to three gentlemen "on behalf of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club," for seven years from Martinmas 1880, "for the purpose of golfing or putting," but terminable by the proprietor at any term of Martinmas on a month's notice. These lessees are the pursuers of this action, and their title is the lease. They have no other.

It is therefore to be observed at the outset that the pursuers' only title, terminable at any term of Martinmas on a month's notice, absolutely expires at Martinmas 1887. The Sheriff nevertheless is at pains to inform us that he has not considered or dealt with the case as of a possessory character to protect the pursuers against disturbance while their very temporary and indeed precarious title subsists, but as involving the decision of a question between the proprietor of the Links of St Andrews and the public. St Andrews
Club v.
Denham.

It is a feature of the case, and in my opinion of first-rate importance, that the defender does not question the pursuers' right to use the ground let to them for the purpose specified in their lease, but on the contrary admits it, and, as I have already noticed, does not assert, but emphatically repudiates, any right on his part to interfere with or disturb them when so using it. It is not indeed averred or suggested by the pursuers on the record that the defender denied their right thus to use the ground, or that he ever interfered with or disturbed them when so using it, or threatened to do so. The only case presented to us by the pursuers on the record is that by their lease this piece of ground is club premises, from which accordingly the club is entitled to exclude all who are not members of the club; and the defender's only case is a denial of this, together of course with the affirmative contention (on which indeed the denial rests), that the ground is part of the public Links of St Andrews, and incapable of being made club premises with an exclusive right of use by the club members. I think this so important in the case that I must take leave to direct attention to the pursuers' condescendence. Their only averments regarding the defender's conduct are in art. 4, and this is the averment upon which they justify their application for interdict to prevent him interfering with or disturbing them,—“On or about the 13th day of June 1885 the defender, after being duly warned by Thomas Morris, golf-club maker, St Andrews, the custodier of said golf course, golfed or putted on the said piece of ground or golf course, and refused to desist, although requested by Morris to do so. Counter statements denied.” There is not another averment about him, except that he is not a member of the golf club. Let me also call attention to the only evidence regarding his conduct upon which this interdict—which I should myself have regarded as of an offensive character—is asked. In the first place let me take the account of Mr Morris, the custodier of the club; he says,—“I don't remember ever seeing Denham playing on the ladies' ground before 13th June 1885.” He had played there often before, but Mr Morris says he does not remember ever having seen him. Therefore the conduct in respect of which he is challenged in this action is his conduct on 13th June, and here it is in Mr Morris' words,—“He was at my shop door, which is nearly opposite the ladies' ground, that day. Somebody spoke about some ladies having been asked to go off the ladies' ground, and Denham asked me whether I would check him. I said I would if he went and played there. He said he would go, and he went with Robert Kirk and played on the ladies' ground. I asked him if he was a member of the club, and he said, No. I asked him to go away, and he said, No, he would not go. I don't know if he said he had a right to be there. I told him I would report him to the secretary of the club.” Then here is his own account of it, which I think it not unimportant to attend to. “In June 1885”—that is the 13th of June, for it is obviously the same day—“the wife of the town-clerk of Musselburgh and another lady were ordered off. I was very angry, and I told Tom Morris he ought not to attack strangers—he ought to attack me. He said he would report me if I played there. I went and borrowed a club and played. I was reported, and then these proceedings were taken." Now, these passages constitute the whole averments and evidence upon which this application is founded. I think, therefore, that it is impossible to doubt that the action was brought in order to have this question, and no less or inferior question tried and decided—the question namely, whether they were entitled to prevent him from playing there at all, even when they were not there themselves, and when their playing could not by possibility be interfered with or disturbed.

But this is manifestly a very large question, and of interest to the proprietor of the Links on the one hand, and the people of St Andrews, and indeed the public at large, on the other. Is it fitting that it should be tried between the parties before us, and determined by a judgment which cannot be other than ephemeral? Had the pursuers presented a case of any rude, or even unmannerly, acts and conduct of the defender, whereby they were interfered with or disturbed when playing on the ground, it would I think have been one of another character from that which they have presented.

I should myself have been disposed, in this case and between these parties, to decline deciding this large legal question involving the considerations of title-deeds and evidence of ancient possession and usage continued to the present day, and affecting the proprietor, the burgh of St Andrews, and the public at large. But if this question is to be entered on and decided to any effect whatever, I think it right to say at the outset that we must be on our guard against allowing our minds to be affected by any such consideration as that right feeling ought to restrain any individual or number of individuals from throwing obstacles in the way of the appropriation of an inconsiderable part of these public links (assuming them to be public) to the exclusive use of a Ladies' Golf Club. It is indeed called a Ladies' Golf Club, but it consists of 1000 members, of whom only one-half may be ladies, the other half being men. There are obvious enough considerations on both sides of the question of good feeling. Ladies and their male companions for the time when playing any game on open public ground will always be treated courteously and allowed all proper precedence by gentlemen, and there is no averment, suggestion, or trace of evidence that any such courtesy was violated by the defender. On the other hand, the assertion of an exclusive right or privilege on open public ground by the members of a private self-constituted club is not unnaturally regarded as invidious, and resisted accordingly. But I repeat that in my opinion we cannot take any account of this topic in considering what is the legal character of the ground, and the rights of the public over it looking to the titles and the usage.

The Links of St Andrews are very well and generally known. They consist of a tract of rough and comparatively barren ground, extending to some hundreds of acres quite open and unenclosed. They may have been, and no doubt were, diminished in extent by enclosing and cultivating, and even building on, parts at periods more or less remote. Of such diminution of area I take no account. It has occurred with regard to all open ground, not unfrequently in gross violation of the rights of the public, and still more frequently of the inhabitants of burghs and towns. In such cases where the inclosure and appropriation to private use has existed for the prescriptive period, any original wrong, however clear, is irremediable. There are familiar instances of this in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, Musselburgh, and many other places. I accordingly confine my attention and observations to the open and unenclosed Links of St Andrews as now existing. To these the inhabitants of St Andrews and the public at large have always had access—free and unrestricted for all purposes of legitimate and healthy recreation and amusement, the proprietor taking no other use of them than such pasturage as did not interfere with the public use. The most notable public use has been playing golf—for which a course has always been marked off—a course being necessary for the game. But the course has been varied and extended from time to time, according to the exigencies of the day, and the course is no limit to the players any more than to the balls which the players follow over the Links to any distance off it—playing back from wherever the ball alights. Nor is it, so far as I can see, anything to the purpose to say that only bad players or bad shots send the balls far off the line of the course—for bad players are probably as numerous as good, and bad shots are certainly as much part of the game as good shots. Over the whole Links there is, and always has been, all sorts of exercise and recreation by grown people, boys, and children,—walking, running, leaping, football playing, sitting, lying, lounging,—indeed, every thing that the public may do without manifest impropriety on perfectly open and unrestricted ground.

Now, what is the first and leading proposition of the pursuers which they ask us to affirm as essential (according to this their first and leading contention) to the interdict which they ask? It is that this public use of the Links from time immemorial and continued without question or interruption down to the present time, has been, and is, not of right, but by the mere tolerance and permission of the proprietor, and revocable by him at pleasure. I asked whether there was any distinction between the piece of ground immediately in question and the rest of the Links, and the answer was, None whatever, with perhaps the exception of the marked-out golf course. Again, I asked if there was any distinction between Mr Denham (the defender) and any other man, and the answer was, None. The pursuers' counsel accordingly faced the proposition, and maintained it, that their lessors may, if their lease is good, exclude the public from the whole Links, except, perhaps, from the golf course. When, therefore, the pursuers defend and maintain the exclusive right and privilege which, as they contend, their lease gives them by pleading the lessor's title, they must, and in fact do, carry their argument on that title the length which I have now stated. And indeed it is clear that if (leaving out of view the golf course) the proprietor of the Links may, by virtue of his property title, make club premises of the piece of ground in question for the privileged exclusive use of the pursuers, he may also deal in the same manner with the whole Links and make them all club premises, with the like privileged and exclusive use granted to a club or any number of clubs, or he may, for it is really the same proposition, take them all into his own occupation and exclude the public therefrom either by a wall or by an interdict, or by making a use of them, as by building, which would exclude any public resort or use such as has heretofore been enjoyed.

The argument is that the lessor's title is a fee-simple property title, and that the terms of it are not such as to put him under any restriction or limitation as to the use of it, or to permit the continuance longer than he sees fit of the use hitherto made of it by the inhabitants of St Andrews and the public. I have examined the title, and do not think this proposition by any means clear, and, on the contrary, looking to the source from which it came, viz., the Magistrates of St Andrews, and the proved and, indeed, admitted fact that, with respect to the whole Links now open and unenclosed, there has never been any interference with the public use, I incline to the opinion that it is unsound. There is much in the title which admits of and requires construction, and the actual use and possession which has been had of the subject of it ever since its date may, as between the parties to it,—I mean the Magistrates of St Andrews and the present owner,—be appealed to as influencing the construction. I cannot pronounce it a prima facie unsound argument, that neither the inhabitants of St Andrews nor the public shall be prejudiced by the mere existence of a grant, in whatever form, which was never used to their prejudice, their actual use, and enjoyment never being interfered with. But neither the magistrates (the authors of the title, and the proper guardians of the public rights) nor the proprietor by the title are before us, and although they will certainly not be affected by any decision we pronounce as a judgment making a res judicata binding on them, yet they will be, and the one or other very prejudicially, by a decision in this Court of the very question between them, or in which they are interested as involved in the determination of this paltry, and I rather think personal dispute between the parties actually before us. I must therefore decline for myself to take part in the decision of this large question which the pursuers' counsel argued before us as essential to the remedy asked, or to say more on it than I have done. Indeed, I have said so much only to point out its extent and importance and the inexpediency,—I venture to think, the impropriety,—of entertaining an application by a party whose right is so temporary that it will expire in about six months, for an interdict the granting of which would involve the decision of it.

I have spoken of the respondents as “lessees,” and perhaps the name is not inappropriate. But I have to point out that they are not lessees of land. The land was already let for pasture (and it could be let for nothing else), and what the respondents call their lease is in truth and legal effect nothing more than a permission, which the owner and pasture tenant concur in giving them to play a certain game on it. The words are, “which piece of ground hereby let is to be made use of for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of the St Andrews Golf Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow, but by no others.” To say that the ground is let, and that the respondents are tenants of the ground is, I think, an erroneous use of language. Is it doubtful that a simple leave or permission written on a card or slip of paper to play golf or to put on the ground would have had exactly the same effect? The words “but by no others” are curiously introduced, but the meaning may perhaps be taken to be that the lessors warrant the lessees against the existence of any right in others to golf or put on the ground.

But is this a kind of right to which the doctrine of possessory judgment is applicable? for this is the doctrine to which the respondents' appeal in the alternative and minor view of their case. I venture to think not. In the first place, their lease gives them no title whatever to exclude others from the ground, and they have never attempted to do so, though the ground is a place of common resort by the public at large, and with seats erected on it for the use of all comers. In the second place, the respondents' right to golf and put on the ground is not questioned, and so requires no protection by possessory judgment, even if that remedy were otherwise applicable. In the third place, it is, to me at least, a novel proposition that such a warranty by the lessor, as I have assumed to be imported by the words “but by no others” can be the ground

warranty against the grantor of it.

But the respondents' enjoyment—for I think the term "possession" inapplicable—of the exclusive permission which they allege to have been guaranteed to them, has not been peaceable and uninterrupted—not that they were ever hindered from making the use permitted to them, but that their claim to hinder others was not by any means universally or even generally allowed or assented to. But it is this claim to exclude others which is alone in dispute, and for the vindication of which alone the protection of a possessory judgment is claimed. The facts proved are in my opinion sufficient to negative it. It is said that no other—no inhabitant of St Andrews or member of the public has a title which can prima facie compete with their permission from the proprietor. But this, it will be observed, is simply returning to the argument on the proprietor's title as exclusive of any right in the inhabitants of St Andrews or the public, which, if sound, requires no aid from the doctrine of possessory judgment. Apart from that argument, the public have a prima facie right founded on the possession and usage of ages.

May 13, 1887.
St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

I may say that I am unable for any practical purpose in the case before us to distinguish between long golf and short golf. I regard both as simply golf, which may, I suppose, be lawfully played in various ways. The use prescribed in the respondents' lease is "golfing or putting," and the name of the club is the Ladies' "Golf Club." The right asserted, if good at all, must, I think, be good for "golf" in general. No principle was stated to us, and none occurs to me, on which the proprietor of the Links may appropriate a part or the whole of them (excepting "perhaps" the existing golf course) to the exclusive use of clubs or individuals for short golf, but not for long golf. I must therefore regard the respondents as contending and struggling for the proposition that the proprietor of these Links is legally entitled to appropriate the whole or any part of them to the exclusive use and enjoyment of such persons or clubs as he may from time to time be pleased to favour. This, in my opinion, is the proposition which, as urged by the respondents on their temporary and precarious permission, the appellant resists, and which he is, in my opinion, justified and well founded in resisting.

I am of opinion that the judgment granting interdict ought to be recalled, and that the application ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The history of this case is fully related by the Sheriff in the note annexed to his interlocutor, and it will not be necessary for me to present anything like a full recapitulation of the facts as introductory to the grounds of my opinion. A comparatively brief statement of some particulars seems to be all that is required.

The pursuers are the trustees of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and to them in that character there was granted in February 1881 a lease for seven years from Martinmas 1880, by Mr Cheape of Strathclyde, the proprietor of the Links, of the piece of ground described in the record, the purpose for which this was granted being that the ground so let is to be made use of for golfing or putting by the members of that club, and by such other persons as the club may allow, but by no others. There was excepted, however, from the said ground "any portion thereof over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching under the feu-rights of

No. 131. the said Links granted by the Town-Council of St Andrews in favour of the proprietor's authors and predecessors." An earlier lease of what was substantially the same subject was for the same purpose granted to the trustees of the Ladies' Club in 1868. That lease was for seven years, and from its expiry the right thereby conferred was continued by tacit relocation till the lease still current was granted. Possession of the ground was taken, and has been continued till the present time, peaceably and without any interruption. The ground was put into order at considerable expense, and the funds of the club were the source from which this cost was defrayed. There was no contributory outside the club. Shortly prior to the institution of the present action, which was brought in June 1885, the appellant made pretensions to participation in the use of the ground which had been thus converted into a green for putting, or for the short game of golf. This the club thought an intrusion, and it was complained of, but was persevered in, and the defender not only played round the course himself, but sent friends who happened to be visitors to him at St Andrews to enjoy themselves on this green. The consequence was that Morris, the keeper, turned them off, and it was for the purpose of preventing such disagreeable occurrences that the present action was instituted. The Sheriff has given interdict, not precisely in the terms prayed for in the pursuers' petition, but in the terms set forth near the end of his interlocutor. He "interdicts the defender from playing the putting or short game of golf on the piece of ground described in the prayer of the petition, or from in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers and the members of the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club in the possession or occupation of the said piece of ground, for the purpose of playing the putting or short game of golf." The pursuers are satisfied with what the Sheriff has done, but the defender is not satisfied, the consequence being the present appeal at his instance to this Court for a review of the interlocutor.

I agree in the result at which the Sheriff has arrived, and adopt most, if not all, of the grounds on which he has proceeded. But the judgment, I think, ought merely to be of a possessory character, which indeed was all that was asked or expected by the pursuers, for it is explained by the Sheriff that the pursuers put their case chiefly, indeed almost exclusively, upon their right to a possessory judgment. But he adds that their proof also covers the prescriptive period, and in this situation he thought, having in view the case of Gow's Trustees, 28th May 1875, 2 R. 729, that it was not only right but necessary for him, in fulfilment of the relative provision of the Sheriff Court Act, 1878, to pronounce what should be an ultimate judgment upon the rights of those concerned in the litigation. The Sheriff, however, in so concluding, overlooked the manifest distinction between the present case and the case of Gow's Trustees. In the latter case both competing proprietors were parties to the action. In the present case the proprietor is not a party, and any judgment effectually to be an ultimate judgment on the question or questions in controversy would not, for this plain reason, be obligatory upon the proprietor of the Links. The plain course is to deal with the case as one in which all that is asked or ought to be granted is a possessory judgment.

Upon the proof it is plain that the Ladies' Golf Club, represented by the pursuers, have been in possession of the ground in question for the last eighteen years, and indeed this was not disputed, but on the contrary was admitted by the counsel for the defender. Possession, however, is of itself not all that is required to make out a right to a possessory judgment. There must be a competent title as well as possession. And in truth the controversy between the parties is not whether there has been possession, but whether the title on which possession has followed, is available as a ground on which they have a right to be protected till the contrary is established in an action of reduction or declarator, or one where the two are combined.

St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

The chief ground on which the pursuers' title is objected to is the reservation from the lease of any portion of said ground over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching under the feu-rights of the said Links granted by the Town-Council of St Andrews in favour of the proprietor's authors and predecessors. None of the ground in question has been claimed by anyone as a portion of the bleaching green, and before the lease to the pursuers could be invalidated by this reservation it behoved to be shewn by those who founded upon this clause that the bleaching green, or a portion of it, was within the ground. There has been a proof upon this subject, and the result, as I think, is that this part of the defender's case has not been established. But, besides, there has been the possession of the pursuers. Not only has there been no bleaching, but there has been possession by the pursuers of such a kind as excludes the idea that any part of what was let to them was part or parcel of the bleaching ground, marked by march-stones, which was reserved by the magistrates from their feu-disposition to the Dempsters, who are the authors of the present proprietors of the ground. This last consideration is of itself decisive, for continuous, uninterrupted, peaceable possession for the period requisite to give right to a possessory judgment leads presumptively to the conclusion that the bleaching green referred to was outside the ground leased to the pursuers.

The defender further pleads the invalidity of the lease, maintaining that the ground in question forming part of the Links of St Andrews, otherwise called Pilmour Links, was conveyed to Mr Cheape's predecessor, and was held by him under the condition that no part of the said golf links should be ploughed up at any time, but that the same should be reserved entirely as it had been in times past for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants of St Andrews and others. There are obvious grounds for which this plea in this action must be rejected. In the first place, the right of the pursuers to a possessory judgment cannot be affected by anything which is presented in this plea. The landlord had a title; he granted a lease to the defenders, which formed a title; and there is the possession on both titles. In the second place, the ground in question is not part of the golf links. There is evidence as to this. The Sheriff went and he viewed the ground; and on consideration of the case as presented in the proof and in the Sheriff's explanatory note, it is plain to me that what I have just stated and what he has found is the true conclusion.

In this plea the defender also contends that Pilmour Links were reserved entirely as they had been in times past for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants of St Andrews and others who should resort thither for the game of golf. An examination of the feu-disposition to the Dempsters suggests, or rather shews, that Pilmour Links and the golf links do not cover the same area. They are different things—the one being larger than the other—the golf links, in other words, being within Pilmour Links. This interpretation is not new. It is that which is involved in the decision of the case of Paterson, 27th July

 May 13, 1887. St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club v. Denham.
 "Then it is said you must leave untouched everything outside of that course which can be shewn to be a part of the Links to which a ball may be driven in playing the game of golf. I entirely demur to that proposition. The contention to which I am prepared to give effect really comes to this, that whatever is outside the proper golfing course may be turned to various purposes, so long as these are not inconsistent with the game of golf." The ground in question is admittedly,—at any rate upon the clearest evidence must be held to be,—outside of the golfing links. To play upon this putting ground does not interfere with the play of those who follow the regular game, and therefore there is not even a plausible pretext for this part of the contention which the defender has urged.

These, shortly stated, are the views of the case on which I proceed, and they seem to me to be full justification of the interlocutor of the Sheriff, against which the defender has appealed to this Court. There is, I think, no difficulty whatever in the way of such a decision.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The lands called Pilmour belonged at one time to the patrimony of St Andrews, but they were sold to the Messrs Dempster in 1799, and were acquired about 1820 by Mr Cheape of Strathtyrum, to whom they now belong.

In the disposition to the Dempsters there was reserved to the town of St Andrews the bleaching ground to the west of the Swilkin Burn, as marked out by march-stones, on which the inhabitants of St Andrews were to have the right and privilege of bleaching. It was contended by the defender that the ground itself was excepted from the conveyance. But in my opinion this is not the true construction of the disposition. I think that nothing more was reserved than a servitude. I notice this matter, as some argument was founded on it, though in my judgment it has little relation to the question which we have to decide.

The disposition contains a further reservation, which is thus expressed:—"Under the reservation always that no hurt or damage shall be done thereby to the golf links; nor shall it be in the power of any proprietor of said Pilmour Links to plough up any part of said golf links in all time coming, but the same shall be reserved entirely, as it has been in times past, for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants who shall resort thither for that amusement."

The same reservations are contained in the title of Mr Cheape, and though he is not a party to this process, it may be taken as certain that they are binding on him. As I have already said, we are not concerned with the servitude of bleaching. The matter with which we have to deal is the right or privilege of golfing, which is reserved to the inhabitants of St Andrews and others who may resort to the Links for that amusement.

After Mr Cheape had acquired the lands of Pilmour, or, as they are otherwise called, the Pilmour Links, a plan of these Links was prepared by A. Martin, surveyor, dated 8th December 1821, "with the golfing course thereon, as marked off with stones." It is probable that the golfing course so defined was the part of the Pilmour Links on which the public were at that time accustomed to play golf. It is certain that, with some trifling exceptions which it is not necessary to notice, the public have since that time been in use to play golf on this course, and on no other part of Pilmour Links. It is true, as we are informed, that from the unskilfulness of the player, or from the force of the wind, the ball is sometimes driven beyond the course, and that on these occasions it is played from the place where it lies. I see no reason to doubt that in doing so the player is within his right. The golfing course was defined as the part of the Links on which the game was to be played, but having regard to the inveterate usage I do not think that we can be called to construe the limitation so strictly as to hold that the player may not play his ball from a place beyond the course when from the causes to which I have alluded it may lie beyond it.

occa-St Andrews
Ladies' Golf
Club v.
Denham.

With the qualifications to which I have referred, the game of golf has been strictly confined to the golfing course. I cannot doubt that the golfing course is not coextensive with the Pilmour Links. The whole usage which has followed on the conveyance of 1799 is inconsistent with that idea; and the expression of the disposition itself is equally inconsistent with it. For the proprietor of Pilmour Links is prohibited from doing any damage to the golf links and from ploughing any part of the said golf links, prohibitions which in my judgment cannot by possibility be extended to the whole subjects which were conveyed.

As Mr Cheape is not a party to this process we cannot determine what his rights are, or what are the rights of the public. But, prima facie, and in the absence of the proper parties, I can say no more. The right of the public to play golf is confined to the golfing course, with such aberrations, as I may call them, as are incidental to the game. This has been the usage, and for the purposes of this case I take the usage to be the measure of the public right.

Some twenty years ago Mr Cheape let a portion of the Links to certain gentlemen, as trustees of the Ladies' Golf Club, with the exclusive right of playing what is called the short or putting game of golf thereon. It is quite certain that this ground does not form part of the golfing course. Indeed, the defender does not say that it does. The ground so let was made suitable for the practice of the game, and it was somewhat enlarged by the present lease, which was granted in 1881. I think that it has been proved that the members of the club have been in the exclusive possession of the right or privilege which they acquired by the leases. It is possible that persons other than members of club have played on the ground so let. But this has been so exceptional that to my mind it requires no notice. It is certain that no right could be thereby acquired, and it is equally certain that the public have had no possession of which they would be deprived by the interdict which is asked by the pursuers.

The defender conceived that he had a right to play the short game of golf on the ground let to the pursuers, and in that belief he proceeded to play it. I do not question his good faith. I believe that he honestly thought that he was entitled to do so. He was warned off, and as he insisted on his right the present action was raised.

It seems to me that the defender cannot succeed unless he can shew that the public have a right to play golf elsewhere than on the usual golfing course. He contends for this right. But from what I have said it will be seen that I see no ground for thinking that such a right exists. It is possible that it may, notwithstanding the usage to the contrary, but if it does the defender must establish the existence of it in a declarator to which Mr Cheape is a party. This is a mere possessory action. We cannot determine any question of right. We can only maintain the possession as it has been in the by-past years.

In saying that the defender has no right to play golf except on the usual golf course, I do not dispossess him of any right of which he or any member of the public has been in possession. It is said that the public have been in use to walk over the whole of the Pilmour Links without restraint. Probably that may be true. But whether they have done so in the exercise of a right or by the tolerance of the proprietor, I cannot judge. No such question can be raised or determined in the present process. But this jus spatiandi, if it exist, is a very different thing from playing golf, and though the one may belong to the public the other may not. It is enough for me that our judgment is limited to the playing of golf on the ground in question, and in interdicting the defender from doing so we do not interfere with any other right which he may possess.

It was urged that the ground over which the pursuers claimed right included a portion of the bleaching green, and that it is not included in their lease. I do not think that this is so. But we are not much concerned with this question. There is no complaint that the right of bleaching has been interfered with. If the contentions of the defender were well founded, it would only prove that the pursuers had no title to a small portion of the ground on which they are in use to play, but the defender would take no benefit thereby. The true question is whether the defender can play golf beyond the usual course, and inconsistently with the settled usage; this I think he cannot do.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the golfing course of the Links of St Andrews is defined and marked out by march-stones; (2) that the piece of ground described in the prayer of the petition does not form part of the course; (3) that since the term of Martinmas 1880 the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, the association represented by the pursuers, has had exclusive possession of the said piece of ground under a lease granted by the proprietor thereof to the pursuers, and had such possession during the thirteen years preceding the said term under a missive of lease with him: Find in law that the defender is not entitled to disturb the said association in their possession of the said piece of ground: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in this Court: Remit," &c.

Judicial Factor—Appointment under Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 164—Insolvency of estate—Recall.—At the instance of certain heritable creditors, a judicial factor was appointed under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, upon the estate of a person deceased who had died intestate, and whose representatives, two brothers and a sister, were then in America. One of the brothers returned temporarily to Scotland, where he was decerned executor-dative, and the other sent instructions to have his title as heir made up. The brothers and sister then presented a petition for recall of the factor's appointment, but while the petition was pending the executor returned to America. The heritable creditors opposed the recall. The Court made a remit to the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who reported that it was doubtful whether the property would realise enough to pay off the bonds in full. The Court refused the petition for recall.

Process—Judicial Factor—Recall—Competency—Distribution of Business Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 56), sec. 6.—Held by Lord Trayner (Ordinary) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a judicial factor may be competently presented to the junior Lord Ordinary.

JOHN MASTERTON, C.E., Edinburgh, died on 9th October 1886, intestate and childless, and his next of kin were William and James Masterton, his elder and younger brothers, and a sister, who were then all in America.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
B.

On 6th November 1886, on the application of certain heritable creditors over subjects which had belonged to the deceased in Leith, to the amount of £5216, with concurrence of his widow, the Court appointed Mr E. E. Scott, C.A., to be judicial factor on the estate under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

On 2d December following, William Masterton having returned to Scotland, a petition for recall of Mr Scott's appointment was presented in name of the two brothers and their sister, who were the whole parties—exclusive of the widow—entitled to succeed to the estate.

It was stated in this petition that William had been appointed executor qua next of kin of the deceased, and that he was ready to perform the duties of his office; that James, the heir in heritage, had given instructions to have a title made up in his name; and that the value of the estate, heritable and moveable, was about £11,000, while the total indebtedness was under £6000, thus leaving a margin of free estate of probably over £5000. In these circumstances it was submitted that the appointment of the judicial factor was no longer necessary, and that his continuance in office would entail expense in the completion of a title in his person and conveyance to the heir and otherwise.

The heritable creditors and the judicial factor lodged answers, in which they disputed the value put upon the estate by the petitioners, the heritage being worth very little more than the amount of their debt, leaving out of view the widow's terce, and the moveable property being to a large extent hypothecated to the Clydesdale Bank. But, whether the estate was solvent or not, they submitted that without payment of their debt the petitioners were not entitled to oust them from the statutory position they occupied. In any view, the petition ought not to have been presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary, the Inner-House alone being competent to deal with it in the exercise of its nobile officium.

* "OPINION.—It is objected by the respondents that the present application is incompetent before me, and should have been presented in the Inner-House as the only Court competent to deal with the recall of a factory. The Act 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56, provides (sec. 4) that 'all summary petitions and applications to the Lords of Council and Session, which are not incident to actions and causes actually depending at the time of presenting the same, shall be brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary officiating in the Outer-House, who shall deal therewith and dispose thereof as to him shall seem just,' and in particular all petitions and applications of the kind described in the Act. For some time the

The respondents reclaimed, but did not press the objection to the competency further.

During the hearing the Court ordered the petitioners to produce a statement shewing the position of the estate, and explaining how they proposed to realise it, having in view the protection of the interests of the heritable creditors. The statement when prepared was called in question by the respondents, and the Court remitted to the Accountant in Bankruptcy to make inquiry, and report.

The Accountant reported that the moveable estate was more than enough to meet the debts upon it, but only on the footing that the possibility of certain contingent liabilities was left out of view.

In regard to the heritage, which consisted of house property in Bonnington and Leith, the rental had been declining, and amounted only to £352, 4s. 5d. in 1885-86. The subjects appeared to be in bad repair, and to be not very substantially built, and there was a difficulty in finding tenants. The amount of the bond was £5216, and the Accountant stated that he "is not in a position to report whether or not the property if exposed for sale would realise enough to pay off the bonds in full."

Before the case was heard the executor returned to America.

The respondents argued;—The appointment of a judicial factor under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act was entirely for the discretion of the Court. Here the factory should be continued. The heritable creditors had a clear interest to have it kept up. There practice of the Court to some extent proceeded upon a construction of that Act which limited the power of the Junior Lord Ordinary to deal with the cases falling within those specially enumerated in the Act. But a broader construction has since been adopted, as an illustration of which reference may be made to the case of Tweedie, 24 S. L. R. 155, 14 R. 212. As a summary petition not incident to an action or cause presently depending in Court, I think I can competently deal with the present application, and therefore I repel the objection stated.

"On the merits of the application I entertain no difficulty. The petition for the appointment of a factor set forth, inter alia, that Mr Masterton had died intestate, that there was no one interested in his estate then resident in Scotland to manage or administer that estate, and that certain rents had to be uplifted and disbursements made, or otherwise the estate might suffer injury. In this state of circumstances, it was obviously for the advantage of all concerned that a factor should be appointed, and such an appointment was accordingly made. Since then the circumstances have materially changed. The heir-at-law and the executor of Mr Masterton have both come to this country, and are now ready to undertake the duty of administering and managing the estate for behoof of all concerned. The continuance of the factory is therefore no longer necessary, nor is it expedient to burden the estate with the expenses of a factory which is unnecessary. The respondents' claims on the estate of Mr Masterton can suffer no damage by the recall of the factory. So far as these claims affect directly the heritable estate, they cannot suffer; because the heritable estate will remain subject to these claims just the same whether there is a factor or not. If the respondents wish to call up their debt, they can do so; that remedy is always in their own hands. As regards the moveable estate and the claims upon it, the executor will have to account for all the estate he can recover; and will, besides, on confirmation, be required to find caution for his intrusions.

"I therefore recall the appointment of factor, an appointment which I would probably not have made had Mr Masterton's executor been in this country and willing to administer at the date when the petition for appointment was presented.

"I shall allow the expenses of both parties to be paid out of the estate."

was no doubt an obiter dictum by Lord Deas in the case of Macfarlane,¹ No. 132. to the effect that where the heir and executor of a deceased made up a title, judicial management could not be insisted on. But there was no notice of any such difficulty in the Act of Sederunt of 25th November 1857, which was subsequent to the case. Further, although the heir and executor stated that they had completed, or were to complete, their title here, they were both in America, and the management of the estate would for the future be in the hands of an agent appointed by them. The expense would thus not be decreased by the proposed change. But, besides, the result of the Accountant in Bankruptcy's report was to shew that the estate was, to say the least, barely solvent, and in any case, if the estate was solvent, it was surely possible for the present petitioners to arrange for an assignation of the bonds, and so to pay off the respondents. The petitioners, at anyrate, had not made out a case for recall of the factory.

The petitioners argued;—It was admitted that it was not necessary to justify an appointment of a factor under the 164th section of the Act that the estate should be insolvent. The fact here was that the deceased's representatives had come home, and if they had not already made up a title, they were engaged in doing so. No doubt they had now returned to America, but they had left a factory with a law-agent here, who would manage the estate in future. The management by a judicial factor was cumbrous and expensive.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt that the original application for appointment of a judicial factor was very properly made. There was no one to represent the estate in this country, and it obviously required the intervention of an administrator of some kind in order to prevent it from going to pieces. The petitioners were the heritable creditors, who clearly have a very deep interest in seeing that the most is made of the estate, because it is very doubtful whether the heritage will be sufficient to provide for the payment of the debts there are upon it. Indeed the Accountant in Bankruptcy tells us he is not in a position to say whether the property, if realised, would meet the amount of the bonds. The estate is therefore in a somewhat dubious position as to the extent to which it will pay off the debts and leave a surplus.

The basis upon which the Lord Ordinary has founded his interlocutor is this:—"The heir-at-law and the executor of Mr Masterton have both come to this country, and are now ready to undertake the duty of administering and managing the estate for behoof of all concerned. The continuance of the factory is therefore no longer necessary, nor is it expedient to burden the estate with the expenses of a factory which is unnecessary." If the facts had been exactly as so stated by the Lord Ordinary, and both the heir-at-law and the executor had come home animo remanendi, and with the intention of administering the estate, a great deal might have been said in support of their application. But the state of the fact is that one of them came from America on a most transitory visit, and, so far as we can gather, he came for the purpose of appointing a factor to manage the estate, because after completing the appointment he forthwith returned to America, and it is not alleged that he has any intention of returning to this country. That is a very different thing from coming home and taking upon himself the management of the estate ; and it seems to me to reduce the matter at issue to this single question, whether the estate is to be managed by the nominee of the heir and executor, or by the factor.

The application was made under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and under that section it is certainly not imperative upon the Court to appoint a judicial factor where a creditor applies to have this done. It is further not necessary that the estate should be insolvent. That has been already settled by decision, and it is therefore a matter entirely within the discretion of the Court whether such a factor shall be appointed or not. In the present case it is for the Court to say, in reference to the existing state of circumstances, whether the judicial factor, who is at present engaged in administering the estate, and was regularly appointed thereto, should be continued, or whether the change of circumstances which has taken place is enough to induce us to recall the appointment.

I am of opinion that we should be exercising our discretion in a very doubtful way if we yielded to the arguments which have been addressed to us by the petitioners. The estate is in such a position that it ought to be in the hands of an officer of Court in whom all parties can have confidence, and who would be under the supervision of the Court. If the estate could be realised, the matter in dispute would be very easily arranged. The simple way would be to pay off the debts due to the heritable creditors. But the heir and executor will not undertake to do this. The fact is that they are unable to find the necessary funds. If the subjects were a good marketable security, the money required to discharge the bonds could be borrowed and the bondholders could be got rid of. But these persons very naturally say that as they cannot get payment of their debts they have a very material interest—indeed a primary interest—in the control and management of the estate, and that they are entitled to insist that its control and management shall be placed in the hands of those who will inspire them with confidence. In justice to the creditors, and having regard to the interests of all concerned, I am of opinion that the present judicial factory should be continued.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—There can be no doubt that when the heritable creditors made the application they were quite entitled to have a judicial factor appointed over this estate, under the provisions of the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, on account of the absence of anyone who could administer it. On the other hand, I think the present petitioners would have been in a position to have the judicial factory recalled if they had been able to shew that a surplus could be realised, and that there was no fear that the bondholders would lose any part of their debt. But the material circumstance in the case is that the estate is in a doubtful position, and that we cannot tell whether it would realise the amount of the bonds or not. The moveable property is hypothecated for debt, and it is not clear that even including it the estate is solvent.

In these circumstances, this is just a case which the Lord Ordinary, if he had known the whole facts, would have held justified the appointment of a factor. But in addition to the facts I have mentioned, the next of kin are resident abroad. The condition of the estate, however, is in my view the most important consideration. I agree further in your Lordship's observation that if the estate is able to meet its liabilities, there ought to have been no difficulty in arranging for a transfer of the bonds. This apparently cannot be done because the security offered seems somewhat doubtful.

I think that is just a case where the deceased having died intestate, and having left no one to undertake the management, the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act directly applies, and the appointment of the factor ought therefore to be upheld.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the appointment of a judicial factor like the present is a matter entirely for the discretion of the Court, and I have only to say that if this had been an application for the appointment of a judicial factor I should, with the facts now before us, have been for granting such an appointment, and therefore a fortiori I think that the appointment already made should be continued.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found the reclamer entitled to expenses.

Process—Amendment of interlocutor.

In this special case the question as originally put was altered in the course of the discussion by an amendment on the process copy, initialed by counsel for the parties, so as to read in the manner reported supra, p. 627. The alteration made was not brought under the notice of the Court when the interlocutor was framed, and an answer in the affirmative was returned to the question as originally put. The answer so returned was inapplicable to the question as altered. The Endowment Commissioners now presented a note to have the interlocutor varied. They cited certain precedents,¹ and urged that there was the additional element in this case that the judgment of the Court of Session was final under the Endowments Act, 1882, and that there was no right of appeal to the House of Lords.

The Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Mure, and Lord Adam) held that, as the party aggrieved could not here appeal to the House of Lords, the only remedy was for the Court to amend the interlocutor.

The amended interlocutor is reported supra, p. 633.

Lord Fraser.
I.

On 26th February 1885 the Glasgow Feuing and Building Company, Limited, brought an action for payment of £334, 10s. 7d. against the trustees of the late Arthur Watson, and on 12th June 1885 Watson's trustees brought an action for reduction of the feu-contract on which the Feuing Company based their claim in the petitory action. Besides the Company certain subfeuars from them were called as defenders in the action of reduction, two of whom—Messrs William Barr Crawford and James Pollock—entered appearance as defenders, and adopted the defences of the Company. The action of reduction and the petitory action were conjoined on 14th November 1885, and on 25th November two other subfeuars—Hugh Herron and David Bird—were, in terms of a minute for them, sisted as defenders in the conjoined actions. These defenders likewise adopted the defences of the Feuing Company, and all the defenders were represented by the same counsel and agent.

On 16th June and 7th July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced interlocutors—in the action of reduction assoilzieing the defenders, and in the petitory action granting decree for £112, 19s., with expenses to neither party.

On 11th March 1887 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note against Lord Fraser's interlocutors of 16th June and 7th July last, recall the said interlocutors: In the action of reduction reduce, decern, and declare, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and in the petitory action assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions thereof: Find the said trustees entitled to expenses in each of the said actions, and in the conjoined actions; remit," &c.

On 18th May Watson's trustees moved for the approval of the Auditor's report, and for decree against all the defenders who had appeared.

The appearing defenders, other than the Feuing Company, objected to being found liable in expenses, on the ground that the Company were the principal defenders, and that the other defenders had caused no additional expense by their appearance.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defenders other than the Feuing Company maintain that although they have failed entirely in their defence they ought not to be found liable in expenses. It is clear that there is no ground for freeing from liability these defenders, who appeared to maintain their freedom from the consequences of the action. They had an interest in the action, and thought that it was a sufficient interest to induce them to put obstacles in the pursuers' way, and they continued to oppose them throughout the litigation. I might perhaps have been disposed to agree to some modification, but I understand that a majority of your Lordships are of a different opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—The proceedings here began by the Feuing Company raising an action against the late Mr Watson's trustees for payment of a sum of money in respect of the non-implement of an obligation to construct roads throughout the whole property feued by the late Mr Watson to the authors of the Feuing Company, and there is no doubt that according to the letter of the contract there was such an obligation. The suggestion was made therefore in the Outer-House that the question could be better tried in a reduction, and an action of reduction was raised accordingly. The pursuers in that action called as defenders, not only the Feuing Company, but also certain of their feuars. Two of these feuars—feuars of infinitesimally small portions of the ground—appeared, and other two feuars of equally small portions subsequently sisted themselves as defenders by minute, but all they did was to appear by the same counsel and agent as the Feuing Company, and say that they concurred in the company's plea. Watson's trustees, the pursuers, succeeded in their action and were therefore found entitled to their expenses; but they could not have got their decree, and would not have got their expenses except by calling the company as defender. The company must therefore have been the leading defender. Why the feuars came forward I do not know, and if they had caused a farthing of expense to the pursuers I would have found them liable in expenses. But admittedly they have not caused one farthing of expense to the pursuers. So that we are asked to find those four feuars, for instructing the agent and counsel for the Feuing Company, liable in fourth-fifths of the expenses. I cannot assent to the justice of that, or to the law of it. The Court has a discretion in the matter, and I think it would be a sound exercise of that discretion to give Watson's trustees decree for expenses against the Feuing Company alone.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The right of Watson's trustees to decree for expenses is not disputed. The question in controversy is—Are they entitled to decree for expenses against the defenders other than the Feuing Company, against the defenders who appeared along with the Feuing Company and fought the same battle along with it? Besides the Feuing Company two individual feuars from them also appeared as defenders, and in the course of the litigation other feuars were also sisted in that character. All these defenders maintained that the ground of reduction alleged by the pursuers was unsound. It is true, as Lord Young has said, that their whole interest was in the Company, but they all came forward and stated one defence. I think it was for these defenders to say whether it was worth while so to come forward and take their place along with the principal defenders. Having done so they must take the consequences. They were put upon their guard. In any event, there must be decree against the company, but the form of the summons as regards the individual defenders is this,—“And the other defenders, in the event only of their appearing and opposing the conclusions hereof,” should be found liable in expenses. They ought therefore to have weighed well what would be the result to them, and

No. 134. must be taken to have done so. The one question is, who were the antagonists of the pursuers in the action? and when these are found, then according to reason and the practice of the Court the pursuers are entitled to expenses against them.

Personal or real—Whether legacy made real burden on heritage generally conveyed by settlement—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., cap. 101), sec. 19, schedule L.—In a general settlement the testator conveyed to his son his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, “but declaring that the above conveyance is granted with and under the following provisions, burdens, limitations, and declarations, viz.”—(Here followed obligations on the disponee to pay certain annuities and legacies)—“declaring that the said provisions . . . shall form real burdens over the heritable estate hereby conveyed.”

The title of the disponee was completed by a notarial instrument (in terms of schedule L, sec. 19, of The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868), which, after setting forth the conveyance in the general disposition, bore, “but always under the provisions, burdens, limitations, and declarations mentioned in said general disposition and deed of settlement.”

A legatee having failed to obtain payment of his legacy from the disponee, who had become bankrupt, brought an action of damages against the agent who had been employed by the deceased and by the disponee, alleging that he had been guilty of a breach of professional duty in not constituting the legacy a real burden when making up the disponee's title to the heritage.

Held that the general conveyance did not create a real burden, and that there was no obligation upon the disponee or his agent to create one, and action dismissed.

Opinion (per the Lord President), that neither a general disposition without a description of the lands conveyed, nor a notarial instrument following thereon in terms of schedule L of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, can create a real burden on the lands.

JAMES BEVERIDGE of Balado, Kinross-shire, died in June 1879, leaving a general disposition and settlement, whereby he assigned and disposed to his eldest son, Thomas Beveridge, his “whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated.” Then after a nomination of his said son as sole executor, the deed proceeded,—“But declaring always that the above conveyance is granted by me in favour of the said Thomas Beveridge and his foresaids with and under the following provisions, burdens, limitations, and declarations, viz.”—(After certain obligations to pay annuities and legacies)—“Third, the said Thomas Beveridge shall be bound to pay to John Williamson £200; declaring that the said provisions hereinbefore contained in favour of the said Mrs Agnes Beveridge and Alexander Beveridge, and John Williamson, shall form real burdens over the heritable estate hereby conveyed.”

Mr Robert B. Begg, solicitor, had prepared the above settlement on Mr Beveridge's instructions, and after the testator's death he completed Mr Thomas Beveridge's title by notarial instrument in his favour, recorded on 4th November 1879. That instrument, after setting forth the testator's infetment and the general conveyance in his settlement, bore, "but always under the provisions, burdens, limitations, and declaration mentioned in said general disposition and deed of settlement, whereupon this instrument is taken," &c. "in the terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868," and the warrant of registration was in these terms,—“Register on behalf of Thomas Beveridge, Esquire, of Balado, in the register of the county of Kinross.”

Williamson v.
Begg.

Mr Thomas Beveridge having granted various bonds over the estate, and having subsequently executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, Mr Williamson brought an action of damages for the amount of his legacy against Mr Begg, alleging that he had been guilty of gross neglect or breach of professional duty, and that he was responsible for the loss he had sustained.

He averred that the defender had omitted to constitute the legacy a real burden upon Balado, as directed by the testator. “The defender, in completing the title of the said Thomas Beveridge, was acting, and was bound to act, not merely for him or in his interests, but also for or in the interests of the beneficiaries under the said general disposition and settlement, and it was his duty to see that the said notarial instrument was properly executed, and that in particular all the necessary steps were taken to make the legacy of £200 in favour of the pursuer effectual as a real burden. The defender, however, failed to provide, as he was bound to do, for the constitution of the said real burden by engrossment in the said notarial instrument and entry on the record.” (Cond. 4) “Until the present dispute arose, and for at least ten years before that, the defender has acted as sole legal adviser of the pursuer, and in that capacity has had numerous business transactions with the pursuer. The pursuer, as the defender was well aware, relied upon the defender doing what was necessary to secure his interests under the said general disposition and settlement, and in particular, relied upon his taking such steps as were proper and necessary for securing said legacy. The defender frequently led pursuer to believe that the legacy was effectually secured, and would be duly forthcoming. The pursuer was not informed by the defender, and was not in fact aware until recently of the defender's failure to secure said legacy as a real burden upon the estate of Balado.”

The defender averred that in the whole transactions subsequent to the testator's death he had acted only for Mr Thomas Beveridge, and that he was not employed by the other representatives of the deceased.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, as agent for the pursuer, or at least as agent for the beneficiaries under the said settlement, was bound to do what was necessary for the said legacy being properly constituted a real burden. (2) The defender was not entitled to omit from the said notarial instrument the insertion of the burdens imposed by the said general disposition and settlement, and therein expressly declared real. (4) The defender having been guilty of gross neglect, or breach of professional duty, is responsible to the pursuer for the loss he has thereby sustained.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant. (5) No loss having been sustained by the pursuer, the summons ought to be dismissed.

The Lord Ordinary (McLaren), on 23d November 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that under this action the pursuer claims damages against the defender for failure in the professional duty alleged to be undertaken by him, to have a legacy due to the pursuer effectually made a real burden on the heritable estate: Finds that the pursuer has not

No. 135. taken legal measures to have it determined in a question with heritable creditors whether the legacy is effectually constituted a real burden: Finds that until the pursuer's right is tested by eviction or decree, he is not entitled to sue for damages on the assumption that loss has been sustained: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses.*

May 18, 1887.
Williamson v.
Begg.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The averments were such as to entitle the pursuer to an inquiry. A duty was laid on the defender to make the legacy a real burden on the heritable estate conveyed under the disposition, and the defender had neglected that duty. He ought to have taken care that when Thomas Beveridge took the lands he only took them under the burden of the legacy. This ought to have been done in the notarial instrument, and in terms of schedule L appended to the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (quoted in the Lord President's opinion, infra). The specific amount of the burden, and the creditor's name, ought to have appeared in the instrument. The pursuer conceded that as the record stood, the ground on which the Lord Ordinary had decided the case could not be pleaded. The pursuer was entitled to look to the defender to protect his interests, and his averments on this matter were well founded in law.¹

The defender argued;—(1) There was no relevant case of damage. No claim had been made against the alleged competing creditors,—and until that had been done the action was premature. Besides, the declaration in the settlement did not constitute a proper real burden. In order to this, there must be a specific conveyance, and an obligation in the dispositive clause to constitute the provision in question a real burden upon the subject so conveyed.² Accordingly the pursuer had no such right as he claimed here. (2) But assuming he had, there was no liability on the part of the law-agent for neglect to complete the security, unless it was laid on contract or employment.³ There was no such averment here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages against a law-agent for failing in his duty to his client, and, so far as I can understand from the record,

* “NOTE.—The action is instituted against a law-agent to recover the value of a legacy alleged to be lost by reason of not being effectually made real in the notarial instrument following on the truster's disposition. It is urged that every conveyancer warrants a security so far as it can be made good by the exercise of his professional skill.

“But in the present case the action appears to me to be premature. The loss has not been constituted, and the pursuer has not sustained the eviction of his legacy. He must first ascertain, in a question with the competing creditors, whether their right is preferable to his, and if he fail, he will then be in a position to assert his claim against the agent for failure to give him a good security over the testamentary estate. But there are two pleas which, I think, the pursuer may maintain in a question with the heritable creditors—(1) that he has an effectual real burden under schedule L; and (2) that the heritable creditors were affected by the notice of the testamentary character and purposes of the deed which appears in the notarial instrument.”

³ Fleming v. Robertson (Lord Wensleydale's opinion), 4 Macq. 199; Goldie v. Goldie & Threshie's Reps., July 8, 1842, 4 D. 1489, 14 Scot. Jur. 591.

the allegation is that there was a failure on the part of the defender to have the legacy to which the pursuer was entitled under his grandfather's settlement made a real burden on his estate. The deed of conveyance by the grandfather was a general disposition conveying not only heritage, but also moveables, in fact his whole heritable and moveable estate. Undoubtedly the effect of the deed was to make the legacies and annuities left by the testator personal obligations against the disponee. There is no doubt he was under a personal obligation to pay these. The deed also contained this clause,—“Declaring that the said provisions hereinbefore contained in favour of the said Mrs Agnes Beveridge and Alexander Beveridge, and John Williamson, shall form real burdens over the heritable estate hereby conveyed.” If the effect of that clause was to create the legacies real burdens on the estate, no doubt the making up the title under the general disposition should have been so arranged as to feudalise the estate subject to these real burdens. But looking to the deed, I am of the opinion—which indeed hardly seemed to be disputed—that this declaration is of no avail as creating a real burden. A general conveyance of all the granter's lands without specifying any lands—which is what is generally understood by a general disposition—cannot possibly create a real burden, because in order to create a real burden there must not only be a very precise specification of the amount and nature of the burden which is to be created, but also as precise a specification of the lands over which it is to extend. There is no such specification in a general conveyance. But there is a further reason why this declaration cannot receive effect. It cannot be followed by infeftment. The only way of effectually constituting a real burden is to insert a provision to this effect in the dispositive clause, so that it shall enter the sasine. But I do not think that in the end it was seriously contended that the declaration had the effect of creating a real burden.

No. 135.

May 18, 1887.
Williamson v.
Begg.

The next position taken up by the pursuer is that the legacy should have been made a real burden in the notarial instrument. But could this have been done? The schedule of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, which has been referred to for the purpose of shewing that real burdens could be created in this way, does not advance the argument very far. There is no doubt this provision in schedule L, appended to that Act, which deals with a notarial instrument in favour of a general disponee,—“If the deed be granted under any real burden or condition or qualification, add here, but always under the real burdens,” &c. No doubt, if there is a real burden created by the deed it is right it should be inserted, because that is the proper mode of feudalising lands which are subject to such a burden. But if no real burden is created, then the direction contained in the schedule does not apply.

But then it is said that the statute contemplates that a real burden may be created in this way. That leads us back to a consideration of the 19th section of the Act, which authorises the adoption of the procedure provided by schedule L. The provisions of that section are not confined to the case of a general disposition, but they apply to many other cases under which real burdens may be created. It reads thus,—“Where a person shall have granted or shall grant a general disposition of his lands, whether by conveyance mortis causa or inter vivos, or by a testamentary deed or writing within the sense and meaning of the 20th and 21st sections of this Act, and whether such general disposition shall extend to the whole lands belonging to the granter, or be limited to particular lands belonging to him, with or without full description of such lands, and whether such general disposition shall contain or shall not contain a procuratory or clause of resignation, or a precept of sasine, or an obligation to infeft, or a clause expressing the manner of holding, it shall be competent to the grantee under such general disposition to expedite and record in the appropriate Register of Sasines a notarial instrument in, or as nearly as may be in, the form of schedule L hereto annexed." That shews that a notarial instrument may be recorded under schedule L upon a general disposition, containing a full description of the lands conveyed to the general disponee, and there is no doubt that by such a deed a real burden may be effectually created. Accordingly, the words of the schedule which I have quoted above are completely satisfied by referring them to such notarial instruments as may be executed in creating real burdens where these have been properly constituted. The argument upon that section accordingly fails. The possibility of creating a real burden by some proceeding under schedule L, where there has been a failure to constitute it properly by the principal deed, is a different matter. In this case, as I have said, there is no such right constituted, although the Lord Ordinary seems to have had some doubts.

But even supposing that there was a failure on the part of the defender to create a real burden, would he be answerable for neglect of duty? I do not think we are in a case of that nature. Because I do not see that the defender undertook any such duty without consideration and without any employment by the pursuer. It would be very strange if he had. But that is perhaps hardly the nature of the pursuer's case. It must rather be this, that it was in the power of the defender, being a sort of family agent, and acting for the pursuer as well as for the other members of the family, to make the clause in the general disposition effectual in his favour in some way or other so as to give him a real security over the estate. It appears to me that this was impossible. I do not know how it could be done, and therefore I do not think the defender can be held responsible for not doing what he could not do.

I do not adopt the narrow ground of judgment taken by the Lord Ordinary. As both parties are agreed that the legacy cannot be recovered owing to the bankruptcy of the disponee, it seems desirable that we should decide the case on the footing that if the pursuer had a right to a real security for the legacy, he has lost that right. But as I have shewn I do not think he ever had such a right.

LORD MURK.—It is better, I think, that this case should be decided upon the broader ground, and I am also of opinion that the payment of the legacy in question was not effectually created a real burden by the testator. There is no doubt a declaration to that effect in the deed, and there may have been a personal obligation imposed on the disponee to pay the debt, but the deed is a general conveyance of heritage, without any special conveyance of any particular estate, with directions that the legacy should be secured as a real burden over it. That being so, it is clear that under the rules of law which were in operation at the date of the passing of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, no real burden was constituted; and I see nothing in the provisions of that statute which can be said to have relaxed or altered those rules. In these circumstances, the only other question is whether the defender was under any obligation qua agent of the family, and without any special employment from the pursuer, to see that the legacy was properly secured as a real burden; and I am of opinion that he was not.

LORD SHAND.—The view upon which this action is brought is that the pursuer No. 135.
 was entitled to have the amount of his legacy made a real burden upon the property conveyed to Mr Thomas Beveridge. The ground of the claim I understand to be that the defender, as the pursuer's agent, undertook to have the legacy made a real burden, having it in his power to do so, and that he has not done so, and has therefore deprived the pursuer of the power of recovering payment out of the property, Mr Beveridge's estate being now bankrupt, and the property heavily burdened by deeds executed by him. This is not a case of conveyance to trustees with directions to do certain things, where, looking to the truster's intention, there might be a duty upon the trustees or upon an agent to protect the legatee's interest. The estate is conveyed absolutely to a disponee by a general conveyance, subject to certain conditions, which are expressed on the face of the deed. Whatever may have been the testator's intention, he certainly did not create this legacy a real burden. He conveyed his estate absolutely, and made his disponee personally liable to pay certain annuities and legacies. No doubt he added a declaration that these provisions should form real burdens over the heritable estate thereby conveyed. But that declaration did not make the legacy a real burden. No infeftment followed upon the deed, and the deed was not capable of being followed by infeftment, otherwise than by notarial instrument duly registered. And there being no condition or declaration that the disponee should create the legacy a real burden he was not bound to do so. He took the estate, not in trust, but for his own behoof, and he could not be compelled to make it a real burden. This being so, there can be no action against the defender for having failed to perform an act which he was neither entitled nor authorised to perform.

Upon these grounds I think the defender should be assoilzied.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first and fifth pleas in law for the defender, and of new dismissed the action.

AN action of damages for alleged slander was raised by Donald M'Murphy, formerly a sergeant of police at Oban, against Peter Campbell, formerly inspector of police there, and J. C. MacIullich, procurator-fiscal of Argyllshire at Inveraray, "conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally, or according to their respective liabilities."

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "On or about the 19th day of September 1885 the defenders, acting in concert together or separately, or one or other of them, prepared a report or written statement of and concerning the pursuer, in which it was stated, 'I have to report you alleged misconduct on the part of Sergeant M'Murphy, Oban, which, if found on investigation to be true, will seriously affect his moral character. What I am about to state is well known at Inveraray among all classes (including P. F.), at Taynafead public-house, and the post-boys at Dalmally Hotel. On the 1st or 2d January 1884 M'Murphy took Alexander Gillies, a boy prisoner, from Bonaw to Inveraray, charged with theft, and it is alleged that while at Inveraray on that occasion, and in broad daylight, he had a woman, named . . . who is considered a prostitute, with two or three illegitimate children, in Buntine's Hotel; that he pulled down the blinds, got whisky, and locked the door, and had the woman there for about two hours, and I need hardly say what is supposed to have taken place. . . ' These statements regarding the pursuer are unfounded and malicious falsehoods, and represented the pursuer to have acted as an immoral and dissolute person, and to be unworthy of employment in the police force. The defenders, on or about said 19th September 1885, transmitted the said false and malicious statement or report, signed by the defender Campbell, to Colin M'Kay, chief-constable of Argyllshire, in consequence of which the said Colin M'Kay suspended the pursuer for two weeks. He was reinstated after the said false and calumnious charges had been investigated by the police committee of Argyllshire at Inveraray, and found to be entirely without foundation. Denied that any report affecting the pursuer's moral character was ever current, as alleged in Ans. 2 for defender Peter Campbell." (Cond. 4) "The above-mentioned false and calumnious charges against the pursuer were made and circulated by the defenders maliciously, and without any just or probable cause. The defenders were actuated by a feeling of ill-will against the pursuer, and a desire to damage his character and deprive him of his situation in the police force. The proceedings above detailed have seriously injured the pursuer in his feelings, credit, and reputation, and have occasioned the loss of his situation as police sergeant."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defenders having maliciously and without probable cause made and circulated false and calumnious charges against the pursuer, they are liable in reparation, with expenses.

Both defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

The pursuer proposed issues for the trial of the cause.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Lee), having heard counsel on the issues proposed, found that the pursuer's allegations were not relevant or sufficient to support the action, and therefore assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "NOTE.—When issues were ordered in this case, it was understood that the question of relevancy was to be raised upon the issues; and, accordingly, a discussion upon the relevancy took place.

"The case is a peculiar one, but as it involves a question of general importance in actions of slander based upon statements contained in an official report, or what purports to be an official report, I shall state the grounds upon which I have arrived at the conclusion that the action is irrelevant.

"The pursuer was a sergeant in the Argyllshire police, the defender Camp-

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that there was a sufficient and relevant averment of malice. The pursuer's statements, fairly read, amounted to this, that the defenders, there being no real reports against him, had invented and sent to his superior a false story to the effect that reports were in circulation against him, which ought to be investigated. An issue ought therefore to be allowed.¹

Counsel for the defenders were not called upon.

Campbell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has taken a bell was an inspector of police in the same force, and the defender MacLulich was, and is, procurator-fiscal of the county. The only slander complained of in the issues proposed is that set forth in the condescendence, art. 2, and it is said to have been contained in the written report or statement there referred to. That statement or report bears to be written by the defender Campbell, and to be addressed to the chief-constable of the county. It is not said that the other defender (the procurator-fiscal) either signed it or authorised it; and it does not bear to have been written on the responsibility of any person excepting the defender Campbell. All that is alleged, in order to connect with it the defender MacLulich, is, that 'the defenders acting in concert together or separately, or one or other of them, prepared a report or written statement,' and in reply to MacLulich's statement in answer, it is 'averred that the said defender acted in concert with the defender Campbell, and was in full cognisance of, and party to, the writing of the alleged report.'

"In this state of the record, and looking to the terms of the letter, I think that there is no sufficient allegation that the slander was uttered by the defender MacLulich, and that on this ground alone the action fails as against him. Assuming the fact to be that he was cognisant of it and was consulted about it, and a party to it in the sense of approving of Campbell writing it, this would not be sufficient to make him responsible for its contents, unless he knew that the statements contained in it were falsehoods, which is not averred.

"As to the case against Campbell, the record discloses the fact that the report was made by him in his official capacity, and to his superior officer, the chief-constable. It does not profess to vouch for the truth of the statements concerning the pursuer, but only that such misconduct was alleged, and that the allegation was current at Inveraray. It assumes and states that 'of course an independent investigation must be made.'

"In this state of matters, I think that the case is one in which it was not enough for the pursuer to allege malice in general terms; and that it was incumbent on him to set forth the facts and circumstances from which he is to maintain that malice may be inferred. He avers that the statements 'are unfounded and malicious falsehoods,' and he denies that any report affecting his moral character was ever current 'as alleged in ans. 2.' But he does not allege that the alleged rumours were inventions by the defenders, or that the report was made to the chief-constable recklessly, or without probable cause. He states that the information referred to in condescendence 3 was given without probable cause, as well as maliciously, but no issue is proposed as to that matter, and no want of probable cause is alleged as regards the report in question. My opinion is, that the statements contained in the report to the chief-constable, being made by a person within whose duty it was to report matters affecting the character and efficiency of the police force, and as statements requiring investigation, are not actionable if there was probable cause for so reporting them. I therefore think that the general averment of malice is insufficient, and that the action cannot be maintained.

"The case of Craig v. Peebles (3 Rettie, 441), and the opinion of the Judges in that case, though relating to an action against a procurator-fiscal, for slander in a complaint before the Justices of the Peace, appear to me to apply with equal force to slanderous statements contained in an official report. I may refer also to the case of Green v. Chalmers, Dec. 12, 1878, 6 R. 318, on this point."

No. 136. perfectly right view of this case. The statement of the pursuer necessarily is that the defender Campbell was acting in the discharge of his duty, and not only so, but so far as the admitted facts of the case go, I think it would have been culpable if he had not done as he did.

May 21, 1887.
M'Murchy v.
Campbell.

The whole matter consists in this, that there were rumours that scandalous conduct on the part of the pursuer had taken place in the district of the defender Campbell. He made out a report as to these rumours, which he sent to the pursuer's superior officer for investigation. I think that, looking to the averments as they stand, without any intelligible allegation of malice, we ought not to countenance this action.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. As to the case against the procurator-fiscal, I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, that no relevant case is stated against him; and as to the case of the police officer also, I am of opinion that the action is not relevant. Our law as to defamatory statements by public officers in the discharge of their duty, which are alleged to be untrue, or even malicious, is not very fully matured, and it is probably creditable to public officials that it is not, because cases of the kind are of the rarest occurrence. The great majority of cases of slander arise in the ordinary circumstances of life among private citizens, and it is really within living memory that it was decided that an action will not lie against a Judge of this Court for statements made on the bench. The law on that subject was first solemnly laid down in an action against Lord President Hope,¹ in respect of serious allegations made by him on the bench. It was finally and solemnly decided on general grounds of expediency and public interest that no action will lie on such averments—that a Judge is at liberty to make any observations he may see fit in the discharge of his duty without fear of an action of damages. If his judicial duty is transgressed, there is a remedy of a constitutional character through the action of Parliament, but there is no remedy by way of an action at law.

Again, with respect to public prosecutors, I do not know that the law stands on any decision, but rather on generally received opinion. For example, no action will lie against the Lord Advocate for averments made by him in the discharge of his duty, even though they are said to be malicious. The public interest will not allow such actions. I think I am right in saying it is only within the last ten years that it has been decided in England that an action will not lie against witnesses for slander contained in statements made in the witness-box on the allegation that they are false and malicious. There again it is on grounds of public interest and high expediency that a witness shall not be deterred from giving evidence by any apprehension of an action for libel. No doubt great suffering may arise from such statements to the persons whom they affect, but the public interest prevents any remedy by way of an action.

Though it is not, for the purposes of this action, necessary to decide the point, I have for my part no objection to indicate my opinion that it is not in the public interest that an action for libel should lie against a public officer for a report made in discharge of his duty to his superior officer. It may cost great suffering to the person who is affected by these statements that they should be made, and that he should be without redress, but it is in the interest of the public that the police should make investigation into such charges, and it would require a very exceptional statement indeed, a statement very different from what we have here, to induce me to allow such an action to proceed. I therefore concur in dismissing the action.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. There is no difficulty whatever as to the fiscal, and I am surprised that the statements in regard to him were put on record. As to the other defender there is more difficulty, but I have no hesitation in concurring with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur. I think we are doing a great deal for the pursuer himself in adhering to the decision of the Lord Ordinary, for it is plain that he could not possibly succeed if he went to trial.

On the case against the defender Campbell, I have some hesitation, because it may be inferred from the pursuer's statement that there was no report of any kind against his character. It is to be inferred, we are told, that the pursuer means to aver that Campbell, in order to make the report, invented the charges and sent in to his superior officer for investigation invented charges. That would be a remarkable case, but it is possible to conceive of such a case. If, however, the pursuer meant to make such a case as that, he ought to have made it much more plain than he has done, and to have brought out clearly his special grounds for inferring malice. There is authority for the proposition that it is necessary to aver special circumstances from which malice can be inferred. I am not sure that I agree with that proposition, stated broadly, but I am entirely of opinion that it is a statement which may be made of this particular case.

THE COURT adhered.

Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v.
Inland
Revenue.

Revenue—Corporation duty—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 11—Exemptions—Charitable purpose.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, imposed a duty of five per cent upon corporate property, but exempted "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

Held that funds belonging to an incorporated body, which were derived from the entry-moneys of members and were solely applicable as pensions to decayed members and widows of members at the absolute discretion of certain office-bearers, were not to be regarded as funds appropriated "to a charitable purpose" in the sense of the statute.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, acting under the provisions 1st Division. B. of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, assessed the Incorporation of Tailors, one of the fourteen incorporated trades of Glasgow, whose earliest charters were dated in 1546 and 1569, on their property to the extent of £2602 of annual income, with duty at the rate of five per cent.

The Incorporation thereupon appealed against the assessment, and main-

They stated, inter alia, that their funds "are all destined and appropriated, after defraying necessary expenses of management, to charitable purposes, including relief against want of the means of livelihood, provision of medical relief, and of education, for poor persons—being members of the Incorporation or their widows or children, or, in some cases, grandchildren. All allowances, of whatever nature, to the poor of the Incorporation are left to the charitable discretion of the Deacon and Master Court, and are payable and paid only during their pleasure, it being specially declared by the bye-laws of the Incorporation that no person shall have or acquire a legal right to share the funds of the Incorporation as a member, pensioner, or otherwise. The greater part of the estate of the Incorporation was originally derived, it is believed, from entry-moneys, which are presently paid at the rates set forth in the existing bye-laws and regulations of the Incorporation. The destination of the corporate funds to charitable purposes is settled, not only by the charters of the Incorporation above mentioned and prescriptive usage thereon, but also by Acts of Parliament."

The following was one of the bye-laws approved by the Court of Session in 1880:—"It is declared and enacted that pensions may be awarded to decayed members, and the widows and children of deceased members in indigent circumstances, or an amount expended for their behoof, to such extent as the deacon and masters consider suitable; and this allowance shall be payable only during their pleasure, and no person shall have or acquire a legal title to share the funds of the Incorporation as a pensioner or otherwise."

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue denied that the property or the income thereof fell under the exempting clause founded on.

It was admitted at the hearing that a sum of £320 or thereby was acquired within thirty years as a legacy for educational purposes, and that the amount of the income thereof, being £16, fell to be deducted from the assessable sum above named.

The petitioners argued;—Under the charter of 1546 the entry-money and fines which formed the funds of the Incorporation were to be dedicated to religious purposes. Under the charter of 1569 they were to be devoted no longer to religious but to charitable purposes, and these were still the objects of the Incorporation, as defined in the bye-laws of 1880. Since 1846, when the Act 9 and 10 Vict. c. 17, for the abolition of exclusive trading within burghs was passed, the object that members had in joining the Incorporation was because it gave them a certain position and dignity, and a pension in the case of necessity. But no contributor had an absolute right to share in the funds either as a pensioner or otherwise,—the dispensation of the funds was purely charitable, and was made to decayed members and the widows and children of deceased members in indigent circumstances, and in this respect the Incorporation was distinguished from a prudential assurance company. Nor could it be said that the benefits to be obtained from the Incorporation were in any way commensurate with the payments of entry-money. Indeed, there was no relation between the payment and the return.¹ Corporations would be restrained if they misapplied their funds, which must be devoted to their proper uses.² The funds in the present case were "legally appropriated" to charitable purposes, because any single member might interfere to prevent a misappropriation or a bad exercise of the discretion which was vested in the Deacon and Master Court.³ Both the rights of the corporators to participate in the benefits of the Incorporation, and the obligation on the Incorporation to extend these benefits were general. It was not a case of individual right on the part of a member.

The respondents argued;—There was a right here on the part of the members to participate in the benefits of the Incorporation under certain circumstances.⁴ If there was this right, then the objects were not charitable, and the fund did not fall within the exemption of the 3d subsection. If there was no such right on the part of the members, then the funds of the Incorporation were not "legally appropriated" in the sense of the 2d subsection as defined by the Court in the recent case of the Writers to the Signet.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question arising under the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, under the authority of which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have assessed the property of the petitioners, the Incorporation of Tailors of Glasgow, as chargeable to the extent of £2602 of annual income, with duty at the rate of 5 per cent. The notice of assessment was duly served upon the petitioners, and they bring this petition and appeal under the authority of the Succession Duty Act of 1853, for the purpose of having the question of their liability determined by the Court.

The petitioners, being an incorporated body, and having an annual income of considerable amount, are prima facie chargeable under the 11th section of that statute, because the object is to levy a duty at the rate of 5 per cent upon the annual value, income, or profits of property belonging to bodies corporate or unincorporate, and the usual deductions have been made of all necessary outgoings, including receiver's remuneration, and all charges and expenses properly incurred in the management; so there is no dispute about the amount of revenue on which the charge is to be made, except in so far as regards one sum, I understand, of £320, the income or profits of which will fall to be deducted from the amount of the revenue upon which the charge has been made before finally adjusting the amount of the assessment.

The ground upon which the petitioners object to this assessment is not that their case does not fall within the operative and leading enactment of the 11th section, but because it is within one of the exemptions appended to that section.

No. 137. In the third subsection, property is exempted, the income or profits of which shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts. The property is said to be exempted under that subsection, because it is legally appropriated and applied for a charitable purpose.

May 26, 1887.
Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v.
Inland
Revenue.

The property which belongs to this incorporation has been created, and is kept up by contributions of members of the Incorporation. In short, the whole property of the Incorporation, I understand,—at least so far as the history of that property can be ascertained,—is the accumulations of entry-money paid by corporators to the Incorporation. Now, the first thing that the petitioners have got to establish is that this property so created is legally appropriated to charitable purposes; and these words “legally appropriated” seem to have a very clear and distinct meaning,—a meaning which has been given effect to in a previous case—(Society of Writers to the Signet, 14 R. 34). They mean that the property is so appropriated as to create a legal obligation upon the part of the administrators of the property to apply it in a particular manner. If the property is so legally appropriated, it follows of necessity that the administrators of the fund are under a legal obligation to apply the funds in their hands in a particular way; and so, in order to bring the case within the meaning of this exempting clause, the petitioners must make out that the funds in the hands of the corporation are so appropriated that the corporation is legally bound to apply them in a particular way. When there is a legal obligation, it follows again as a matter of necessity, that there must be somewhere a legal right to enforce the obligation. It may be that the legal right to enforce the obligation may belong to individuals, or it may be that the legal right belongs to a class; and I think it will be found, from the terms of the bye-laws of this Incorporation, that the legal right to enforce this obligation belongs to a class.

But in that I am anticipating, because the next question is, whether the purpose to which this fund is legally appropriated and must be applied is a charitable purpose. Now, charity—I mean the application of a charitable fund—generally means that the object of the charity has no right to demand anything from the party who administers the fund. But still further, it generally means that he has given nothing for it,—that the bestowal of the charity is entirely gratuitous on the part of the administrator of the fund. In the present case, the fund is legally appropriated, within the meaning of the subsection founded on, to the maintenance of decayed members of this Incorporation, and of their widows and children. Therefore the body—the corporators generally—have a right to demand that this fund shall be so applied, and shall not be applied to any other purpose whatever, and their right to require this depends upon the consideration they have given for the right; and that consideration is the payment of entry-money. Now, these different considerations seem to me to exclude the notion of charity altogether. The corporators and members of the body generally contribute, upon becoming members, to the funds and property of the incorporation, and these funds and that property are applied to one purpose, and one only, namely, to providing for decayed members and their widows and children, and so there is, so far as I can see, a complete obligation on the one hand, and a complete right on the other. There is an obligation on the part of the administrators of the fund to apply it in a particular way, and no other way, and there is a right on the part of the whole members of the corporation to insist that it shall be so applied—and it does not seem to me to interfere with that view of the case, No. 137. that according to the bye-laws of the society an individual has no legal title, as May 26, 1887. it is called, to insist on the fund being so administered as to give him a permanent right. The bye-laws contain this provision among other things, and it is the most important of all:—"It is declared and enacted that pensions may be awarded to decayed members and the widows and children of deceased members in indigent circumstances, or an amount expended for their behoof, to such extent as the Deacon and Masters consider suitable; and this allowance shall be payable only during their pleasure, and no person shall have or acquire a legal title to share the funds of the incorporation as a pensioner or otherwise." There is a very large discretion undoubtedly left in the hands of the Deacon and Masters of the Incorporation. They have an entire control, in so far as regards each particular individual applying for the benefit of this fund. The amount to be given is in their discretion, and it is also in their discretion to say whether a particular individual shall not have the benefit of the fund at all, for reasons which of course must not be capricious or unreasonable, but for fair reasons. The discretion is a very large one, but, like the discretion vested in almost all administrators, it is not to be abused, and if it is abused, the administrators will be subject to the control of this Court, but notwithstanding that large discretion, it is here made abundantly clear what is the destination of the annual income of the property.

It is to be awarded in the shape of pensions to decayed members and the widows and children of deceased members in indigent circumstances. There is no other lawful application of the money. There is no other purpose for which this corporation now exists, and therefore it appears to me that notwithstanding the wide discretion vested in the Deacon and Masters as regards each individual case, this is nothing else in its real character, in its present circumstances, since it ceased to have any privileges of exclusive trading, than a provident society, and therefore it cannot answer the description of the exempting clause of the statute as being a corporation whose funds are legally appropriated to charitable purposes. I think the decayed members and their widows are not receiving charity when they get the benefit of this fund, but, on the contrary, are getting the benefit of it in consequence of the payment by either the members themselves who are now receiving aid, or by the husbands and fathers of the widows and children who are receiving aid. It differs from most provident societies of the same description in respect of that peculiarly large discretion which is vested in the Deacon and Masters; but I can see no other distinction, and that distinction is not sufficient to take it out of the category of a provident society, or to make the pensions and allowances payable under it charitable in any proper sense of the term.

I am therefore for confirming the assessment.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that your Lordship has very distinctly explained the position of this society as regards the creation and application of its funds. The fund in question was created by the contribution of the members of the association, paid in in terms of the regulations applicable to these matters; and it is distributed by the managers of the Incorporation in terms of the bye-laws among decayed members or the widows and children of deceased members, but the extent to which relief is to be given is to be entirely in the discretion of the managers. Strictly speaking, therefore, it is a benefit conferred upon the poorer families of the Incorporation in return for the money which they and the other members of the Incorporation have contributed towards the creation of the fund. In these circumstances, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that it is not a charitable purpose in the sense in which that word is used in cases of this description. Reference was made to the case of the Fleashers' Incorporation of Glasgow, 3 Wils. and Sh. App. 209, but there the rules were different, and the case has no direct bearing here, because by those rules a fixed sum of money was provided for each widow when she became poor. There was, moreover, no discretion as to the amount to be paid, but an absolute right given to the widow, if she was poor, to have a certain fixed annuity paid out of the funds; and her title to sue was sustained on that ground. There was no question raised in that case similar to that which is here in dispute; and I do not think we are in the least degree trammelled by it.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and your Lordship has so clearly and exhaustively stated the ground upon which my opinion rests, that I should be guilty of repetition if I added a word to what your Lordship has said.

LORD ADAM.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

THE COURT gave effect to the appeal so far as regards the £320, and quoad ultra refused it.

THE NORTHERN INVESTMENT COMPANY OF NEW ZEALAND, LIMITED, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and having its head office in Edinburgh, was formed in 1880, principally for the purpose of borrowing money in this country on debentures at a low rate of interest, and lending it out in New Zealand, together with the paid up capital, at a higher rate of interest on the security of land there.

The Company carried on its business from the date of its formation, and in each year including the year 1885-86 returned its profits and gains, and was assessed and paid duty thereon in terms of the first case of schedule D of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, section 100.*

Limited.

The Company appealed to the Commissioners on Income-tax, who, on 7th April 1887 came to be of opinion that the profits of the business carried on by the Company were chargeable with income-tax under the rules applicable to the first case of schedule D aforesaid, sustained the appeal of the Company, and discharged the surcharge by the Surveyor.

The Surveyor of Taxes obtained a case for the decision of the Court of Exchequer, under the provisions of the Taxes Management Act, 1880.

The case set forth the manner in which the surcharge claimed was arrived at, but as the Court was of opinion that the case of the *Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Company of New Mexico v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue*¹ was directly in point, and that the Company might legally be assessed under the fourth case, on the ground that their revenue was to be regarded as interest on foreign investments received in this country, it need not be here set forth.

The question of law stated was—"Whether the Company is liable to be assessed to income-tax in respect of the interest received from its investments in foreign or colonial securities according to the rule contained in the fourth case of schedule D, section 100, 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 35? or Whether the Company is chargeable for its whole profits or gains under the rules applicable to the first case, schedule D of the said Act?"

Argued for the appellant;—The case of the New Mexican Company was precisely applicable here, and the questions submitted to the Court raised no other point. On the point raised by the respondents he argued;—The surcharge was quite properly demanded within four months of the year to which the last assessment under case 1 had been made. Such a surcharge was specially provided for under section 52, subsec. 2, of the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19), which gave the Commissioners power where any property or profits had been "omitted from such first assessments" to "make an assessment" "in such sum as according to their judgment ought to be charged on such person, subject to objection by the surveyor and to appeal." The judgment of the General Commissioners was only final where (sec. 57, subsec. 9 of the same Act) no order of "the High Court" upon a case required, "as provided by this Act," had been made.

Argued for the respondents;—The present case was distinguishable three years, ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure or concern shall have been usually made up, or on the 5th day of April preceding the year of assessment; and shall be assessed, charged, and paid without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed."

* Schedule D and fourth case is as follows,—“The duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from securities in the British Plantations, in America, or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom, and foreign securities, except such annuities, dividends, and shares as are directed to be charged under schedule C of this Act.”

“Rule.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in the United Kingdom in the current year, without any deduction or abatement.”

from the New Mexican Company's case in this, that there an assessment was being laid on for the first time, while here the Company had been assessed since 1880 under the first case of the schedule. In the New Mexican Company's case they maintained that the Lord President had stated that it was in the option of the Commissioners (which they interpreted as meaning the General Commissioners, and not the Board sitting in London), if a company might legally be assessed under either of two cases, to state which of the two should be chosen. Here they had decided that the course which would in the long run bring in the most money to the revenue was to assess the company under the first case of schedule D.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very clear case, and I should not have thought it necessary to make any observations on it were it not that I think that my judgment in the Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Company of New Mexico case (ante, p. 98), has been a little misunderstood. The passage in my opinion which was cited to us is as follows:—"The question is whether it (income-tax) may be lawfully charged under the fourth case, schedule D. One can understand that in particular circumstances the duty may be chargeable under the one or the other. The income, in respect of which the duty is to be charged, may fall under more than one description in the statute, and in that case it would, of course, be in the option of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to take the case that was most favourable to themselves." Now, no more was meant in that passage than that it is in the option of the Surveyor of Taxes to take the case most favourable to the Crown, for the Commissioners of whom I there speak are the Board of Commissioners sitting in London; the Board which is charged with the collection of the revenue, and not the General Commissioners against whose decision this appeal is taken. These General Commissioners are charged with quasi-judicial functions, and have to determine whether any assessment is well laid on when it is objected to by the party assessed, and accordingly the statute says that whatever may be the determination of the Commissioners, whether it is favourable to the one party or to the other, an appeal lies. The Commissioners have no discretion, they have simply to determine the question in dispute between the parties. That is their only function. What they had to determine here was whether this company, which derives a large revenue from foreign and colonial investments, and which receives that revenue in this country, is liable to assessment under the fourth case of schedule D. On that point I cannot distinguish the case from that to which I have already alluded, and I think we must therefore follow the rule there laid down.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and confirmed the assessment.

v. Gibson.

DAVID GIBSON, farmer, Barns, Dumfriesshire, died on 5th March 1887, and on 14th March following William John Cuthbertson, publisher in Annan, alleging that he was a creditor of Gibson to the extent of £253, 11s. 9d., being the amount with interest of two bills said to be long past due, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries for the sequestration of the estates of the deceased and for the appointment of a judicial factor thereon under the 16th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.*

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfriesshire.

The petition was in the form in use prior to the passing of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, and did not contain a condescendence and note of pleas in law, as required in petitions under that Act.†

The averment in the petition upon which the application for a factor was based was in the following terms:—"That the said David Gibson was tenant at the time of his death of the farm of Barns, and the same was and still is stocked with horses, cattle, sheep, and other bestial, and it is therefore desirable that immediate measures should be taken for the preservation of the estate."

On 15th March the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) granted warrant to cite the parties called as respondents to appear on certain days in September following, in terms of the statute, to shew cause why sequestration should not be granted, and ordered intimation in the Edinburgh Gazette. In the same interlocutor he appointed a factor as craved.

Robert Gibson, a son of the deceased, appealed against this interlocutor, on the grounds, as stated by him at the hearing, (1) that the petition was incompetent, in respect it was not in the form prescribed by the Sheriff Court Act of 1876†; and (2) that at all events the appointment of the factor ought not to have been made de plano, as there was no sufficient averment of the necessity of making such an appointment.

Gibson further stated (at the hearing) that he had been decerned his father's executor on the 12th March, that he had found caution as such, that his father's estates were not insolvent, and that the Sheriff-substitute had made the appointment of the factor as a matter of course, and without inquiry into the necessity for it.

Cuthbertson admitted that the Sheriff-substitute had appointed the factor as a matter of course, but, while he did not dispute that a decreedative appointing the appellant executor had been pronounced, he denied that caution had been found, and further stated that the deceased's estates were insolvent.‡

* The Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 16, enacts:—"It shall be competent for the Court to which a petition for sequestration is presented, whether sequestration can forthwith be awarded or not, on special application by a creditor, either in such petition or by a separate petition, with or without citation to other parties interested, as the said Court may deem necessary, or without such special application if the Court think proper, to take immediate measures for the preservation of the estate, either by the appointment of a judicial factor, who shall find such caution as may be deemed necessary, with the powers necessary for such preservation, including the power to recover the debts, or by such other proceedings as may be requisite; and such interim appointments or proceedings shall be carried into immediate effect; but if the same have been made or ordered by the Sheriff, they may be recalled by the Court of Session, on appeal taken, in manner hereinafter directed."

Cuthbertson
v. Gibson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be sustained. I think that a creditor who is desirous of having a factor appointed on his debtor's estate, under the 16th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, must state special reasons in his petition for having his request granted. No doubt this application is for the sequestration of a deceased debtor's estate, which assumes that there is no one in the management of it, and that is a most suitable matter for the Sheriff's consideration, but I think that in making this appointment of a judicial factor without any statement by the petitioner to shew the propriety of such an appointment, and without, as we are told, giving the matter any special consideration, the Sheriff-substitute has gone wrong. I say nothing about the competency of the form in which this petition is drawn. It appears that it is in the form which was in use before the passing of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876, and as to whether such a form may now be continued in use looking to the terms of that Act, I express no opinion. But I am quite clear that this appointment of a judicial factor, without a specification of the reasons which made it necessary, and without an opportunity being given to the other side of appearing and opposing the application, ought to be recalled, and the petition remitted to the Sheriff.

LORD YOUNG.—That is my opinion also. I agree in thinking that the case may be disposed of on the ground which your Lordship has proposed, and I do not know whether we can competently consider the other question which was argued to us—to which indeed the greater part of Mr Watt's argument was addressed—the question, namely, whether the procedure in an application for sequestration in the Sheriff Court is now of necessity to be regulated by the provisions of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876. The inclination of my opinion is that it is not. The case in the other Division which was quoted to us was a case of cessio. That is a totally different thing, which is specially provided for by the Act of 1876. An application for sequestration is not specially provided for by the Act of 1876, but it is specially provided for by the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, which in its 29th and 30th sections prescribes the procedure that is to be followed. If the application for the sequestration of a deceased debtor's estates is made with the concurrence of his successor, or if the successor shall renounce the succession, the Sheriff is required by the statute at once to issue a deliverance awarding sequestration of the estates, and if there is no such consent or renunciation, the Sheriff is in that case to hear the parties in an informal way. Now, all that seems to me to be totally inconsistent with the procedure under the Act of 1876, which requires a record to be made up, and the case to be sent to the roll, and the parties to renounce probation, or the Sheriff to allow a proof, and so on. But as I said before, it is not necessary, and I doubt if it is even competent, for us to determine that question at the present stage. The Sheriff-substitute has ordered service on the parties in the usual way, and that was quite a right thing for him to do. Even if there is ground for objecting to the formality of the petition, that may be left to the parties to state when they appear, and ought not to be taken by the Sheriff of his own motion, or considered by us now. It would be a very strong and obvious objection to the form of a petition which would entitle the Sheriff to say,—“This petition is utterly wrong. I cannot write upon it.” But in the same interlocutor as that in which he ordered service the Sheriff-substitute made the appointment of a judicial factor to take possession of the estate at once. Now, that is not a competent appointment except under clause 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides that “It shall be competent for the Court to which a petition for sequestration is presented, whether sequestration can forthwith be awarded or not, on special application by a creditor, either in such petition or by a separate petition, with or without citation to other parties interested, as the said Court may deem necessary, or without such special application if the Court think proper, to take immediate measures for the preservation of the estate, either by the appointment of a judicial factor, who shall find such caution as may be deemed necessary, with the powers necessary for such preservation, including the power to recover the debts, or by such other proceedings as may be requisite.” The statute here contemplates an exceptional case, in which immediate measures for the preservation of the estate are necessary, but we are told that the Sheriff-substitute in this case granted the appointment of the factor without any special reason having been stated to him, and simply as a matter of course. I am of opinion that the granting of such an appointment is not a matter of course—that on the contrary it ought only to be granted where special and immediate measures are necessary for the preservation of the estate. We are told that an executor has been appointed here, and that he is in possession of the estates of the deceased, and we are told on the one side that this executor has found caution, and on the other side this is denied. How the fact may be I cannot tell. Whether this executor is not such a person as ought to be left in possession of these estates, whether he has found caution or not, or whether the fact that he has not found caution, if it be the fact, constitutes such a special case as will warrant the appointment of a factor, I cannot say. If this petitioner or any other creditor thinks so, then he can present his application to the Sheriff, who will grant it, not as a matter of course, but only after considering whether the special and exceptional circumstances of the case justify the appointment. Therefore I agree with your Lordship in thinking that this deliverance should stand in so far as it orders intimation and service, but that we should recall the appointment of the factor.

v. Gibson.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree entirely in all that your Lordship and Lord Young have said. With regard to the question of the form of the petition it is not necessary to say anything, because an answer to that question is not necessary to the decision of the case. With regard to the second question, it appears to me that we have no alternative but to recall the appointment of the judicial factor, inasmuch as it is plain that an irregularity was committed by the Sheriff-substitute in making the appointment. The Sheriff-substitute seems to have thought that the making of such an appointment was a mere matter of course, whereas the Act of Parliament makes it plain that special cause must be shewn. Now, not only is there no averment that the estate is without anyone to administer it—and there could not well have been such an averment when there was in fact an executor—there is nothing in the petition alleged against the administration which exists. In short, no reason whatever is stated for interfering with the executor's management; on the contrary, the fact that the property consists of the lease of a farm, and of the stock and crops on the farm, seems to me a

No. 139. strong reason against making such an appointment, for were the judicial factor to enter upon his duties he would have to take over the farm and to reap the crops and sell stock, and in this way entirely reverse the management of the farm before it could be determined whether sequestration was ultimately to be awarded or not. I therefore entirely agree in the course proposed by your Lordships.

Cuthbertson
v Gibson.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur in thinking that a judicial factor ought not to be appointed at once and without some special reason being stated. I rather think that the practice of appointing without special reason and without notice is too common in the Sheriff Courts, and I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing my disapprobation of it. But the appointment has been made—perhaps irregularly,—and it is now defended on the ground that there is no legal administration of the estates of the deceased. If that be so, then I think the only course must be to confirm the appointment which the Sheriff-substitute has made. But it is said that before the application for a factor was presented a decree-dative appointing an executor was pronounced. It would have relieved my mind to have known whether this executor is prepared to find caution and to take up office—for of course the decree-dative is idle if he is not. If he has found or is going to find caution, and to enter upon office, I should have no hesitation in recalling the appointment of the factor, but if he has not found caution, and does not intend to do so, then I see no alternative but that the administration of the factor should continue. I should like much therefore to know this fact, whether the executor has found caution, or if he has not, whether he undertakes to do so within a certain short time, otherwise I should prefer that the appointment of the factor should stand, even if the Sheriff-substitute may have been somewhat premature in making it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against in so far as regards the appointment of a judicial factor, reserving to the respondent to make application for such appointment in terms of the Bankruptcy Act: Find the appellant entitled to expenses Remit to the Sheriff to proceed in the cause as accords, and decern."

MR ANTHONY INGLIS, engineer and shipbuilder, Glasgow, of the firm of Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis. May 31, 1887.
Messrs A. & J. Inglis, died on 10th January 1884. His wife had predeceased him. Two children survived him, an only son, Mr John Inglis junior, and a daughter, Mrs Margaret Inglis or Breen. Mrs Breen, at the date of the proceedings to be narrated, was married, but had no family. 1st DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.

Mr Inglis left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th August 1883, in which he conveyed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to the following persons, as his trustees and executors, viz., Messrs J. S. Napier, John Ferguson, William Alexander, William Nowery, and his son and daughter. These trustees all accepted office.

Mr Inglis left a large amount of means, both heritable and moveable. The amount of the latter, as given up for confirmation, was £151,935, 15s. 10d. Of this sum £89,000 consisted of the deceased's share in the business of Messrs A. & J. Inglis. The net rental of the heritable property at the time of his death amounted to about £5000 per annum.

The trust-deed set forth the usual trust purposes, and after directing payment of certain legacies (including a legacy of £20,000 to Mrs Breen, and of £10,000 to Mr John Inglis junior), provided that the residue should be divided into two equal parts, one to be conveyed to his son, and the other to be held and applied for his daughter's liferent alimentary use alienably, and for her children in fee. Failing children, the daughter's share was to be paid and made over to the son, a power being reserved to the daughter in that event to test upon £10,000 of the sum liferented by her. These provisions were to be in full of legitim, and in the event of either son or daughter claiming legitim, he or she was to forfeit all rights under the settlement, and the forfeited provisions were to fall to the other beneficiaries.

Some months having elapsed after Mr Inglis' death before the amount of the estate was ascertained, Mrs Breen was not in a position at once to say whether she would elect to take her legal rights or her provisions under the will, but at a meeting of the trustees held on 9th September 1884 they instructed their agent, Mr Robertson, to give Mr Kidston, Mrs Breen's agent, "all information in their power to enable him to advise Mrs Breen as to her election, . . . and Mrs Breen is requested to declare her election with as little delay as possible."

At a meeting of the trustees on 14th January 1885 (at which Mrs Breen was not present), the following resolution, as afterwards minuted, was adopted:—"The trustees, having considered that upwards of a year has elapsed since Mr Inglis' death, and that the fullest information has been afforded by them to Mrs Breen regarding the extent of the personal estate, resolve that an intimation should be sent to her, to the effect that, in the event of her not declaring her election by 31st inst., the trustees will at once proceed to deal with and administer the estate in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement." A letter embodying the resolution was sent to Mrs Breen's agent on the same day.

On 28th January 1885 Mr Kidston wrote to Mr Robertson:—"I am instructed by Mrs Breen to inform you that she has now decided to claim her legal rights in place of the provisions under the settlement. I shall be glad to receive a statement for adjustment of the sum due Mrs Breen.—Yours truly." This letter was acknowledged by the trustees' agent on 29th January. Both these letters were submitted to the trustees at a meeting held on 3d February following (at which Mrs Breen was not present), and the trustees then instructed their agent "to prepare with all possible dispatch a statement of the personal estate, shewing the cost of administration, &c., and this for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the legitim fund."

On 5th February 1885 Mr Robertson, as the trustees' agent, intimated to Mr Kidston that he believed that in electing to take at common law instead of under the trust-disposition and settlement, Mrs Breen had been going on the assumption that she was entitled to the whole of the legitim fund, and that he thought it proper to mention that Mr John Inglis junior had been advised that he was entitled to participate in that fund, and that without being liable to collate the heritage. On the same day Mr Kidston wrote this answer to Mr Robertson:—"I have to-day your letters of yesterday and this date. With reference to the latter, you expressed an opinion to Mrs Breen, in which I concurred, that she would be entitled to the whole of the legitim fund, and her intention to make her election was based upon the assumption that that would be the case. I am also informed by Mrs Breen that in September last, at a meeting of trustees, when both she and Mr Inglis were present, her legal rights were explained to her to be a claim to one-half of the moveable estate as legitim. Had Mr Inglis given earlier intimation of his claim to participate in the legitim without collating, I would not have written in the terms of my letter to you of 28th ulto. The trustees will therefore be good enough to hold Mrs Breen's election as still in abeyance."

The next meeting of trustees, at which Mrs Breen was present, was held on 11th March. The minute of that meeting bore that "Mr Robertson stated that the present meeting had been convened for the purpose of considering what course ought to be adopted by the trustees with reference to the legitim fund, the whole of which is now claimed by Mrs Breen; and he added that on the assumption of Mrs Breen and Mr John Inglis junior not coming to any agreement by a special case or otherwise regarding that fund, the trustees have no alternative but to raise a process of multiplepoinding before the Court of Session, thus leaving the Court, and the Court alone, to determine the respective rights of parties."

Ultimately Mrs Breen and her husband, as real raisers, brought a process of multiplepoinding in name of the trustees for the purpose of deciding the questions between her brother and herself, in which she and her brother were called as defenders.

In this action Mrs Breen claimed her provisions under the settlement, and alternatively, in the event of its being held that she had conclusively elected to take her legitim, the one-half of the free moveable estate left by her father at his death, or an equal share of both the moveable and heritable estate, in the event of her brother claiming a share in the moveables.

Mrs Breen stated that, when the letter of 28th January 1885 was written by Mr Kidston, she had not been furnished with the information she required as to the relative values of her rights at common law and under her father's settlement, without which an election could not be made by her; further, that the letter was written in reliance on the information given her by the trustees in her brother's presence that she was entitled under her legal rights to the one-half of the free moveable estate, and in the belief that no objection could be raised thereto by her brother, or anyone else. Further, she stated that Mr Breen, as her curator, did not authorise the writing of the letter, and that in writing it Mr Kidston was not acting for him.

Mrs Breen pleaded, inter alia;—2. The claimant is not barred from making this claim by the said letter of 28th January 1885, in respect that (1) the said letter was written without the claimant having obtained, or having been able to obtain, the information as to the relative value of her claims at common law and her rights under her father's settlement, to which she was entitled, and which was absolutely necessary in order to enable her validly to elect; (2) the said letter was written under No. 140. essential error, and was timeously withdrawn; (3) it was not authorised by the claimant's husband as her curator. Alternatively, and in the event specified in her alternative claim,—3. She is entitled to one-half of the free moveable estate left by her father as her legitim; or otherwise, in the event of her brother claiming to share in the legitim, he is bound to collate the heritage, in which case she is entitled as her legitim to an equal half of both the heritable and moveable estate.

May 31, 1887.
Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

Mr John Inglis junior claimed under the settlement the whole fund in medio, under deduction of the amount of legitim falling to Mrs Breen as that should be ascertained; and alternatively, his testamentary provisions, in the event of it being found that Mrs Breen had not elected to claim legitim.

He averred that, by Mr and Mrs Breen's contract of marriage, Mr Breen had renounced his jus mariti and right of administration; that full information was before Mrs Breen when her agent wrote the letter of 28th January, and that she had conclusively elected to claim legitim.

Mr John Inglis junior pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The averments of the claimants, Mrs Breen and husband, are not relevant or sufficient to support the claim for Mrs Breen. (3) The material averments for Mrs Breen and husband being unfounded in fact, their claim cannot be sustained. (4) The sum claimed in the second alternative head of Mrs Breen's claim being at least double what she is entitled to as legitim, the said alternative head ought not to be sustained.

After a proof, the import of which is given in the opinions of the Judges, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) on 15th December 1886 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the claimant Mrs Breen has made no election between her legal rights as one of the children of the late Anthony Inglis and the provisions made in her favour by the settlement of her said father: Finds that she is now entitled to insist in the alternative claim made by her on the fund in medio: Finds the claimant John Inglis junior liable in the expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . From a comparatively early date in the history of the trust the question was under consideration whether Mrs Breen would accept the provisions under the settlement or claim her legal rights. With a view to her determining upon this question, information of various kinds regarding the deceased's estate was from time to time required by her from the trustees, and (as some question was raised about this I think it right to add) was furnished to her as fully as the trustees were able to do. No election by Mrs Breen having been made or intimated, the trustees, at a meeting held by them on 14th January 1885, at which Mr John Inglis junior was present and Mrs Breen was not, resolved that an intimation should be sent to Mrs Breen to the effect 'that in the event of her not declaring her election by 31st inst., the trustees will at once proceed to deal with and administer the estate in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement.' That resolution having been communicated to Mrs Breen, she had a meeting with her agent, Mr Kidston, on 28th January 1885, to which, as regards what took place at it, I will afterwards advert. In the meantime it is enough to say that Mr Kidston, on the authority as he understood of Mrs Breen, wrote the letter of 28th January 1885 to Mr Robertson, the agent for the trustees, stating that Mrs Breen had 'now decided to claim her legal rights in place of the provisions under the settlement.' The receipt of that letter was acknowledged on 29th January by Mr Robertson, and both letters were read to the trustees at their meeting on 3d February, and are engrossed in their minute of meeting of that day. It is upon that letter of 28th January 1885 that Mr John Inglis junior now bases his objection to the alternative claim of Mrs Breen.

"It was maintained for Mrs Breen that the letter written by Mr Kidston was No. 140. May 31, 1887. Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis. Mr John Inglis junior reclaimed* ;—I. The position which he maintained was that there had been a mistake on Mrs Breen's part in the legal de-not binding because it was not holograph or tested. In fact, the letter was written by Mr Kidston's clerk and signed by him. I think there is nothing in this objection. I am not aware that writing is essential to a final and conclusive election in such a case as the present, or, indeed, in any case. On the contrary, there are cases where election has been inferred from facts and circumstances, and from actings and conduct of the person having power to elect. If the election had been intimated verbally by Mrs Breen to a meeting of trustees, or verbally to the agent who acted for and represented them, that would have been sufficient. To have such an election declared in writing is convenient and proper, because it saves questions as to the terms in which the election is declared, and affords ready proof of the election having been made. But the law does not require writing as a solemnity in making an election, nor proof in writing that it has been made.

"It was further maintained for Mrs Breen that even if the letter was not open to the objection just stated, still Mrs Breen was entitled timeously to withdraw it, so long as nothing had been done on the faith of it—so long as things were entire; and that Mrs Breen had withdrawn the letter of 28th January by another of date 5th February, in which Mr Kidston intimated that Mrs Breen's election should be held 'as still in abeyance.'

"If an election was well made and intimated on 28th January, I am of opinion that it was beyond the power of Mrs Breen to withdraw it. The general rule of law is stated by Lord Blackburn in the case of Scarf v. Jardine (L. R., 7 App. Cases, 360):—'When once there has been an election to do one of two things you cannot retract it and do the other thing; the election once made is finally made.' And obviously it must be so. For if the person who has the right of election, and validly exercises it, is entitled to withdraw from the election and do something else, it is not then a right of election which he exercises—he makes two elections; and there is no reason why the second election should not give place to a third, and so on. Nor do I see any just distinction (as was argued on behalf of Mrs Breen) between the case of an election having regard to rights in a succession and an election with regard to rights arising under a contract. The rule of law is the same where a right of election arises, independent of the circumstances out of which it has arisen. It was said that Mrs Breen might withdraw or depart from her election because nothing was done on the faith of it; that things were entire, and nobody injured by her withdrawal. If it be sound law that an election once made is final, then the question whether things are entire or not makes no difference, the election having been made it must remain. But in this case it can scarcely be said that things remained the same after the election and before its withdrawal. For, if Mr Inglis junior's other contentions in this case are sound (on which at present I offer no opinion), there were rights which at once emerged in his favour of the value of between £30,000 and £35,000. It might appear at first sight as if some countenance was given to Mrs Breen's contention by what was said by Lord Young in the case of M'Fadyen, 10 R. 285. But that was a very special case, and the precise point here raised does not seem to have been argued.

"The point, therefore, remaining to be disposed of is whether, on 28th January 1885, Mrs Breen validly exercised her right of election in such a way and under such circumstances as to bar her from now challenging it or setting it aside. To make an election valid and binding it is necessary that the person making the election shall have before him clearly the two alternatives between which he is to choose. He must also have before him all the information necessary to enable him intelligently to make his choice. In short, he must have before him clearly what the two things really are between which he is to elect. Now, to see whether these conditions were fulfilled in the present case, it is necessary to advert to some facts of which notice has not yet been taken. It appears that on several occasions in the year 1884, Mr Robertson, the agent of the trustees, had told Mrs Breen that if she resolved to take her legal rights rather than her conventional rights, she would be entitled to the whole legitim fund—the half of the personal estate—which he estimated at between £70,000 and £72,000, adding that, all things considered, if he were in her place, he would 'take the provisions at common law rather than the provisions under the settlement.' This opinion as to the extent and value of Mrs Breen's rights at common law was one, I think, which Mrs Breen was entitled to accept at least as information on the subject to which it referred. So far as regarded its legal aspect it was the opinion of a person eminently qualified to give it, and as regards the value of the provisions in money it was an opinion or statement from the best authority. On that information, therefore, the state of Mrs Breen's knowledge was this, that if she elected to take her legal provisions she would get £70,000 or £72,000. A similar statement was made by Mr Robertson at some of the meetings of trustees before 28th January 1885, and was repeated at the meeting of 3d February, when Mrs Breen's letter of election was read. At all these meetings of trustees Mr John Inglis junior was present, 'and did not utter a word upon the subject.' I accept that as the fact on Mr Robertson's statement. Mr John Inglis junior, no doubt, says that he did say something on the subject, but I am satisfied he never said anything by way of objection or dissent from Mr Robertson's views—(1) because Mr Robertson could not have forgot it, if such a thing had taken place; and (2) because the other trustees, so far as they have been examined, were at the time and are now distinctly under the impression that Mr Robertson's view was accepted by the meeting. The whole trustees had the idea conveyed to them (and whatever Mr Inglis may have said he did not disturb the trustees' belief and lead them to any doubt) that Mrs Breen's legal rights entitled her to the one-half of the moveable succession—that is, the whole legitim fund.

"Mr Robertson's view was repeated by his partner Mr Low, at a meeting of trustees held on 9th September 1884. The proceedings at that meeting deserve particular attention. Mr John Inglis junior was applying to the trustees for a payment to account of his provisions under the settlement of his father, and a calculation was made at the meeting—Mr Inglis and Mrs Breen being both present—of the amount of the estate and the claims upon it, to enable the trustees to determine what sum they were in safety to pay Mr Inglis. One of the claims mentioned at that meeting was the possible claim of Mrs Breen for legitim, and this was put down at £70,000 the estimated value of one-half of the moveable estate. No objection or dissent from this was stated by Mr Inglis, and it was decided to make him a payment to account on the basis of the calculation then made. That Mrs Breen's claim for her legal rights, as a possible

The duty of trustees in a matter of this kind was to supply the beneficiary with full information both as to the facts and the law, and claim against the estate, was distinctly and prominently before that meeting cannot be doubted. It is referred to in the minute of that meeting, which concludes in these words, 'Mrs Breen is requested to declare her election with as little delay as possible.'

"On the evidence, so far, I think it is established that not only was Mrs Breen informed by Mr Robertson, the agent for the trustees, but also heard it stated over and over again at meetings of trustees, without objection or dissent from her brother, that her right at common law was to the whole legitim fund, estimated at £70,000 or £72,000. It is also ascertained that in April 1884 Mr John Inglis junior had been advised by his law-agent that this view so reported was erroneous; that he meant to contest his sister's right to the whole legitim fund; and that he concealed both the advice he had received and his intention to act upon it until after his sister had made her election—which he with the other trustees was pressing her to make. I come now to the meeting which Mrs Breen had with her own agent on 28th January 1885, after receiving the notice from the trustees already alluded to, to the effect that her election must be declared by the 31st of that month. At this meeting Mr Kidston submitted a draft letter which he proposed to send to Mr Robertson. Mrs Breen made some difficulty about the terms of the letter, but ultimately, to quote her own words, 'I said I had not got sufficient information, but if Mr Kidston thought it would settle matters and put an end to all further trouble, I was quite willing to accept the half of the personal estate, as I had been advised. I asked him to state that.' 'I am quite positive that I asked Mr Kidston if he thought that by accepting the half of the personal estate it would end the matter. He thought so, and that was my reason for agreeing.' It appears plain, therefore, that the election which Mrs Breen was making was between the one half of the moveable succession and the provisions under the settlement. I am not surprised that Mr Kidston should have communicated Mrs Breen's choice in the language of the letter in question; for up to that time he, in common with Mr Robertson and every other person concerned (except Mr Inglis junior), regarded the half of the moveable estate and Mrs Breen's legal rights as equivalent expressions. They had in a manner been diverted from a consideration of the question whether Mrs Breen's legal rights could in any case be less than one-half of the moveable succession, by the general acquiescence in the repeated statement of Mr Robertson that one-half of the moveable succession was the amount of her right. It was certainly the prima facie view of her right; and if Mr Inglis junior had desired to give his sister fair play and get from her a declaration of her election formed under a consideration of the subject in all its aspects, he should not have concealed the advice he had received nor the question he meant to raise. Apart from this, however, I think it cannot be doubted that if the expression in Mr Kidston's letter 'legal rights' means something different from 'the half of the personal estate,' then that letter was not authorised. It was the half of the personal estate and nothing else which Mrs Breen authorised him to accept for her; it was that she elected in place of her 'provisions under the settlement.'

"It was maintained on behalf of Mr Inglis junior that the question on which Mrs Breen decided was her legal rights on the one hand and her settlement provisions on the other, and that error in law on her part as to the extent of her legal rights did not affect the election she had made. I am not prepared to adopt that view as stated. If a legal question affected the pecuniary value of her rights, Mrs Breen could not elect between the opposing claims until she had had that legal question, with its possible result one way or other, explained to her. For, after all, it was between two sums of money or money's worth that she was choosing, and not between two abstract legal rights. But, in my opinion, the argument maintained has no place in the present case. The mistake, if there was one on the part of Mrs Breen, was in fact. But I think there was no mistake even in fact. Mrs Breen was, according to my view, electing they had done this. The trustees knew that Mrs Breen was being advised by a competent person. Mrs Breen shewed she had full confidence in Mr Kidston even after she knew that doubts had been thrown on his opinion by others. No. 140.

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

II. The letter of 28th January 1885, in which Mr Kidston intimated Mrs Breen's election, was clear and unequivocal. It was said that the letter, being neither holograph of Mrs Breen nor tested, was not a probative instrument. But a probative writ was not necessary in order to a valid election. And it was clearly established that Mr Kidston was fully authorised to intimate the election.

III. It was said that Mr Breen not having authorised the letter of 28th January, as his wife's curator, it was not binding. But under Mr and Mrs Breen's marriage-contract Mr Breen had renounced his jus mariti and right of administration. This included his curatorial rights, and accordingly it was not necessary that he should have been a party to the letter.¹

IV. Mrs Breen's mistake was an error in law. As put by the other side, it was said that she had been under a misapprehension as to the sum she would get if she elected to take her legitim. That was a general proposition in law, seeing that the amount of the available estate had been ascertained, and the only remaining question was what were her legal rights upon that basis of fact. The maxim "ignorantia juris neminem excusat" applied, jus there being used in the sense of denoting the general or ordinary law of the country, and not private right. That between £70,000 or £72,000—the half of the moveable estate—and her rights under the settlement.

"I come therefore to this conclusion: If Mr Kidston's letter is to be held as expressing Mrs Breen's election of her legal rights as something different from the one-half of the moveable estate, then it was not authorised: it was not Mrs Breen's election. If, further, the letter is regarded as Mrs Breen's election, it was an election made under essential error—an error induced among other things by the conduct of Mr Inglis junior, and therefore not binding.

"It need scarcely be said that if Mrs Breen on 28th January elected to take her legal rights rather than the settlement provisions, before the amount of the legitim fund was at least approximately known, or in the knowledge that the amount of the legitim fund falling to her, if she so elected, might only be one-half of what she expected or was advised would be hers, if she elected to take her legal rights in the knowledge that her view of what those amounted to in money value was to be contested by her brother, her election made in such circumstances would have been binding. She then, in the knowledge of all the facts affecting or which might affect her choice, took the risk and responsibility of making it. But the case I am dealing with is the very opposite of this. Indeed, it appears to me that Mrs Breen, better informed now than she was on 28th January, is not yet in a position to make her election. Whether she is to get £35,000 or £70,000 if she elects to take her legal rights, is a consideration which, I should suppose, would very materially affect her choice. But which of these sums represents the value of her legal rights is not yet ascertained. And although it is comparatively a small matter, it is yet in itself sufficiently important for her to know whether the moveable succession of her father, and consequently the legitim fund, is to be increased or not by the addition of a share of the profits made on contracts current at his death.

"On the whole matter I shall find that Mrs Breen is entitled to insist in her alternative claim, not having validly elected between her legal and conventional rights."

was] a distinction which had been repeatedly drawn,¹ and it met the argument on the other side, and the Scottish cases which had been cited in support of it. In these cases the error which was at the foundation of each depended upon a question of private right. Even in Johnston v. Johnston,² where the error was in mistaking what was moveable for heritable estate, the mistake was not necessarily one of law, for, it depended to a large extent on fact. It came to this, that Mrs Breen's mistake was in assuming that the opinion she got was infallible.

V. As to Mr John Inglis junior, he had concealed nothing which he was bound to disclose. He knew no facts which were not known to Mrs Breen. He had simply got another opinion as to the law, which enabled him to realise the fact that lawyers differed. He had no right to advise or to interfere in any way, and if he had offered advice it might not have been taken. Besides, the matter of Mrs Breen's interest in the legitim had only been mentioned at two of the meetings of trustees at which Mr Inglis had been present—once by Mr Robertson, and again on 9th September by Mr Low, both meetings being in 1884. Above all, both Mr Inglis and the trustees knew she was being separately advised.

VI. The election made by the letter of 28th January could not be withdrawn. It was contended, upon the other side, that the case of *Scarf v. Jardine*³ was not in point, because there had been a transaction following upon the election. But the transaction, if there were such, was nothing more than evidence of the election. Mrs Breen's election was entirely unambiguous.

VII. Apart from the question of election, the testator had imposed a condition in his settlement which implied that the mere statement of a claim for legitim inferred forfeiture of the conventional provisions.⁴

The respondent argued;—There was no serious controversy as to the facts. The question of Mrs Breen's right to the whole of the legitim fund had come up at several meetings of the trustees and no one had ever disputed that position although Mr Inglis was present at these meetings.

I. There was no election in the proper sense here at all. The letter of 28th January merely implied an offer to take £70,000, and if that was paid, to depart from any further claim. An election could not be final, and beyond recall, if nothing had followed upon it.⁵ Here it was timeously withdrawn by the letter of 5th February.

II. Although it might not be the case that a probative deed was required in order to make a valid election, still a mere communication without anything following upon it might not be enough. There was no authority for the Lord Ordinary's view, that a letter written as this was by an agent who was not proved to have been authorised to write it was final. The letter was no better than parole evidence.⁶ The nature of the alleged contract was a discharge of rights which arose under a probative instrument, and such a discharge must be by probative deed, or by an

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

III. A great deal had been said upon the other side upon the distinctions to be drawn between errors in law and errors in fact. But it was not admitted that there was any error in law. Mr Robertson's view that Mrs Breen was entitled to the whole of the legitim fund might turn out to be correct. The real mistake made by Mrs Breen was in assuming that there was no dispute as to her being entitled to the whole legitim fund.

IV. But, assuming that there had been an error in law, no homologation had followed, such as would bar locus penitentie. In order to homologate a person must be in full knowledge of the circumstances of the case. The present case was similar to cases of discharges sine causa or for an inadequate consideration.² It was quite unnecessary to appeal to the English cases, which were cases involving transaction and contract, and so were on a different footing.

V. But, even if it should be held that the letter of 28th January imported a contract, it was incomplete. To make it complete, Mr Breen ought to have been a party to it. It was said that because his right of administration was excluded under the marriage-contract, this involved a similar exclusion of his curatorial power. But there was no case which could be cited where that had been held, except the old case of Keggie.³ In some cases where a husband's rights were renounced in the marriage-contract, a curator ad litem had afterwards been appointed to act for the wife.⁴ The law seemed to be that, whenever an extraordinary act of administration was required on the part of the wife, the curatorial power was invoked. The making an election was certainly an extraordinary act. The previous law on that matter was not affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1881.⁵

VI. As to the clause of forfeiture contained in the settlement, the contention of the other side was an invocation of the law of approbate and reprobate. One could always get the better of that by abandoning the claim and restoring things to their previous condition.⁶

LORD PRESIDENT.—The fund in medio in this multiplepinding consists of the estate of the late Mr Anthony Inglis. The testator died in January 1884, and he left two children, Mr John Inglis jun., the reclamer, and Mrs Breen. The estate consisted of a very considerable amount both of heritage and moveables, the moveable estate alone, according to the inventory, reaching £150,000. The

No. 140. daughter, Mrs Breen, being married, had to consider, before taking any decided steps, whether she would accept the provisions made in her favour by her father's settlement, or whether she would claim her legal rights; and, of course, in so large a succession as this, that was a matter of great importance to her and her husband. She and her brother were among the trustees, and there were several others, viz., Mr Napier, Mr Ferguson, Mr Alexander, and Mr Noway, all of whom seem in some degree to have been connected with Mr Anthony Inglis.

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

The election which Mrs Breen had to make between her testamentary provisions and her legal rights was made a subject of talk at many of the meetings of the trustees, and also apparently of private conversations during the year which elapsed between the death of the testator and the election which it is alleged was made in January 1885. A meeting of trustees was held on 14th January 1885, at which they resolved that intimation should be sent to Mrs Breen to the effect that, in the event of her not declaring her election by 31st instant, they would proceed to administer the estate in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement. This was not the first time Mrs Breen had been asked to make her election, but she and her agent were hesitating as to what the election should be, and it was not until this peremptory intimation was sent that she at last instructed Mr Kidston, her agent, to write and inform the trustees, as he did by letter of 28th January 1885, that she had now decided to claim her legal rights in place of the provisions under the trust-disposition and settlement. The long delay which occurred in coming to this conclusion obviously arose from the doubt in the mind of Mrs Breen and her agent which was the more profitable choice to make, whether she would be better with her testamentary provisions or with her legitim; and the state of the funds being, as I have said, that there was moveable estate to the amount of at least £150,000, it is pretty plain that the question which they were considering and hesitating about was one under which the two sums—the sum to be got by claiming her legal rights, and the sum or benefit to be got by taking the testamentary provisions—were pretty nearly equal in value. There must have been considerable ground for hesitation, or this delay would not have taken place in the face of the repeated suggestions that some decision should be come to.

Now, the view Mrs Breen and her agent took of the matter was this:—They assumed she was entitled in name of legitim to one-half of the entire moveable succession, which, of course, would amount to £70,000 or thereby; and, on the other hand, she would have got from the settlement an income of £3200 per annum by way of liferent, and also a capital sum of £22,000. Looking at the case in that view, there was undoubtedly ground for hesitation. The testamentary provisions would certainly give Mrs Breen a larger income than she would possibly have by betaking herself to her legal rights; but, on the other hand, if she claimed her legitim, then she got her provision in the form of a capital sum, and that was a subject for grave consideration. It is said now by her brother, Mr Inglis, that she was not entitled to one-half of the moveable succession in the name of legitim, but only to one-fourth. Now, one-fourth of the moveable succession would be £35,000 or £36,000, and it might very fairly be asked whether, in deciding between an annual income of £3200, in addition to a capital sum of £22,000, or, on the other hand, £35,000 or £36,000, there was any room for hesitation at all. No sane person would make any room for deliberation upon such a subject, or would prefer to take the £35,000 instead of the testamentary provisions. It would not require a year, or a month, or a week to decide between these two things, and therefore, prima facie, it seems exceedingly improbable, and it turns out in the end not to be the fact, that Mrs Breen or her advisers ever for one moment imagined they were making an election between £35,000 or £36,000 and the testamentary provisions. That is the first point in this case which seems to me to be entirely free from doubt.

No. 140.
May 31, 1887.
Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

The next question is, if this was a misapprehension under which Mrs Breen was labouring, how was the misapprehension brought about? Of course we are not here to decide whether she would be entitled to one-half of the moveable succession or to one-fourth; we are here to decide whether she has made an election by which she is bound, and nothing else. That is the subject of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and I think the Lord Ordinary has quite properly decided this question before going any further, because if it is decided in the way the Lord Ordinary has done, it puts an end to all further litigation. It is quite plain that this misapprehension, if it was one, was brought about by the conduct of the trustees and of Mr John Inglis jun. As to the evidence, I shall come to that by-and-bye, but undoubtedly Mrs Breen was acting under the belief when she made the election that she was choosing between £70,000 and the testamentary provisions.

It has been contended that whatever may have been Mrs Breen's state of mind, or her mistake about the law of the case, she has finally elected, by the letter of 28th January, and that she cannot possibly withdraw that letter, or deliberate further as to the choice she has so made. I think it is of some consequence to observe in what form this election was made. It was not made by the form of a written instrument, because this letter was not such in any sense. It was a mere letter written in the ordinary course of business in the handwriting of Mr Kidston's clerk, and subscribed by Mr Kidston. In my estimation it was nothing more than a piece of evidence of a parole election, because, in order to make it binding on Mrs Breen, it must be proved, in the first instance, that Mr Kidston signed it, and it must be proved in the second place that he was authorised to sign it. That being so, it has none of the characteristics of a written instrument, and it is nothing more than a circumstance which, along with other parole evidence, establishes that such an election was made.

But then it is said that the misapprehension under which Mrs Breen laboured, if it was a misapprehension, was an error of law, and not an error of fact. I do not think there was any error of law at all, but I think there was an error of fact. I am not going to give any opinion upon the question whether Mrs Breen was entitled to one-half or one-fourth of the moveable estate as her legitim; all I say is, that there was no error in law. I mean that she never took into consideration the question of law at all, nor was she advised about the question of law by her law-agent. And in order to make out there was an error of law, it would be necessary first to establish that she was only entitled to one-fourth of the moveable succession. That has not yet been established, and until it is established there can be no error of law in the case, but there was a very clear error in fact. This error consisted in that she believed, and was led to believe, that neither the trustees nor her brother disputed or doubted that, if she took her legitim, she was entitled to £70,000. That was a very plain error,

No. 140. and it was an error in fact under which she laboured when she made the election by the letter of 28th January.

Inglis' Trustees
v. Inglis.

Let us see what Mrs Breen and her agent say upon this matter. She says,—“On 27th January 1885 I went up to Glasgow to meet Mr Kidston, in consequence of a resolution of the trustees of 15th January calling upon me to make my election. I called at Mr Kidston's office on 28th January. He read over the draft of a letter which he had prepared, and which he proposed to send to Mr Robertson. In consequence of what took place between Mr Kidston and me, he altered the draft in the manner shewn by the red ink markings. I still disliked it, and in consequence I arranged to have another meeting with him at the St Enoch's Hotel that afternoon. He called there. My husband was in the room during part of the time. Mr Kidston again read the letter. I said I did not like it. I did not feel comfortable about it. I was not satisfied. I felt as if I was being forced into saying something I did not want to say. I said I had not got sufficient information, but if Mr Kidston thought it would settle matters and put an end to all further trouble, I was quite willing to accept the half of the personal estate as I had been advised. I asked him to state that. Mr Kidston made some pencil alterations upon the draft, and took it away to his office.” And further on,—“I am quite positive that I asked Mr Kidston if he thought that, by accepting the half of the personal estate, it would end the matter. He thought so, and that was my reason for agreeing. (Q.) If you had thought that by writing that letter you were embarking in a litigation or dispute with your brother, would you have allowed it to go? (A.) No. My brother had never spoken to me at all on the subject of my right to the half of the personal estate. He was present at meetings of the trustees when the subject came up. He must have heard Mr Robertson explaining his views upon that matter to the trustees. Mr Robertson throughout explained that if I took my legitim I would get the half of the personal estate. Until after the letter of 28th January was sent my brother never hinted at any intention on his part to dispute that, neither at the meetings nor to me personally.” Mr Kidston again gives evidence to the same effect as regards the condition of his own and Mrs Breen's mind upon the matter. Mr Kidston says,—“On 16th January 1884 I waited upon Mr Robertson, who explained to me that he wished me to become their agent” [i.e., the agent of claimants Mr and Mrs Breen]. “He told me that a valuable succession had opened to Mrs Breen by the death of her father, and he thought it advisable a separate agent should be employed on her behalf. He mentioned she would be entitled to the provisions under the settlement or to her legal rights, and that it would be necessary to be very careful to see that everything was properly explained and made clear to her. I had meetings with him next day and the day afterwards, and on one or other of these days he stated that the amount of her legal rights would be a very large sum—that it would come up to between £70,000 and £80,000, so far as he could then judge, that being the half of the personal estate. He distinctly conveyed to me his opinion that she was entitled to the half of the personal estate. That was my own opinion also—that is, failing collation with her brother. That was the view on which throughout these proceedings I acted, and on which I advised Mrs Breen. I never hinted to her any doubt as to her right to half the personal estate, failing collation.” And further on,—“I have no doubt that in authorising me to send that letter it was in Mrs Breen's mind that she was entitled to the half of the personal estate. It never entered my mind or hers, so far as I knew, that there would be any difficulty or dispute about the matter." And lastly, at the conclusion of his examination by the Court he says,—“In the election which I advised Mrs Breen to make, and which she did make, I was proceeding upon the view that she was to get the half of the whole personalty, whatever it was.”

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

That evidence proves satisfactorily to my mind that Mrs Breen and her adviser were under the distinct impression, induced by the information they had received from Mr Robertson, the law-agent of the trustees, and from the trustees themselves, that the election which she had to make was between half of the moveable estate and the testamentary provisions, and that no dispute would ever be raised on that question.

Now, turning from that evidence to Mr Robertson, who certainly gives very distinct and impartial testimony in the case, I think he very distinctly shews that this was his view also, and also the view of all the other parties interested. It appears that Mr Robertson had three meetings with Mrs Breen on the subject, and in regard to these he says,—“On all the three occasions I told Mrs Breen that, according to my opinion, she was entitled to the whole legitim fund, which I estimated at between £70,000 and £72,000—I mean the half of the personal estate. I told her that, all things considered, were I in her shoes, I would take the provisions at common law rather than the provisions under the settlement, but I did not advise her to take them. It would certainly not have been her interest to take her provision at common law unless she had been entitled to the whole amount. The question of Mrs Breen's legal rights was mentioned by me certainly at two meetings of the trustees. One of these would be early in 1884, and probably there were two occasions in the course of 1884, and on 3d February 1885 I repeated what I had said at former meetings on that subject. At the 1884 meeting or meetings, if there were two, I brought up the matter casually, and mentioned in an off-hand way, ‘This will be a good thing for Mrs Breen; she will get the whole of the legitim fund, which I estimate at about £70,000 or £72,000.’ At that meeting all the trustees were present, including John Inglis and Mrs Breen. I mentioned that subject on only two occasions in 1884, but I mentioned it again at the meeting of 3d February 1885. At the time I made that statement at the meeting of trustees no exception was taken to it by anyone. John Inglis did not utter a word upon the subject. On 28th January 1885 Mr Kidston addressed a letter to me intimating the election. There was a meeting of trustees on 3d February, at which John Inglis was present. I submitted Mr Kidston's letter of 28th January to that meeting. Something was said as to the question of Mrs Breen's legitim. . . . My impression is that the statement regarding that was not volunteered by me, but was given by way of answer to a question thrown out either by Mr Napier, who acted as a kind of leading trustee, or by Mr Ferguson, another of the trustees. It came out very much in this way,—‘What will this lead to?’ And I said, ‘She will get a very considerable sum; she will get the whole of the legitim fund.’ Nothing more was said about it. John Inglis was present, and took no exception to my statement. My natural inference was that as he was not expressing dissent he was to be assumed as assenting. (Q.) Was it your understanding at the time that everybody was agreed upon that? (A.) I did not understand anything to be agreed about that. (Q.) But did you understand there was any difference of opinion as to the amount of the legitim? (A.) I did not understand there was any difference.”

No. 140. In a subsequent passage of his evidence he says,—“So far as I know, none of the trustees except John Inglis had the impression before 3d February that there was to be any question as to the amount of Mrs Breen’s legitim.” There is another witness, Mr Low, who at one of the meetings represented Mr Roberton, who was necessarily absent. His evidence is to the same effect,—“In the absence of Mr Roberton I attended one meeting of the trustees of the late Anthony Inglis in the year 1884, viz, on 9th September. That meeting was called to consider as to a payment by A. & J. Inglis towards the sum due by them to the trustees, and it was agreed to make a payment of £80,000 to account. Then a question was raised by Mr John Inglis junior, I think, as to whether or not he should have a payment to account of the sums due to him under his father’s settlement. The trustees, after some conversation, agreed to make a payment to him, and they were anxious to make him as full payment as they could, keeping themselves safe. That question depended a good deal upon the sum to which Mrs Breen was entitled as legitim. The matter of legitim had never been considered by me before; but I explained to them that the half of the moveable estate was the legitim fund, after deducting expenses. It was then mentioned in the meeting—I forget by whom—that Mrs Breen was entitled to the whole of the legitim fund; whereupon, in making up the calculation for Mr John Inglis, I deducted a sum of £70,000 as her share of the legitim, in fact the whole legitim fund, before making any division, as I said that if there was to be a question raised about it, and it was to be decided against Mr John Inglis, they would have to pay the whole £70,000, and they could not make him any payment out of that sum.” The end was that a sum was paid to Mr Inglis ad interim, leaving enough in hand to pay Mrs Breen her legitim if she claimed it. This was done without any remonstrance from John Inglis junior, or anyone else.

Further, the evidence of the trustees is to the same effect, although very naturally their recollection as to what actually passed at the meetings, or the particular time at which certain things were said, is not so accurate as that of the two legal gentlemen to whose evidence I have already referred. Mr Alexander, for instance, says,—“I have been present at almost all the meetings of the trustees which have been held. Amongst others, I was present on 9th September 1884 when Mr Low appeared for Mr Roberton. At that meeting Mr Low said something about £70,000 to £72,000 being what Mrs Breen would be entitled to under her legal rights—that that was the half of the personalty. I made a note at the time upon the circular calling the meeting as to the amount which was stated as the probable amount of the legitim. I produce that jotting. The free moveable estate is there noted as £141,892, of which Mrs Breen was entitled to from £71,000 to £72,000. On the other side there is this written, ‘If Mrs Breen takes her legitim—£70,000 a half.’ That note was made at the same time, and it refers to the same sum.” Then he is asked as to the meeting of 3d February, “At that time what was your understanding as to the amount of Mrs Breen’s claim for legitim? (A.) I always understood it was the same amount—£70,000 odds, being the half of the personal estate. The whole of the trustees understood that at all the meetings. It was talked of at several of the meetings, although I cannot name the precise dates. It was after the meeting of 3d February—how long after I cannot say—that I first heard Mr John Inglis was making an objection to his sister being paid out on that footing.” Mr Nowery says,—“I attended all the meetings of trustees except one. I was present at a

 spoken of. Probably it had been spoken of in my presence at a previous meeting. I knew Mrs Breen was entitled to claim her legitim if she chose. I heard that expressed at a meeting of the trustees by Mr Robertson. He also explained what was meant by her legitim—that she would be entitled to half of the personal estate. I believe that was said in presence of both Mrs Breen and Mr John Inglis. I think Mr Inglis took exception to that statement. I am not certain as to the date of that. I think the statement to which I have alluded was made at a meeting comparatively early in the trust. (Q.) At that first meeting was any exception taken to it by Mr Inglis? (A.) My impression is that he took exception all along. I think he did say something indicating objection at a meeting. (Q.) When did he first in your presence, at a meeting of trustees, make any statement of that nature? (A.) I think it was after Mrs Breen's election was declared in February 1885. (Q.) Is it your belief that prior to that date he never indicated that her legitim would not be the half of the whole personal estate? (A.) If a discussion took place I think he did. I cannot positively say he stated that before the election; he may, but I cannot say positively. I cannot recall any occasion on which he did so prior to her election." Now, this statement by Mr Nowery is really the only piece of evidence that seems at first sight to throw some doubt on the statements of the other witnesses, but it turns out, in fact, to be just a loose want of recollection on the part of Mr Nowery as to the precise date at which this statement by Mr Inglis was made. I think the conclusion to which Mr Nowery comes on thinking over the matter and recalling the events which he had witnessed is this, that prior to the time when Mrs Breen made her election no statement of the kind and no objection of any kind was made by Mr Inglis to the universally accepted position that the choice Mrs Breen was to make was between the entire legitim fund and her testamentary provisions.

In the meantime Mr Inglis was in a very different state of knowledge and understanding from everybody else. He had consulted an agent of his own, and had received advice from him so far back as April 1884, and the advice he had received was that if his sister elected to take her legitim she would be entitled only to one-half of the legitim-fund, or one-fourth of the moveable estate. But that advice he kept to himself, and never mentioned it to anybody concerned—not to Mrs Breen, his sister, nor to her husband, nor to Mr Robertson, who was acting for the trustees, nor to any of the trustees. He kept it locked in his own breast until his sister had made her election, and immediately upon that event he disclosed it. In his own evidence Mr Inglis states quite distinctly that he did not mention it to anyone until the meeting of 3d February 1885, after his sister had made her election. He says,—“I did not tell him,” i.e., Mr Robertson, “of the advice I had got from Mr France until 3d February 1885, and then at the private meeting I had with him after the meeting of trustees. I had not mentioned it to any of the trustees. I think the meeting at which Mr Robertson stated in Mrs Breen's presence that if she took legitim she would be entitled to half of the whole moveable estate was early in 1884. I did not at any meeting state the contrary advice which I had got, because I was not asked, and I did not see I had any business to volunteer information or advice to Mrs Breen.” But on the 3d February 1885, at the meeting at which Mrs Breen's election was announced, Mr Robertson tells us,—“Mr Inglis remained after the meeting, and sitting down he said,—‘I do not wish you to assume that I am a consenting party to the views you have been expressing at the meeting of the trustees.' I said, 'Hallo, what's up now?' and he said, 'I have been advised by Bannatyne & Kirkwood, or rather by Mr France, that Mrs Breen is not entitled to the whole of the legitim fund.' Until he made that communication I did not know that he had been consulting other agents. My firm had been throughout agents for the firm of A. & J. Inglis, and are so still. Something passed between John Inglis and me in January 1884 on the subject of his having a separate agent." Again, Mr Robertson says,—“When I got the intimation from John Inglis on 3d February 1885, which I have mentioned, I considered it imposed a duty upon me with regard to Mrs Breen. I thought that as she and her agent had been going upon the assumption got from me that she was entitled to the whole of the legitim fund, it was only fair and reasonable to give her agent the earliest possible intimation.” Accordingly, he wrote a letter to Mr Kidston, dated 5th February, in these terms:—“As I believe that in electing to take at common law instead of under the trust-disposition and settlement, Mrs Breen has been going on the assumption that she is entitled to the whole of the legitim fund, I think it proper to acquaint you that Messrs Bannatyne, Kirkwood, M'Jannet, & France have advised Mr John Inglis junior that he is entitled to participate in that fund, and this without his being liable to collate the heritaga.—Yours faithfully, JAMES ROBERTSON.” On the same day Mr Kidston answered,—“I have to-day your letters of yesterday and this date. With reference to the latter, you expressed an opinion to Mrs Breen in which I concurred—that she would be entitled to the whole of the legitim fund—and her intention to make the election was based upon the assumption that that would be the case. I am also informed by Mrs Breen that in September last, at a meeting of trustees, when both she and Mr Inglis were present, her legal rights were explained to her and Mr Inglis to be a claim to one-half of the moveable estate as legitim. Had Mr Inglis given earlier intimation of his claim to participate in the legitim without collating, I would not have written in the terms of my letter to you of the 28th ulto. The trustees will therefore be good enough to hold Mrs Breen's election as still in abeyance.—Yours faithfully, JOHN KIDSTON.” This communication which Mr Robertson made, and very properly made, to Mr Kidston as soon as he became aware of the position which Mr Inglis had taken up appears to have given great offence to Mr Inglis. He seems to give expression to this in some of his letters to Mr Robertson,—“Thinking over the matter, it occurred to me that as the question of division of legitim did not arise at a meeting of trustees, but in a subsequent conversation, Mr Kidston was not bound to have it communicated to him any more than I should ask their intentions. I would not have anything shabby done in my interest, but I shall keep them at arm's length if I can, and take every advantage I can with due regard to what is honourable.—Yours faithfully, JOHN INGLIS.” This was on the 9th February 1885, and very shortly after the time when his views were first disclosed. Again, on the 9th March he writes to Mr Robertson,—“It is evident that there is a desire to make out that Mrs B. is the victim of a scheme or plot, and that you and I are probably conspirators. Alexander's line of argument seems to point to something of that sort. . . . After all, we have no evidence that she made her election because she thought she would get all the legitim; she says so, but that is no reason for believing it.” And on the 13th April,—“As I leave for London to-night, I may be unable to attend the next meeting of my father's trustees, but they will, of course, keep distinctly in view that Mrs Breen having elected to claim her legal rights in place of the settlement provisions in her favour must be dealt with by them upon that footing and no other." Mr Inglis, in his evidence, says,—“Being referred to my letter of 9th February to Mr Robertson, and to the paragraph beginning, ‘Thinking over the matter,’ &c., I meant, by ‘the question of division of legitim,’ the manner how legitim would be divided. (Q.) Did you mean the question whether Mrs Breen would be entitled to half of the whole estate under legitim, or only the fourth? (A.) The manner of division. (Q.) Did you mean the question whether Mrs Breen would be entitled to the half or to the fourth of the moveable estate as legitim? (A.) Well, I suppose so. I did not object to Mr Robertson informing Mrs Breen that there would be any question of that nature. (Q.) Looking at the paragraph referred to, did you not intend by that paragraph to find fault with him for having communicated to Mr Kidston that there was any question as to the proportion of the estate which would be Mrs Breen's legitim? (A.) I did not object to his communicating to Mr Kidston that I had a different opinion from him. I objected to Mrs Breen being told the grounds of that opinion. (Q.) If you were advised in April 1884 that Mrs Breen was entitled only to one-fourth, why did you not communicate that fact to the trustees or Mrs Breen before February 1885? (A.) Because I was not asked or called upon. I was a party to the minutes of the trustees calling upon her to elect. (Q.) Did you wish her to elect in ignorance of the fact that you had been advised that her legitim was only one-fourth instead of a half? (A.) She must have been in ignorance. (Q.) Did you wish her to elect in ignorance of that fact? (A.) In ignorance of the advice I had—Yes. I had no motive for withholding the advice I had received other than that I was not called upon to give it. If I had been asked for advice I would have offered it. I regarded the letter of 3d February as a final election. (Q.) Was it because you thought Mrs Breen had finally elected and was bound that you then for the first time communicated to Mr Robertson your position? (A.) I thought it was time to communicate, because otherwise payment would have been made. When I made that communication I thought she was bound. (Q.) Did you choose that time to make communication because you thought she was by that time bound? (A.) I thought that was the proper time to make it, because otherwise the trustees would probably have proceeded to give her the money.”

Taking Mr Inglis' evidence and his letters together, I think they prove this—and I do not want to state the case against him more strongly than is necessary for the purpose of deciding the question before the Court—that Mrs Breen and the trustees and Mr Robertson being all at one in their opinion that the amount of Mrs Breen's legitim would be one-half of the personal estate of the deceased, Mr Inglis took advice from a law-agent as to whether that would be so as early as April 1884. Subsequent to that time, and having received advice that she was entitled to only one-quarter of the whole estate instead of one-half, Mr Inglis attended meetings of the trustees at which the subject of Mrs Breen's legitim was discussed, when he found everyone assuming as a matter of course that one-half of the personal estate was to be Mrs Breen's legitim if she took her legal rights, and he never said a word against this; he kept to himself entirely the advice he had received, but as soon as he thought that his sister had finally committed herself to the choice of her legal rights in preference to the testamentary provisions, he then came out with his great law point, and announced

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

Taking the evidence of Mr Inglis with the other evidence in the case, I think we have it very clearly proved that Mrs Breen had elected to take her legitim because she believed it to be half of the moveable estate, and that she was induced to that belief by the trustees and by Mr Inglis, her brother. We have it also proved that nobody ever raised any question or suggested the slightest doubt that that was so, and yet all the time Mr Inglis had in his pocket the advice of his law-agent that that was not so, and he kept up that advice until Mrs Breen was induced into an erroneous belief that there was to be no dispute about the matter, or rather that her taking her legitim was to end all dispute. He kept up that advice, and allowed her to go on in that belief to make her election, and the moment that was made he then insisted that she should be held to it, notwithstanding the plain error in the matter of fact upon which she made her election—that error being that she took her legitim to put an end to all dispute in the assumed belief derived from the trustees, the agent to the trustees, and Mr Inglis himself, that there would be no doubt or difficulty if she took that course.

I think that that election was made in such circumstances as fully to entitle Mrs Breen to withdraw and to claim as she has now done in this multiplepounding the provisions settled upon her in the trust-disposition and settlement. The ground of fact upon which she proceeded is proved to be no fact, that is to say, Mr Inglis has challenged that which everyone held to be settled, and so the belief under which Mrs Breen acted was an erroneous belief brought about very much by the conduct of Mr Inglis himself—certainly by no fault of herself, but, I think, to a very great extent by the fault of her opponent, her brother.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that what we have to dispose of is the question of fact whether Mrs Breen, when she wrote or caused to be written the letter of the 28th January, was under essential error as to what she was doing. She, no doubt, knew that she required to elect between her legal rights and the provisions her father had made in her favour, and it was intimated that she had resolved to claim her legal rights. But then it is, I think, very distinctly proved that when this was done she and her agent were both in the firm belief that she was to receive the one-half of her father's personal estate, which she knew was estimated to amount to at least £70,000. Now, this belief was founded upon information she had received from the agent of the trustees; and the whole of those trustees knew that such was her belief. It was upon this assumption then that the letter of 28th January was written, and it was under that same belief on the part of the trustees that the letter was received and directed to be acted upon by them at the meeting held on 3d February 1885. Mrs Breen believed she was to get a sum of about £70,000, and the trustees, as a body, and their agents, believed that she had elected to take and would receive that sum; and the only person who it now seems did not actually believe this to be her position was her brother, who still disputes her claim. But as soon as Mr Inglis' intention in this respect was communicated to Mrs Breen's agent he at once intimated that Mrs Breen's election must be held to be still in abeyance. In these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that, as the alleged election was made under an entirely erroneous impression on the part of Mrs Breen as to the precise pecuniary position in which she might be placed if she elected to take her legitim, she was entitled to retract that election. I agree, therefore, in the result at which your Lordship has arrived.

No. 140.

May 31, 1887.
Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

LORD SHAND.—I think this case is very clear and easy of decision, so much so that I have difficulty in believing that Mr Inglis could have supposed that any Court of law would give effect to his contention, or that he can ever have been advised he could possibly succeed in cutting down his sister's right to a mere fourth of his father's moveable estate. It is perfectly clear upon the narrative of the facts, as given by your Lordship in the chair, that Mrs Breen made her choice acting on the belief that all parties, including her brother, were agreed that she was entitled to one-half of the moveable estate—that is, to about £70,000, and it was not until she had acted on that belief so far as to allow her agent to send the letter of 28th January, intimating her election to the trustees, that she discovered that her brother had secretly entertained the intention to take advantage of her if he could, and to have her right restricted to one-fourth only of the moveable estate—i.e., to £35,000 in place of £70,000.

If the Court were to hold that Mrs Breen had conclusively elected to take her legal rights, a serious question is raised as to the amount to which she would thereby be entitled. Mrs Breen maintains that she would have a right to one-half of the moveables. Mr Inglis maintains that she would only be entitled to one-fourth; and he, at all events, now puts his case in this way, that Mrs Breen took her risk that her claim might be cut down to £35,000. When we look at the figures—a rough estimate of which has been prepared for us by the parties—it seems impossible that Mr Inglis could for a moment have supposed that Mrs Breen would claim her legitim if either the amount was to be cut down to £35,000, or she were to take the risk of a serious question which might lead to that result. By taking her provisions under the will, she would be entitled to a sum of £32,000, as to £10,000 of which her right to a liferent use was excluded (for as to that sum her power is only to test in regard to it), and in addition she would have had a liferent of half the residue of the estate, i.e., about £3200 a year. It is clear she would never have entertained the idea of electing her legal rights, taking only £35,000 in lieu of these provisions. The very statement of the figures is enough to shew that Mrs Breen must have acted on the belief that she would receive one-half of the moveable estate, or about £70,000. I do not mean to resume to any effect the consideration of the evidence which your Lordship has gone over. It is clear that Mrs Breen acted upon the view that every one interested in the matter understood she was to receive a sum of £70,000. It was upon that view she proceeded, but it now appears that she was mistaken in so far as her brother was concerned; and having been in error regarding that matter of fact, I have no hesitation in holding that she is entitled to go back upon the choice she made.

It appears to me that the mistake was clearly one of fact, but if it had been a mistake in law I think the result would have been the same. Suppose that Mrs Breen, labouring under an error of law in thinking that she was entitled as legitim to a half of the estate, while in law her right was only to a fourth, intimated her election, and that from this cause, in place of £70,000 she was only entitled to £35,000, the same result would, I think, follow. That would not be a case of condictio indebiti, where money has passed, and where a mistake in law will not entitle the person who made the payment to recover the

No. 140. money, nor a case of a transaction where one person has been led by the action of another to do something to his disadvantage, against which he cannot be restored. I think it is both law and justice that, where a choice like Mrs Breen's is made under an error either in fact or law, there shall be redress, at least where, as here, matters are entire.

Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to. And I do not think it would make any difference whether Mr Inglis had been a party to Mrs Breen's mistake or not. The fact of the mistake is sufficient to entitle her to come to the Court to ask to be restored against it. The authorities which have been quoted to us support this view. But if in addition Mr Inglis acted, as I think he did, so as to induce the erroneous belief in his sister's mind, all the more is she entitled to her remedy. I think it is a principle of the law that whatever may be the real intention of any person interested in a transaction, wherever an intention has been manifested, so as to induce another to act upon it, the person who has so induced another to act will be barred from afterwards denying that the intention he manifested was his real intention. This seems to me to be the result of the judgment in the case of Freeman v. Cook (2 Exch. 654), to which effect was given in the Scottish case of Stewart's Trustees v. Hart (3 R. 192). That doctrine has been made part of the law for the purpose of enforcing honest dealing between parties to pecuniary transactions, and has been enforced in many cases with the result of compelling parties to act honestly towards each other. If the doctrine were to be applied to the present case, and if Mrs Breen preferred to stand upon her legal rights, taking up the ground that she was induced to act as she did, by what was at the time Mr Inglis' intention manifested to her, she would, I think, be in a position to claim the £70,000 if she thought fit. If so, it seems to follow that she is also entitled to say to Mr Inglis, There has been misunderstanding, of which you have been the inducing cause, and as matters are still entire, I have right to be reinstated, and put in the same position as if the misunderstanding had not occurred.

On these grounds, I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to, and I have no difficulty in reaching that result. I only desire to add one remark in regard to the following passage in the Lord Ordinary's note, where his Lordship says—"If an election was well made and intimated on 28th January, I am of opinion that it was beyond the power of Mrs Breen to withdraw it." I desire to reserve my opinion on that matter. In the absence of any action or transaction following upon the alleged election, I am not prepared to agree with the Lord Ordinary's view. Indeed, my opinion at this moment is to a contrary effect.

LORD ADAM.—In my opinion nothing can be clearer than that upon the 28th January 1885, when Mrs Breen is said to have made her election, she was in the belief that she was entitled to one-half of the personal estate, and that no one of those who were interested in the matter disputed the correctness of that belief. It is said that she was labouring under an error in law in entertaining such a belief, because as matter of fact she was not entitled to one-half of the estate, but only to one-fourth. Whether there was, or is, this error in law or not, no one knows—at all events I do not know. But Mrs Breen's error was not one of law. It consisted in this, that she understood she was to get undisputed and unquestionable possession of one-half of the estate. That is a pure error of fact, and of a fact which was essential and of the most vital importance, and I have no doubt that she is entitled to be restored against it. No. 140.

With reference to the opinion which has been expressed by the Lord Ordinary, ^{May 31, 1887.} Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis. and adverted to by Lord Shand, viz., that if an election was well made on 28th January, it was beyond Mrs Breen's power to withdraw it, I can only say that as I think the case is very clear on the ground I have stated, I have not thought it necessary to make up my mind upon that point. The inclination of my opinion is in the direction indicated by Lord Shand, and at present I am not prepared to concur in the Lord Ordinary's views in that respect.

Roden.

Expenses—Reparation—Vindication of Character—Nominal damages.—In an action of damages for vindication of character, the jury found the pursuer entitled to one farthing of damages. Circumstances in which the Court found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

IN an action of damages at the instance of Hugh Bonnar, butter 1st DIVISION. merchant, Tullagan and Sligo, Ireland, against John F. Roden, medical student in the University of Edinburgh, the following issue was sent to the jury on 21st March 1887:—"Whether, on or about the 14th day of October 1886, the defender, John F. Roden, wrote or caused to be written and sent, or caused to be sent to the inspector of the Butter Market in Sligo, Ireland, the letter in the terms set forth in schedule annexed, and whether the said letter, or any part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as having been guilty of fraud or dishonesty in the transactions therein referred to, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?" B.

"Damages laid at £1000."

The letter referred to, which bore to be from F. Roden & Son, provision merchants, Edinburgh, and addressed to the Butter Inspector, Sligo Market, Sligo, was in the following terms:—"Dear Sir, —Will you be able to recollect if Mr Hugh Bonnar bought in your market on Tuesday August 17th last a large number of firkins qualified by you as firsts? There is a law-suit pending between him and us about twelve firkins—a part of the large consignment he bought that day—he sold us, which he described as being the finest Sligo first qualified by you. When we received the butter we found it was not equal to thirds, as it was oily and greasy; we returned the butter to him. You will oblige me very much by giving me what information you can on the subject, as it is my conviction that this butter never passed through your hands as firsts, and even perhaps never entered your market. It is, sir, a gross injustice to your market to have men coming here selling such an inferior butter as Irish firsts. It is such misrepresentation that has caused our Irish butter to lose its hold on this and our markets, and the sooner Irishmen, both at home and here, put their foot on it the better it will be for our Irish butter trade."

At the trial it was proved that the letter was written by the defender and sent to the inspector as averred. The inspector did not shew the

No. 141. letter to anyone, but sent it direct to the pursuer, who immediately raised the present action.
June 1, 1887. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at one farthing.
Bonnar v. Roden.

The presiding Judge, the Lord President, certified, in terms of sec. 40 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, that the cause was one brought for the vindication of character, and that it was in his opinion fit to be tried in the Court of Session.

On 1st June the pursuer moved the First Division of the Court to apply the verdict, and asked for expenses. He maintained that in every action of damages on the ground of defamation of character, even though only nominal damages were awarded, the pursuer was entitled to expenses.¹

The defender maintained that the pursuer should not be found entitled to expenses, the damages awarded being merely nominal. There had been no publication here, and the pursuer's character had not suffered in the least. Further, the defender had had no chance of tendering an apology until the case was on the point of going to the jury, and then the terms on which the pursuer agreed to withdraw the action were very high. The general rule was that nominal damages did not carry expenses; at all events it was a matter in the discretion of the Court,² and the evidence did not shew that the pursuer had suffered any injury.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is no doubt a case of nominal damages, but I certified under the statute that the case was one brought for the vindication of the pursuer's character, and I certified further that it was a fit case to be tried in the Court of Session. The issue is a serious one, and the jury affirmed it, and have therefore found that the defender falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having been guilty of fraud and dishonesty. Now, that is a very serious charge, and if the libel had been extensively published I can have no doubt that the jury would have awarded very different damages. But the peculiarity of the case is that the libel was uttered in a letter to the inspector of markets where the butter was bought, and that the inspector on receipt of the letter very discreetly sent it to the pursuer, no one else having seen it. Of course the pursuer said nothing about the libel; if he had, it would have disentitled him probably from getting any damages, and the fact is that no one saw it but the inspector, and that he did nothing towards the publication of it. That state of facts, I think, quite accounts for the smallness of the damages awarded, still I cannot help thinking that the action was quite justified, and that the pursuer was entitled to have a verdict to clear his character though the libel was never published. For these reasons I think the pursuer is entitled to his expenses.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT applied the verdict, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

Westlands v.
Pirie.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate child—Aliment—Mora—Offer by father to take child.—In 1863 a woman was delivered of an illegitimate child in her father's house. The putative father admitted the paternity, and until the child was four years old made contributions in name of aliment to its maternal grandfather, with whom it continued to live. He then made an offer to take the child to his own house, which both its mother and its maternal grandfather declined. Thereafter the father contributed little or nothing towards the child's support. It continued to live with its grandfather till its seventeenth year, when it went to its mother. She had previously contributed nothing directly to its support, although she was in the habit of residing with her father for considerable periods, when she was not in domestic service. The maternal grandfather died in 1883, without having made any demand on the father in respect of the child's aliment. In 1886 the mother raised an action for payment of a sum in name of inlying expenses and of aliment down to the child's thirteenth year. Held (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to recover, and defender assoluted.

ON 9th June 1886 John Westland, carter, Edinburgh, and Elizabeth M'Arthur or Westland, his wife, raised an action against George Pirie, contractor, Aberdeen, concluding for payment of a sum in name of inlying expenses and aliment, till its thirteenth year, in respect of an illegitimate male child of which the female pursuer was delivered on 12th June 1863, and of which the defender, then a farm-servant, was alleged to be the father.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

The defender admitted the paternity of the child, but averred;—(Stat. 1) "Shortly after the birth of the said child the female pursuer went again into service, leaving the child to be maintained by her father, the late James M'Arthur. The boy continued to reside with his grandfather until he reached the age of nineteen, when he went to live with the pursuers in Edinburgh." (Stat. 2) "During all this time the boy was entirely maintained by the said James M'Arthur, with the assistance of the defender. Immediately after the child was born the defender paid James M'Arthur £3 for inlying expenses and aliment, and during the next four years he from time to time paid him further sums for aliment.

. . . The defender married in 1866, and went to live in Aberdeen. At his wife's suggestion he wrote in 1867 to James M'Arthur offering to take his child to live with him, and to provide for it free of expense to its mother or grandfather. Up to this time the defender had contributed to the child's maintenance by payments to the said James M'Arthur, and to his satisfaction. James M'Arthur declined the defender's offer, as he did not wish to part with the boy. Though the defender considered that he had thus discharged any legal obligation incumbent on him, he nevertheless continued ex gratia to send money to James M'Arthur from time to time for the boy's aliment. The defender and James M'Arthur were throughout upon very friendly terms, and the latter never asked the defender for more money. It was well understood on both sides that M'Arthur was maintaining the boy gratuitously as one of his family, and that he had no claim against the defender in respect of such maintenance. Separatim, if he had any claim against the defender, he abandoned and discharged it before his death. Mr M'Arthur never made any claim against the defender." (Stat. 3) ". . . The defender was never asked for money either by the female pursuer or by her husband until February 1886. . . . Up to this time the defender had been in frequent communication with the pursuers—he visiting them when he happened to be in Edinburgh, and the boy spending his holidays with the defender in Aberdeen."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The said child not having been maintained by the female pursuer or her husband during the period when he was unable to support himself, the pursuers have no title to sue. (3) The action is barred by mora, taciturnity, and abandonment. (4) In respect of the offer to provide for the said child, and the other circumstances libelled on, the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was allowed. It was conceded at the hearing in the Inner-House that down to the date of the defender's offer to take the child (which took place when the child was about four years old), the defender had implemented his obligation of contributing to its support by paying sums of money to its maternal grandfather, with whom it lived till its seventeenth year. The evidence was inconclusive as to the defender having made any payments after the date of the offer. He deponed that he made contributions through his own father to the female pursuer's father. The total amount of his contributions in respect of the child he estimated at £100. The female pursuer contributed nothing directly to its support, and until this action made no demand upon the defender, but in 1880 the son himself wrote to his father asking for £2 to enable him to attend a class, which request the defender declined. She lived in her father's house, when not in service, alternately for several years with her sister. She deponed that it was necessary that either she or her sister should be at home, as their mother was in weak health. Her father died in August 1883. It did not appear that after he had declined the defender's offer to take the child, he had ever made any demand upon the defender on account of the child.

On 2d March 1887, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender, as the father of the illegitimate child, is liable for his aliment, and finds that after making allowance for some payments made to account thereof, there remains a balance still due of £50, for which sum decerns against the defender, with interest thereon from the date of citation till paid: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—In this case I am inclined to give a good deal of weight to the statements made by the parties in their record,—the record being always before the Judge where the case is investigated by a proof without a jury. The defender admits the paternity of the child for whom aliment is claimed, and he says that, immediately after the child was born, he paid James M'Arthur, the pursuer's father, £3 for inlying expenses and aliment. During the next four years he from time to time paid him further sums for aliment. Then he explains that in 1867—that is, at the end of the four years—he wrote to James M'Arthur offering to take the child to live with him, and to provide for it free of expense to its mother or grandfather; and, passing over the next sentence, he says that, while he considered that he had thus discharged any legal obligation incumbent on him, nevertheless he continued ex gratia to send money to James M'Arthur from time to time for the boy's aliment. 'The defender and James M'Arthur were throughout on friendly terms, and the latter never asked the defender for more money.' Then the defender says it was well understood that M'Arthur was to maintain the boy gratuitously as one of his family, and that he had no claim against the defender in respect of such maintenance. I read these statements as averring that, during the first four years of the boy's life, the defender had fulfilled his legal obligation to maintain the child, but that thereafter he considered that had come to an end. Any sums he had given ex gratia I conclude must have been small, because he says it was well understood on both sides that M'Arthur was to maintain the boy gratuitously, and that

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The female pursuer had contributed nothing to the support of her child. It had lived in her father's house, and had been supported partly by him, and partly by contributions from the defender. That these contributions were sufficient in the grand-father's eyes to discharge all claims he had against the defender was shewn by his having made no demand on the defender. Receipts were neither given nor expected in such cases. There was no claim therefore which the pursuer could insist in as representing her father. If she had any independent claim of her own, that was lost by her refusal of the defender's offer to take the child, and by her long silence. The offer was a good offer. No doubt, at its date the child was only four years old, but the only real limit of age in such a case was the fact that the child was still at its mother's breast.¹ Further, the circumstances here—that the child was living with its grandfather, and was not really in its mother's custody—took the case out of the seven years' rule, if there was such a rule. Then, while it was admitted that the triennial prescription did not apply²—although in so far as the mother claimed as representing her father it did³—the long delay in making the claim was a good answer.⁴ The case of *Moncreiff*⁵ was special, because there the Court proceeded on the fact a formal deed of discharge had been founded on in defence, but not proved. The parties were entitled to come to an arrangement, and the long silence imported an arrangement.

Argued for the pursuers;—The offer was a bad offer, as it was not such as the mother was bound to accept, the child not being seven years old. The child was in its mother's custody when in her father's house, and she statement is quite inconsistent with the idea that the defender continued to aliment him on the footing of a legal obligation.

"Now, the statement on record is not inconsistent with the evidence which the defender has given in Court; because, while he speaks positively as to his contribution during the infancy of the child, his statements of what he did after the first three or four years are very vague. He cannot mention any sums, except payments, which he made by arrangement with his father and the pursuer's father; he sent what he thought right—what he could spare—through his father to the pursuer's father, which he understood went to the aliment of the boy. All that is extremely vague. If he had regularly, during the period of fourteen years, or whatever the period is, paid a fixed sum at periodical times, I should have given great weight to the argument that the mother's claim was satisfied; because, when a claim like this is made so many years after the event, if any precise statement is made about it being discharged, I should be inclined to receive such a statement with great favour, there being no explanation of the cause of delay in making the claim. But, taking the defender's evidence as amounting merely to evidence of casual payments, the amount of which he is unable to state, and the only corroboration being by his brother, whose evidence has reference to one payment during all that time, I have to set against it the positive evidence of the pursuer Mrs Westland and her sister and son, who all say that they know nothing of any such payments having been made by the defender. Their belief was that the boy was maintained by his maternal grandfather. Therefore, I cannot hold that the defender has either averred or proved such payments in discharge of his legal obligation as would entitle him to be absolved from this action . . ."

Westlands v.
Piria.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case of some peculiarity. The Lord Ordinary has decided in favour of the pursuers, that their claim, on account of the aliment of a child born twenty-four years ago, should be allowed. The facts as they have come out are simply these: The child was born in the house of his maternal grandfather, who brought him up, and with whom he remained till he was seventeen years of age. There were in the grandfather's house from time to time two of his daughters, one of whom is the present pursuer, the mother of the child. They worked in their father's house when not otherwise engaged in service, as they frequently were; and although the evidence is not very distinct on the matter, they were apparently at home alternately for a period of six or seven years. The demand now made against the defender by the mother and her husband is for aliment from the child's birth till he reached the age of thirteen. The defender does not deny the paternity of the child, but he says that the boy was brought up by his maternal grandfather, and that he, the defender, bore a certain proportion of the expense for some years after the child's birth, that, when the child was between four and five years old, he made an offer to take him and bring him up himself, that this offer was rejected, and that from that time until the present claim was put forward no demand whatever was made upon him for the aliment of the boy.

This is not a claim which is entitled to much favour, because the facts have been left very obscure, from the circumstance that the pursuers have chosen to make no claim until after the death of the grandfather, who expended the money and alimented the boy. It is said that the mother, by her service in her father's house, contributed to the aliment of her child. I do not think it is clear on what footing she was in her father's house, and I doubt whether she was there regarded as a servant entitled to wages. We have no distinct evidence on that matter, but we have evidence that after the defender had for three or four years made payments towards the child's aliment, he offered to take it and provide for it, that that offer was rejected, and that, after that, no farther claim was made upon the defender. Now, if the mother had been living in a house of her own, and supporting herself by her own industry, there might have been some ground for saying that such an offer was not sufficient to bar all future claims by the mother against the father for the aliment of their child; but looking to the fact that she was living in her father's house, I think that the defender's offer to take the child was, in the circumstances, a valid offer, and that it does not come within the category of the rule that a young child should not be taken from its mother's care by an offer of this kind on the part of the father. I think that this is in the circumstances a stale demand, and that the defender's offer is sufficient to liberate him. I therefore propose to your Lordships to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assolvie the defender.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and if the case had stood on this ground only—that the father of the child had paid aliment for it for four or five years from its birth, and had then offered to take it and provide for it entirely himself, instead of leaving it in the care of its maternal grandfather, with whom it had been living, I should have arrived at the same conclusion. But there is more in the case than that. The child was born in its maternal grandfather's house, and was brought up there till it reached the age of seventeen. It was admitted at the bar that the case was to be taken on the footing that for the first four years sums were paid by the father to the grandfather towards the aliment of the child. The defender was then a farm servant. I don't know whether he could write, or whether the grandfather could write,—probably the grandfather was the less likely of the two to be able to do so, as he was of an older generation; but when a farm servant pays £1 or 10s., or even larger sums in name of aliment for his bastard child, I do not think he habitually takes receipts for such payments, and docketts and files them for forty years, in case actions may afterwards be raised against him for payment of the aliment he has already paid. Therefore, unless there is some other way of proving payment within the forty years, innumerable actions of this description might be brought, and would be unanswerable. The defender says he paid sums in name of aliment which he estimates at £100 in all—probably he paid less than that by a good deal, but that he paid sufficient to satisfy the grandfather with whom the child was brought up I conclude—and I think it is the proper judicial conclusion—from the fact that the grandfather lived for twenty years afterwards without making any further demand, and that this action was not brought until he had lain in his grave for several years. The pursuer in her evidence says:—"I had written to the defender before leaving my father's house, and he wrote me a letter in 1865, when the child was two years old, saying that he would take him. In my letter to the defender I asked money from him. I never answered his letter offering to take the child"; and then on the next page of the proof she adds:—"I instructed Mr Barclay to write him for aliment in February 1886. That was the first claim I made on the defender since I wrote him in 1865." So that she is absolutely silent for a period of twenty-one years, she indicates no claim against the defender, but now she brings this action when, as she informs us in her evidence, "it is three years past in August since my father died, and my mother died shortly before that." In these circumstances I think the ground of action here is not proved; the evidence does not satisfy me that during these twenty-one years there was any debt due either to the child's grandfather or grandmother, who brought up the child, but who died without having made any claim, or to its mother, who does not appear to have contributed anything towards its support. On the whole matter therefore I am prepared to find that the averments of the pursuers are not established, and to assolve the defender.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have found this case to be attended with difficulty. The child, I think, was throughout, in the ordinary sense of the word, maintained by its mother. No doubt it lived in its grandfather's house, but that is not an uncommon occurrence in cases of this kind. Its mother placed it there; that was the way in which she fulfilled her obligation of maintaining her child. Now, the defender has not contributed anything—or much—to the support of his child since it was four years old, and his first defence to this action is that he offered to take the child and maintain it himself. If I thought that that was a legal offer I should consider it an end of the case, and I think it would have been a legal offer if at its date the child had been seven years old, but I have the greatest possible doubt whether the father of an illegitimate child can relieve himself of the obligation to contribute to its future support by an offer to take it into his own house when it is a year old, or two years old, or of any age short of seven. I think that is the principle to be deduced from the cases which were cited to us. I am not disposed, therefore, to regard the defender's offer, taken by itself, as sufficient to relieve him from liability. It is said that the child was not constantly living with its mother, and it is quite true that she was not constantly in the same house as her child, because she herself was not always living in her father's house, where the child was. At the same time, I think the child was throughout in the custody of its mother, and I question whether the father is entitled to take so young a child out of the custody of its mother, or if she refuses to give it up, then to consider himself free of all liability for future aliment. But while that is so, I admit that I have some difficulty, arising from the conduct of the parties, because it does appear that the pursuer preferred to keep her child and give up her claim to aliment. I think that there is some evidence, at least, of that. Accordingly, I am disposed to think that the only safe ground on which to put the judgment your Lordships propose is that the parties came to an arrangement by which the pursuer abandoned her claim to future aliment, not being willing to accept the offer which the defender had made. I confess I have great hesitation, but as your Lordships are all agreed I do not differ.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.

Process—Appeal—Dispensation from printing in hoc statu—Boxing of prints—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3, subsec. 2.—The provisions of sec. 3, subsec. 2 of the A. S., 10th March 1870, relating to the lodging of manuscript copies or prints in appeals from the Sheriff Court, do not apply to cases where an interlocutor has been pronounced dispensing with printing in hoc statu; and should the Court subsequently refuse to dispense with printing, a day will then be fixed for the boxing of the necessary prints.

An appellant seven days after the appeal was lodged obtained an interlocutor from the Lord Ordinary on the Bills dispensing with printing in hoc statu. Subsequently the Court refused to dispense with printing. Fourteen days thereafter the necessary prints in the cause were boxed to the Court. The respondent moved that the appellant should be held to have abandoned the appeal in respect the prints had not been timeously lodged, the effect of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills having been merely to interrupt the currency of the fourteen days allowed by the Act of Sederunt for boxing the prints. The Court refused the motion, and sent the cause to the roll.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. The appeal was received by the Clerk of Court on 25th April.

Seven days thereafter (May 2d), the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Fraser), dispensed with printing "in hoc statu."

On May 17th the First Division refused to dispense with printing, and on May 31st the print of the record and proof was boxed.

The appellant having moved that the appeal should be sent to the roll, the respondent moved that the appellant should be held to have abandoned her appeal, on the ground that the print had not been timeously lodged in terms of the A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3, subsec. 2.* He argued that the effect of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills was simply to stop the currency of the fourteen days allowed to the appellant wherein to box the statutory prints. Seven days of the fourteen days had run before that interlocutor was pronounced, and only seven days remained to run after the interlocutor finally refusing to dispense with printing was pronounced by the First Division on 17th May. If that were so, the prints boxed on May 31st were too late.

Ross v. Gray.

Argued for the appellant;—The A. S. of 10th March 1870 did not apply to cases where printing was dispensed with simply in hoc statu. Such an order was nowhere mentioned. A fresh period of fourteen days ought to begin to run from the date of the interlocutor refusing to dispense with printing.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that the 2d subsection of the 3d section of the A. S., 10th March 1870, does not apply to cases where printing has been dispensed with in hoc statu. On 2d May the Lord Ordinary on the Bills dispensed with printing in hoc statu in this case, and on 17th May a dispensation from printing was absolutely refused by us. It appears that on that day we ought, consistently with our practice, to have appointed a day for prints to be lodged. We did not do that, but we shall take care to do so in future. This is a demand for a penalty under the subsection, and as the subsection does not apply, I think we must refuse the motion of the respondent and send the case to the roll.

Lightbourne and others, his trustees, for reduction of certain deeds, the defences lodged were in the form of answers to the condescendence, and a separate statement of facts disclosing a defence of homologation and adoption. On the case appearing in the Adjustment-roll, the defenders asked for an order on the pursuers to answer their statement. The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) thereupon ordered a revisal of the condescendence and defences, in terms of sec. 25 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* The pursuers in their revised condescendence did not specifically answer the averments on which that defence rested. When the case came before the Inner-House on a question of relevancy, the Court opened up the record and ordained the pursuers to lodge specific answers to the defenders' revised statement of facts in fourteen days; the Lord President observing that an order for revisal under the 25th section of the Act of 1868 meant precisely the same as a similar order did before the passing of that Act.

There was no clause by which the daughter accepted these provisions as in full of her legal rights over her father's estate. The father, H. S., executed a trust-settlement by which, in the event of his daughter and her husband dying without issue, the whole property liferented by the spouses was to be divided amongst certain legatees. By antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 26th December 1854, and registered in January 1855, entered into between William Dickson, accountant in Edinburgh, on the one part, and Miss Eleanor Jane Somerville and her father, Colonel Henry Erskine Somerville, on the other part, Colonel Somerville bound and obliged himself, within one month of the marriage between his daughter and Mr Dickson, "to transfer and make over the sum of £8000 of the stock of the Three Per Cent Consolidated Annuities" to certain trustees, who were to hold the same in trust for behoof of the spouses, and the longest liver of them, "in liferent for their liferent uses alienarly, and as an alimentary fund, and the fee of the said trust-fund shall belong to the said children of this marriage, or of any subsequent marriage into which the said Eleanor Jane Somerville may enter, or their issue, subject to the powers of division and appointment before and after specified; whom failing, to such person or persons as the said Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Erskine Somerville may appoint; and failing any appointment by him, to his nearest heirs and successors whomsoever, and shall remain vested in the trustees agreeably to the directions contained in this contract; and the said fund shall not be attachable for the debts of the said William Dickson or Eleanor Jane Somerville, nor affectable by the diligence of their or either of their creditors, and the orders, receipts, and discharges of the said parties respectively, as above provided, shall alone be sufficient discharges to the trustees; but under this provision, that notwithstanding the above destination it shall be in the power of the said Eleanor Jane Somerville, in the event of her having no children, or if they all shall predecease her without leaving issue, to dispose by will or testamentary deed executed by her of any part of the said trust-funds not exceeding £4000 sterling."

1st Division.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

There was no clause in the deed stating that Mrs Dickson accepted the provision as in full of her legal claims on her father's estate.

The sum of £8000 of Three Per Cent Stock was duly transferred to the trustees, who drew the dividends thereof and paid and accounted therefor to Mr and Mrs Dickson during their respective lives.

Colonel Somerville died on 7th March 1863. After his death there was discovered in his repositories a postnuptial contract between himself and his wife, by which his whole estate was at her death (which had occurred) conveyed to the children of the marriage, of whom Mrs Dickson was the only one who survived. Colonel Somerville also left a trust-disposition and settlement under which he, in the event of his daughter and her husband dying without issue, directed the residue of his property, including the whole of the property which they were liferenting, to be divided amongst certain legatees.

Mr and Mrs Dickson thereupon claimed right under the postnuptial contract to the whole estate left by Colonel Somerville, and in order to settle the question an action of multiplepounding was raised by Colonel Somerville's trustees, in which appearance was entered for Mr and Mrs Dickson, who lodged a claim, wherein Mrs Dickson, as the sole surviving issue of the marriage between Colonel Somerville and his wife, claimed to be ranked and preferred (1) to the whole fund in medio, in terms of the provisions of the said postnuptial contract of marriage between her said parents; or

(2) to one-half of the fund in medio, in so far as the same consisted of the free moveable estate of Colonel Somerville, as legitim. After considerable litigation, in the course of which one stage of the case was appealed to the House of Lords (5 Macph. (H. L.) 69), the Lord Ordinary (Barcaple) pronounced this interlocutor on 19th November 1867:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the claim of Mrs Dickson and her husband for legitim, and on the fourth plea in law for the claimants Alexander Russel and others, and third plea in law for the claimants John Anthony Grahame and others, and having resumed consideration of the closed record and whole process, Finds that there are no grounds on which it can be held that the provisions made by Colonel Somerville for Mrs Dickson in the antenuptial contract of marriage between her and Mr Dickson were in full of her claim of legitim: Finds that she is not barred by the acceptance of these provisions from claiming legitim: Finds that these provisions do not fall to be imputed to account of or in extinction of her claim for legitim: Finds that Mrs Dickson was entitled to one-half of the free moveable estate of Colonel Somerville at the date of his death as legitim," &c.*

On 14th January 1868 Lord Barcaple allowed Mrs Dickson and her husband to lodge an additional condescendence and claim, in which, inter alia, the following claim was made:—"In virtue of her legitim, to which she has been found entitled by interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dated 19th November 1867, which has become final, the claimant Mrs Dickson claims to be ranked and preferred (2) to one-half of such part (if any) of the said sum of £8000 stock held by the claimant's marriage-contract trustees as may hereafter fall into the residue of Colonel Somerville's estate." This claim was opposed by Colonel Somerville's trustees, on the ground that the right claimed was contingent, and could not be ascertained, and on 16th June 1868 Lord Barcaple pronounced an interlocutor, whereby, inter alia, he "finds it is not expedient or proper in hoc statu to dispose in this process of the contingent claim stated by Mrs Dickson in said additional condescendence and claim to one-half of such part, if any, of the sum of £8000 stock held by the claimant's marriage-contract trustees as may hereafter fall into the residue of Colonel Somerville's estate; but reserves her right to insist in said claim whenever circumstances make it proper or necessary for her so to do."

Mr William Dickson died on 31st May 1881, and Mrs Dickson died on 16th May 1886, without issue. By her trust-disposition and settlement she disposed to William Finlay and others, as trustees for certain purposes, her whole property, including the sum of £4000 upon which she was entitled to test in virtue of the clause in her marriage-contract quoted supra, and such part of the sum of £8000 of Three Per Cent Stock as she was entitled to from her father's estate in name of legitim.

On 28th September 1886 Mrs Dickson's marriage-contract trustees raised an action of multiplepoinding, and called Colonel Somerville's trustees and Mrs Dickson's testamentary trustees as defenders.

The fund in medio consisted of the £8000 of Three Per Cent Government Stock, or the price thereof when realised, and the dividend received or that might fall due thereon before it was sold.

Mrs Dickson's testamentary trustees claimed to be ranked and preferred, inter alia,—" (2) To the sum of £4000 sterling, part of the said £8000 stock, which the said Mrs Eleanor Jane Somerville or Dickson was entitled to dispose of in virtue of the provision in her said contract of

They pleaded;—(2) Mrs Dickson having been entitled, in terms of her marriage-contract, to dispose by testamentary deed of £4000 of the said £8000 stock, and having disposed thereof by her trust-disposition and settlement, the claimants are entitled thereto, with interest. (3) Mrs Dickson being entitled to legitim, and the balance of the said sum of £8000 stock being part of the free moveable estate of her father, one-half thereof vested in her as legitim, and now belongs to the claimants. (4) It is res judicata, and, separatim, the result of a sound construction of Mrs Dickson's marriage-contract, that the acceptance by her of her marriage-contract provisions, including the power of disposal, did not exclude her right to legitim. (5) Mrs Dickson being entitled to legitim, and also to exercise the power of testamentary disposal under her marriage-contract, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of the third branch of their claim.

Colonel Somerville's trustees claimed to be ranked and preferred to one-half "of the said sum of £8000 stock of the Three Per Cent Consolidated Government Annuities, or the price thereof when realised, and one-half the dividends thereon accrued since the date of Mrs Dickson's death, viz., 16th May 1886," &c.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Separatim, On a sound construction of her marriage-contract, and her father's trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, Mrs Dickson was barred from both claiming her legitim and also exercising her power of appointment or testamentary disposal under her marriage-contract; and she having elected to take her legitim, her trustees are entitled to one-half of the fund in medio as legitim, but to no part thereof under her pretended exercise of her power of testamentary disposal; (3) In any event, one-half of the remaining half of the fund in medio, which was not subject to Mrs Dickson's power of testamentary disposal, falls into dead's part of Colonel Somerville's estate, to which the claimants, as his testamentary trustees, are entitled.

On 25th January 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first [departed from] and second pleas in law for the claimants Colonel Somerville's trustees: Sustains the pleas in law for the claimants Mrs Dickson's trustees, and the third plea in law for the claimants Colonel Somerville's trustees: Ranks and prefers the claimants Mrs Dickson's trustees . . . ; and (2) to the sum of £4000 sterling of the proceeds of the said £8000 stock; and ranks and prefers the claimants Mrs Dickson's trustees, and the claimants the said Colonel Somerville's trustees, each to one-half of the balance of the fund in medio and dividends accrued thereon, under deduction of the expenses of the real raisers and of the expenses aftermentioned, and decerns," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The only question in controversy between the parties is that which is raised by the third branch of the claim for Mrs Dickson's trustees, where they claim, on account of legitim, one-half of such portion of the sum of £8000 held by Mrs Dickson's marriage-contract trustees, as may have fallen into the residue of Colonel Somerville's estate.

"By the marriage-contract in question, Mrs Dickson's father, Colonel Somerville, put £8000 into the hands of trustees for behoof of the spouses in liferent, for their and the survivor's liferent use allenary, and of the children of the marriage in fee, with a declaration that, failing children, the fee should belong to such person or persons as Colonel Somerville might appoint; and failing any appointment by him, to his nearest heirs and successors whomsoever. But it was further provided, that notwithstanding this destination of the fee, Mrs Dickson, in the event of her leaving no children, should have power to dispose by will of any part of the trust-funds not exceeding £4000. Mrs Dickson, who survived her husband, died without issue; and she has left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which, inter alia, she has disposed of the sum of £4000, on which she was entitled to test, and also of whatever part of the said sum of £8000 she may be entitled to in name of legitim, as the only child of Colonel Somerville who survived him.

“Colonel Somerville's trustees maintained that she is barred, by the principle of approbate and reprobate, from exercising the power of testamentary disposal conferred upon her by the marriage-contract and at the same time claiming legitim against that deed; and that, as she has in fact exercised her power of disposal as to the sum of £4000, her trustees' claim to legitim out of the other must be repelled. They do not dispute, however, that, notwithstanding the provisions in her favour contained in her marriage-contract, Mrs Dickson became entitled to legitim at her father's death; and, indeed, this has been already determined by a final judgment pronounced by Lord Barcapple in 1867. The only question, therefore, is whether any part of the £8000 falls into the legitim fund; or, whether Mrs Dickson, although she is not barred by the marriage-contract from claiming legitim generally, may not be barred from claiming any part of the fund settled by that deed otherwise than upon the rights given by the deed itself, and in strict accordance with its provisions.

“It appears to me that there is nothing in the marriage-contract, taken by itself, to raise a plea of approbate and reprobate, or to compel Mrs Dickson to elect between inconsistent rights. Her father settles money that is absolutely his own, and to which she had no right whatever independently of his gift. The question of election, therefore, could not arise until she came to claim legitim upon his death. When that claim was brought forward, she might have been put to an election, if it could have been maintained successfully that her marriage-contract provisions were intended to be in lieu or in satisfaction of legitim. But the contrary has been decided by a judgment that is admitted to be unimpeachable. I think it follows that any part of the funds in the hands of the marriage-contract trustees which may have fallen into the residue of Colonel Somerville's estate must suffer a division, like the rest of the free moveable estate, between dead's part and legitim; and Mrs Dickson must be entitled to her share, because it is decided that she was entitled to legitim. The judgment sustaining her right to legitim means that she was entitled to one-half of the entire moveable estate left by Colonel Somerville, after providing for his debts; and it is now certain, in consequence of her death without issue, that the £4000 held by the marriage-contract trustees was in fact a part of Colonel Somerville's moveable estate at his death.

“It is said that the right to test with regard to one-half of the £8000 was given to Mrs Dickson on condition of her abstaining from making any claim to the remaining half. But this is a misconception of the legal effect of the marriage-contract. It is in no proper sense of the term a condition of the benefits given to Mrs Dickson, that she shall not disturb the other provisions of the contract. There was no legal right in her which could enable her to disturb them. But the provision applicable, in the event which has happened, to the £4000 in question is, in effect, that it shall fall into the general estate of Colonel Somerville. In other words, it is not disposed of by the marriage-contract, but by Colonel Somerville's testamentary settlement; and it is this disposition by testament, and this alone, which Mrs Dickson's right of legitim enables her to challenge. She can claim no part of the £4000 without claiming against the testamentary settlement, and therefore forfeiting the liferent bequeathed to her by that deed. But she makes no claim against the marriage-contract. The argument that the claim but they maintained that as she had elected to take legitim she was excluded from taking something else, viz., the power to test. The power to test was not a contract provision nor a testamentary bequest, but a gift. The contract stopped with the proper matrimonial purposes, and what followed in contemplation of the failure of the matrimonial purposes was not pactional but a free gift from Colonel Somerville to his daughter. The gift, however, was conditional. There was the implied condition, which was the basis of the equitable doctrine of election, viz., that one who takes under a deed of gift, whether testamentary or otherwise, shall allow the donor's whole intention to have effect.¹ Now, Colonel Somerville's intention was that while his daughter should have power to test upon the £4000 his appointees should receive the rest. His general settlement was a valid and effectual appointment. His daughter might claim against his general settlement and take legitim. By so doing she might disappoint his appointees, but having done so she was not entitled to claim also her power of testamentary disposal. She was bound to allow that part of the fund over which she had this power of disposal to go as compensation. Even if the power to test was held to be part of the contract provisions, it was subject to the same implied condition. The plea of res judicata did not apply, as the question never had been sub judice, and was indeed specially reserved.

Argued for Mrs Dickson's trustees;—The power to test was given absolutely to Mrs Dickson in the contract, and there was there no such stipulation as that contended for on the other side, viz., that she should either take her legitim and give up her power of testing, or test on the £4000 and forego her right to legitim. If such a condition were to be adjected it must be done explicitly. Lord Barcaple, ex facie of his interlocutor, considered the claim of legitim. Mrs Dickson must be entitled to her whole legitim, viz., what had been already paid to her, and her share of the general estate, or to none, and he had found her entitled to her legal rights. If that were so, the case was res judicata in a case between the same parties as were here present. The provision was not testamentary, but a provision of the contract on which the marriage depended. It was a valuable right, and gave her a fund of credit during her life.² Such a gift in an onerous deed was not revocable by the donor. There was no question of approbate or reprobate in the matter. Mrs Dickson took the one provision as the wife of Mr Dickson, and the other as the daughter of her father. Neither did the doctrine of election have any place here, as that could only arise when a testator disposed of property with which he was not entitled to deal.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The division of the moveable estate of the late Colonel Somerville was the subject of a previous multiplepinding, and in that case his only child, Mrs Dickson, claimed her legitim, and was found entitled to do so by the interlocutor of Lord Barcaple on 19th November 1867. In that inter-now made by her trustees, in accordance with her will, involves a claim against the marriage-contract, appears to me to proceed upon two false assumptions—first, that the £4000 which has fallen into residue is disposed of by the marriage-contract, instead of by the testament; and, secondly, that the marriage-contract expresses or implies an intention that the benefits given to Mrs Dickson shall be taken in lieu of legitim."

locutor the Lord Ordinary "having heard counsel for the parties on the claim of Mrs Dickson and her husband for legitim, and on the fourth plea in law for the claimants Alexander Russel and others, and third plea in law for the claimants John Anthony Grahame and others, and having resumed consideration of the closed record and whole process, finds that there are no grounds on which it can be held that the provisions made by Colonel Somerville for Mrs Dickson in the antenuptial contract of marriage between her and Mr Dickson were in full of her claim of legitim: Finds that she is not barred by the acceptance of these provisions from claiming legitim: Finds that these provisions do not fall to be imputed to account of or in extinction of her claim for legitim: Finds that Mrs Dickson was entitled to one-half of the free moveable estate of Colonel Somerville at the date of his death as legitim." Now, that really gives effect to the principles of law laid down in the Breadalbane case, and I think these principles are very well applied in that interlocutor. A considerable sum was paid to Mrs Dickson in consequence of that judgment, which was not submitted to review, but there remains of Colonel Somerville's estate a sum of £8000, which forms the fund in medio in the present action. Now, that £8000 was settled on Mrs Dickson in her marriage-contract, to which her father was a party.

The contention of the trustees of Colonel Somerville with regard to that fund is embodied in their second plea in law, which is as follows:—" (2) Separatim, On a sound construction of her marriage-contract, and her father's trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, Mrs Dickson was barred from both claiming her legitim and also exercising her power of appointment or testamentary disposal under her marriage-contract; and she having elected to take her legitim, her trustees are entitled to one-half of the fund in medio as legitim, but to no part thereof under her pretended exercise of her power of testamentary disposal." The reference in that plea to Colonel Somerville's trust-disposition and settlement and relative codicils I do not quite understand. I cannot see how they are of any avail in determining what is the extent of the legitim, or how far it is consistent with what Mrs Dickson has done.

The real question is, whether, according to a sound construction of Mrs Dickson's marriage-contract, she is entitled at once to claim her legitim as regards that sum of £8000, and to exercise her power of disposal of £4000 of that sum.

The opposite contention is well embodied in the second and third pleas for her trustees.

The whole question then, in my opinion, depends on the construction and effect of the marriage-contract. The deed is simple enough. It contains provisions on the part of the husband in favour of the wife and possible children, and on the wife's part her father undertakes at one month's date from the marriage to transfer £8000 of consols to trustees, who are to secure the liferent thereof to the spouses and the longest liver of them, and to give the fee to the children of the marriage, if any. Now, those are the whole trust purposes, with the exception of a clause to which I shall immediately draw attention—the trust purposes are exhausted when the liferent has been paid to the spouses and the fee given to the children, or if the spouses die without leaving issue then the contract is at an end.

But there follows what is represented as being a testamentary provision by Colonel Somerville. It is contended on the one side that this clause is a testamentary provision, and on the other that it is a part of the contract, and must be dealt with as such. I think it is neither. It is a simple declaration of what will be the effect of the spouses dying without leaving issue, and that effect would have been operated by law, even though the provision had not been in the deed at all. For it simply amounts to this, that when the spouses were dead, without issue, the £8000 settled by the contract shall revert to him from whom it came, and shall pass according to the directions of his will, or if he does not leave one then it shall go to his executors. Now, is that a testamentary provision? It benefits no one, and it does not interfere with the operation of the common law. What is the use of it? I cannot see, for it simply directs that that shall be done which the law would have done without any direction.

But if the clause is not testamentary still less is it of the nature of contract, for it merely declares what would certainly take place if the marriage-contract purposes did not require to be fulfilled, or to be fulfilled only in part. Should, however, anyone inquire what use there was in putting this clause into the contract at all, I think a perfectly clear and satisfactory answer can be given. It was put there simply for the purpose of introducing the power of disposal given to Mrs Dickson. The clause amounts just to this,—Failing children of the marriage of course this £8000 will revert to the grantor or go to his next of kin, but “under this provision” those words mean that what follows interferes with the ordinary course of the law, i.e. that to a certain extent the £8000 shall not revert to Colonel Somerville or go to his next of kin. Accordingly, it is clearly declared what shall happen. “Notwithstanding the above destination, it shall be in the power of the said Eleanor Jane Somerville, in the event of her having no children, or if they all shall predecease her without leaving issue, to dispose by will or testamentary deed executed by her of any part of the said trust-funds not exceeding £4000 sterling.” It seems to me that the whole clause simply means this, that the parties foresaw that in the event of there being no children the result would be that the whole estate would revert, and that therefore they made this stipulation as part of the contract that in that event Mrs Dickson should have power to test on £4000. I think that that is one article of the contract between Mr and Mrs Dickson and Colonel Somerville, and it is impossible to say that it is not a “provision” (the word in Lord Barcaple’s interlocutor) “of the marriage-contract.” It seems to have been thought that because only a power of disposal is given that that is not a valuable provision, but, as Mr Low shewed in the course of his argument, a power of that kind is a matter of pecuniary value, it is capable of being valued in pounds, shillings, and pence, or of being sold for value, and, therefore, to say that it is not a “provision” is a contradiction in terms.

Now, if Mrs Dickson were entitled to exercise this power which was secured to her, how that is to interfere with her claim of legitim with regard to the other portion of the estate it is difficult to see. The two things are quite separate. It has been settled that the marriage-contract does not in any of its provisions interfere with Mrs Dickson’s claim to legitim; and that none of its provisions are to be imputed to legitim. The one £4000 therefore falls into the general estate, and is subject to legitim to the extent of one-half; the other £4000, on which she had power to test, does not belong to Mrs Dickson quite in the same sense as her legitim, but as she has executed her power of disposal it goes to her trustees. On these grounds I am clear that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is

 Trustees. the balance of the said sum of £8000 stock being part of the free moveable estate of her father, one-half thereof vested in her as legitim, and now belongs to the claimants.”

LORD MURR.—I think it is now quite settled that where there is a provision of the description here in question in a marriage-contract, it does not form a bar to the child claiming legitim, unless it is expressly stipulated in the marriage-contract that the provisions there made shall be in lieu of all legal rights. There is no such clause in this contract, so that on the authority of the Breadalbane case Mrs Dickson is not barred from claiming legitim; and I agree in all that your Lordship has said as to the construction of the deed, and as to the provision in question not being of a testamentary character.

If I had had any doubt in coming to that conclusion, I should have been disposed to hold that Lord Barcaple, in his interlocutor of 19th November 1867, dealt with the whole question here raised. That decision was, I think, pronounced in a case between substantially the same parties as those who are here competing, and it is there distinctly laid down that there are no grounds on which it can be held that the provisions made by Colonel Somerville for Mrs Dickson in her marriage-contract were to be in full of her claim of legitim, and that she was not barred by the acceptance of those provisions from claiming legitim. At the date of that interlocutor there had been no actual exercise of the power given to Mrs Dickson; but she had been drawing the liferent provisions for years, and it was pleaded that that circumstance barred her from claiming legitim. That contention was, however, negatived by Lord Barcaple, and I think that the word “provisions” used by him included the power of testing reserved to Mrs Dickson in the contract. The words of the deed so describe it, for the clause begins with the words, “but under this provision.” I therefore think that the question is res judicata as between the parties in this case.

LORD SHAND.—The view maintained by the reclamer is that Mrs Dickson having claimed her legitim she has no longer power to execute any testamentary deed affecting the £4000 specially mentioned in her marriage-contract. It is not disputed that she had right to take legitim, but the question raised is whether by taking legitim she is barred from testing with regard to the sum of £4000. Now, there is nowhere in the contract any exclusion of legitim. The two rights are both open to her on the face of the deed. The clause confers a right on her—the power of testing on £4000—which is just as much a provision to her as any other provision in the deed. It was a valuable power, and in an onerous deed of this kind it appears to me to have been irrevocable, and in no sense testamentary only.

Was there any condition, implied or expressed, that if Mrs Dickson tested on this £4000, she should forfeit her right to legitim? I can see nothing of the kind in the deed. All that Colonel Somerville provided was that in the event of her not dealing with that sum, and if there were no children of the marriage, it should fall back into his estate. I am therefore clearly for adhering to the No. 145. judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

It would have made no difference in my opinion if the provision of the £8000 had been a direct legacy in favour of a person named, which was put by way of illustration by Mr Asher. I think Mrs Dickson, in that case, would still have been entitled to do what she has done, because the exercise of the power has not been made conditional on her not claiming legitim.

Somerville's
Trustees v.
Dickson's
Trustees.

On the question of res judicata, it rather appears to me that the point was not determined by Lord Barcaple. All that he decided was that there was nothing to prevent Mrs Dickson from claiming legitim. A different question has been raised here, viz. :—whether having claimed legitim, she had power, nevertheless, to exercise the right of testing to the extent claimed.

LORD ADAM.—It is clear that this right of testing which was conferred on Mrs Dickson was a valuable right, and was a matter of stipulation between the parties to the marriage-contract. I am of opinion that that power was not in any view a testamentary provision. If that is so, the parties are of opinion, and I think rightly, that the effect was to remove this £4000 from the legitim fund, and, therefore, there was left only £4000 available for that fund. It is not disputed that Mrs Dickson had a right to claim legitim, and, therefore, she had a right to £2000 of this undisposed of fund. Having that right, I think she had certainly right to test on £4000 of her father's estate. The two rights are quite distinct, and having them both why should she not exercise them both—under the contract her right to test on £4000, and under the operation of law to claim the £2000? I think there is no question of approbate and reprobate in the case.

In reference to the question of res judicata, though in one sense this question did not arise before Lord Barcaple, yet the moment you find an opinion that this was a provision of the marriage-contract, then you must hold that the question was dealt with by him. It is in that way that the plea of res judicata in my opinion applies, for in that interlocutor Lord Barcaple simply restates the law laid down in the Breadalbane case, that when a sum is given by a father in his child's marriage-contract, and there is no specific statement that that sum is to be accepted in full of all legal claims, then there is nothing to prevent the child from both taking the provision and claiming legitim. On these grounds, I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

 Leishman.

Parent and Child—Custody of illegitimate child.—The mother of an illegitimate child agreed to hand over the child, then eight months old, to the custody of the father for maintenance and education. Nine months thereafter she presented a petition to the Court praying for the custody of the child. The father opposed the petition on the ground that she had bound herself by the agreement to allow him to have the custody of the child. Held that the mother was not bound by the agreement, but was entitled to the order craved.

Opinions that the mother of an illegitimate child cannot by agreement deprive herself of the right to its custody.

1st DIVISION.
 B.

ON 13th May 1887 Mrs Jean Vost or Macpherson, wife of Finlay Macpherson, Edinburgh, presented a petition praying the Court to find that she was entitled to the custody of her illegitimate child, Septimus Rollo Leishman Vost, and to ordain Septimus Leishman, the father of the child, and Mrs Lawrie, Alloa, with whom it was living, to deliver the child to her.

She averred "that on 13th November 1885 the petitioner, Jean Rollo Vost or Macpherson, who was then unmarried, gave birth to an illegitimate male child, of which Septimus Leishman, residing in Dollar, son of the late James Leishman, C.E., Dollar, was the father. The said child was named Septimus Rollo Leishman Vost. The said Septimus Leishman admitted the paternity, and on being called upon to pay aliment for said child, he, on or about 3d August 1886, offered to take, and did take, the custody and charge thereof in lieu of payment. The petitioner is now desirous of resuming the custody and control of her said child, and has called upon the said Septimus Leishman, through his agents, Messrs Wallace & Kier, writers, Alloa, to deliver up the child to her, but this is refused. The child is at present living with a Mrs Lawrie at the lodge of Greenfield House, Alloa, who, acting under the orders of the said Wallace & Kier, declines to give up the child to the petitioner. Mr Leishman never visits the child, and has no home to take it to. He is at present in Australia or elsewhere furth of Scotland, and his address is unknown to the petitioner. The petitioner believes and avers that her said child is seriously suffering in health from the want of due attention and nourishment, and that its life will be endangered if it is not delivered up to her without delay."

Mr Leishman, who was absent from Scotland, lodged answers, in which he stated,—“The said respondent was not anxious that the said child should be taken care of by the petitioner; and when application was made to him for aliment, his agents wrote to the petitioner's agents proposing to relieve her of the custody of the child; and after some negotiations an agreement was come to between the petitioner and the said respondent, whereby the petitioner agreed to hand over, and she did hand over, at the request of the said respondent, the said child to Mrs Lawrie, presently residing at Greenfield Lodge, Alloa.* Mrs Lawrie is the widow of a Mr Lawrie, sometime draper in Alloa. She is a most

* On 10th July 1886 Mr Leishman's agents wrote to Miss Vost's agents:—“We have submitted to Mr Leishman your letter to us relative to the amount of aliment to be paid by him for Miss Vost's child, and have now received his instructions on the subject. Mr Leishman is prepared to relieve Miss Vost of all expenses for the child's maintenance and education, &c., provided she consents to Mr Leishman having the custody of the child; and should she agree to that, Mr Leishman will not only take care that it be placed in charge of some respectable person, has one child of her own, and resides in a healthy locality near Alloa. The said child was handed over, in pursuance of that agreement, by the petitioner to Mrs Lawrie, who had gone to Edinburgh to receive it. Mrs Lawrie has had the care of the child since, and its aliment is provided solely by the respondent, Mr Leishman. The petitioner has never visited her child since Mrs Lawrie received the custody of it. The said child was in a weakly state of health, and it does not appear to have been well attended to when in the custody of the petitioner.* . . . Some time subsequent to the delivery of the child to Mrs Lawrie the petitioner was married to Mr Finlay Macpherson, who is the son of a Free Church clergyman, but who has no profession or calling himself. He has no means, and he does not earn any, but lives with the petitioner, presumably upon the damages recovered by her from the respondent, Mr Leishman. The petitioner is the mother of another illegitimate child."

Argued for the petitioner;—The law as regarded the right of a mother to have the custody of her illegitimate infant was quite settled. She had an absolute right while the child was of tender years.¹ She admitted that there might be circumstances which would entitle the Court to break through the general rule, but there would have to be very special averments as to the unfitness of the mother to take care of the charge. Here the averments were of the most general kind, except that the petitioner was mother of another illegitimate child. That child had, however, been born before the child whose custody she now sought, and she had now married its father. The agreement which it was alleged she had entered into as to giving up the custody was, in the first place, only temporary, and, in the second place, was out of her power to make. Her right to competent person, but will also arrange for Miss Vost seeing it at short and stated intervals, in order that she may be satisfied that it is properly attended to. Should, however, Miss Vost insist upon retaining the custody of the child herself, which we admit she is entitled to claim at present, Mr Leishman is not disposed to pay for its aliment more than the sum which is usually awarded for that purpose, and we think that the aliment stated by you is considerably in excess of the amount usually fixed by the Court, which runs from £6 to £10 per annum."

On 12th July Miss Vost's agents answered as follows:—"Dear Sirs,—We are in receipt of your letter of the 10th instant. Miss Vost is willing to hand over the child to Mr Leishman for maintenance and education; and so soon as a satisfactory place of residence has been procured by Mr Leishman for it, she will be prepared to give the child to anyone whom he may send for it to 108 George Street here. You had better give us a day's notice before the child is sent for; and you will understand that this arrangement is made upon the assumption that Miss Vost is to have access to the child at short stated intervals, in order that she may be satisfied that it is properly attended to. We are instructed to press for the inlying expenses and aliment due to this date, amounting to the sum mentioned in our former letter. The rate of aliment mentioned by you is altogether too low, and we hope that you will see your way to advise Mr Leishman to pay the sum we name, and so terminate this unpleasant matter."

the custody of her child was a natural right, and she could not contract herself out of it. The law put the mother's right to the illegitimate child on precisely the same ground as the right of a father to his legitimate child. Both relations rested on natural right, and both involved a duty of which the parent could not discharge him or herself. The case of Goadby resembled the present in being a case where the Court ordered that a child should be given back to the custody of the mother.

Argued for the respondent;—The general law, as stated by the petitioner, was conceded; but the peculiarity here was the agreement into which the mother had entered. There had been no change of circumstances since the date of the agreement, and it could not be doubted that it was more for the interest of the child to live with its father. He had property to the extent of £12,000, and he had left the universitas of his estate to the child in the event of his dying before he reached England. There was no case in Scotland where an illegitimate child had been taken out of the custody of the father and given to the mother when he had obtained it without fraud or fear. In Goadby's case the father was dead, and the question was between the mother and the father's relatives. In England Lord Kenyon had indicated an opinion that where the father had once got the child without using fraud or force, he would be allowed to keep it.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that the arrangement made between the parties as to the custody of this child was very judicious in the circumstances, and I cannot help regretting that the petitioner should desire to put an end to it. But all that we have to decide is whether she has a right to do so. The right of a mother to the custody of her illegitimate infant is no doubt absolute, and in all ordinary circumstances it must be enforced. The putative father has no right over it at all. The peculiarity of this case is that an arrangement was entered into under which the child was to be boarded out at a respectable house, and the father was to provide the funds for that being done. Now, I do not think that that arrangement is binding on the petitioner as a permanent agreement; whether it is binding on the putative father is another question, which it is not necessary to settle. It is not binding on the mother, because it is an interference with a legal right which she has consented to, but without providing that the arrangement should be permanent. Even had there been an express stipulation that the arrangement should be permanent I should have entertained very great doubt whether the mother could be held to have effectually bound herself. As things are, I have no doubt that we should grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD MURE.—The mother's right over her illegitimate child is absolute, and the putative father has no right over it at all, at all events in the ordinary case. The only question here is whether the arrangement set forth is to be held to preclude the mother from reassuming the custody of her child. I agree that that arrangement was a judicious one in the interests of the child, but I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the mother has a right to come here and say she is entitled to break through the agreement, and to claim the custody.

LORD SHAND.—On the facts before us I am clear that there is no ground for the statement of the petitioner that the child "is seriously suffering in health from the want of due attention and nourishment, and that its life will be endangered if it is not delivered up to her without delay." If that statement is rash and unwarranted,—and I think it is clear the child is well cared for,—it would be well that it should be left where it is. That, however, is not what we have to decide. The argument of the petitioner is based on legal right, arising from the natural relation of mother and child, which gives her the right to the custody of her child, and notwithstanding that she agreed that the putative father should have the child, I think she is entitled to break her agreement, and demand that it should be handed over to her custody.

I would only qualify what I have said by adding that, no doubt, even the putative father of an illegitimate child would be entitled to claim and probably to get the custody of the child if he could shew that the child would certainly suffer by being left with the mother, for the paramount consideration is the benefit of the child itself; but no such averment is here made, and therefore I think we have no alternative but to grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM.—It is not disputed that the right of the mother of an illegitimate child to have the custody of it is absolute, nor that in the present case, if the child had been actually in her custody, there is nothing in the mother's character which would have entitled anyone to interfere to take it away. The case then comes to be whether the mother is barred from claiming the child by the agreement founded on. I do not know how the case would have been had the mother absolutely bound herself in all future time not to claim the custody; probably such a contract would not have been binding, but we have not that case here. The arrangement here alleged is merely temporary, and I think she can set it aside whenever she chooses.

THE COURT found the petitioner entitled to the custody of her illegitimate child, and continued the cause for arrangements to be made with regard to its being handed over to her.

Reparation—Liability for safety of premises to persons entering manufacturer's store.—A man, on a winter evening, entered the store of an oil manufacturer (who had an office in another part of the town for business purposes), desiring to buy old barrels for firewood. Being directed by one of the employees to go upstairs to a clerk, he went up, and was informed by the clerk that (as was the fact) the manufacturer never sold old barrels. On his way back he was killed by falling into the well of a hoist in the store. This hoist was situated in the course which a person unacquainted with the locality (as the man in question was) would naturally take in leaving the clerk's office, unless the well was either fenced or lighted, which it was not at the time, though there were the means of doing both. In an action by the representatives of the deceased against the proprietor of the store, held that the deceased entered the premises for a legitimate purpose, that his death was attributable to the negligence of the defender in failing to light and fence the well of the hoist, and that therefore the defender was liable in damages to the pursuers.

THE works and store of John Parker, oil-merchant and soap manufacturer, Glasgow, were situated between Stirling Street and Port Dundas Road there, and had entrances from both these thoroughfares. The main entrance was that from Port Dundas Road, which was the address in the directory; that from Stirling Street was a cart entrance, with a large wooden gate, having a small wicket-door for foot-passengers in the centre. The Stirling Street entrance was the direct access to the store portion of the premises, which had two doors, near each of which was a hoist for raising goods from the cellars. The platforms of these hoists were worked by hydraulic pressure, and the wells had a depth of ten or twelve feet. When the platform was flush with the passage it completely covered the well, and as an additional precaution against persons falling into the well, there were pillars at the corners of the well, with chains connecting them. There was also a lamp close to each of the hoists. The commercial branches of Mr Parker's business were carried on in another part of the city, but at the stores there was a clerk to check the delivery orders, who had an office in the stores upstairs. A person passing between this office and the Stirling Street entrance might naturally take a course by which he would fall into one of the hoists (if it was unprotected), as it was situated very near the door leading to the office stair, and on the Stirling Street side of that door. A person going to the Port Dundas entrance would naturally pass in the other direction into the manufacturing portion of the premises, and thus avoid both the hoists.

About five o'clock on the evening of 3d December 1885 Francis Brady, an ironfounder, entered the premises by the Stirling Street wicket-gate, which had immediately before been opened by Anderson, one of Parker's carters, in order that he might go inside and open the large door to admit his cart. Brady in entering remarked to Anderson (who made no objection to his going in), that it was dark. After Brady had passed the hoist near the clerk's office he met another of Parker's employees named Norrie, whom he asked whether they had any old barrels for sale as firewood. Norrie referred him to the clerk, and accordingly Brady went upstairs to the clerk, by whom he was informed that they never sold barrels—as was the fact. On coming down Brady at first went in the direction of the Port Dundas Road entrance, but suddenly turned round and went towards the Stirling Street entrance, by which he had come in. In passing the hoist he fell in, and was so severely injured that he died shortly afterwards. At the time of the accident the platform of the hoist was at the bottom of the well, the chains were off the pillars, and the lamp was not lighted.

Brady's widow and children brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Parker for damages on account of the accident, alleging that it occurred through Parker's fault in not having the hoist "sufficiently protected against possible danger to those coming out and in to his works."

In defence Parker pleaded;—(2) The defender not being responsible for the safety of the said deceased, he having entered the defenders' works of his own accord, and solely for his own interests, ought to be assolizied. (3) The defender having used all due precaution for the protection of those legitimately in his works, ought to be assolizied, with expenses. (5) In any event, the deceased having, by his own negligence, materially contributed towards the accident libelled, the pursuers are barred from insisting in this action.

A proof was allowed. The foregoing narrative expresses the material results of the evidence. The only matter of fact of importance in controversy at the hearing in the Court of Session was as to the right of persons to enter the defender's stores and manufactory—particularly by the Stirling Street entrance. On that point Ferguson, the clerk at the stores, gave this evidence,—“My duties were to get orders from the office, make them up according to sample, and send them out to the various addresses. . . . Any sales that are carried through are effected at the office.

. . . The only cash transactions I have are petty transactions. . . .” No. 147.
 At Stirling Street “there is no sign inviting people to enter. Mr Parker’s name is not on it. It is a plain painted gate. (Q.) Do you discourage people from coming into the work as much as possible? (A.) If we saw anyone who looked as if he had no business there we would immediately put him out. Carters and other people come in that way with goods, and so on. There are a lot of things lying about that could be easily picked up if we admitted any person. It is not intended that strangers, or people wishing to buy or sell, should come there at all. When travellers come in to me I send them down to the counting-house.” The defender’s own evidence was to the same effect. On the other hand, Norrie, the man who told Brady to go up to the clerk, deponed,—“People often come in by this entrance [Stirling Street]. The reason I sent him up to the clerk was that I had nothing to do with what he was inquiring about. I saw the clerk at the top of the stair. (Q.) And you thought him the proper person to give him instructions? (A.) I could give him none.”

It did not appear that the hoist as it was when the accident took place was considered to be in a dangerous condition for the defender’s employees, but Norrie, Anderson the carter, and M’Cartin, the defender’s foreman, all deponed that it was a place into which a stranger unacquainted with the locality might readily fall.

On 29th July 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced an interlocutor in which (after findings in fact) he assolized the defender, founding mainly on the case of Walker v. The Midland Railway Company.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 18th March 1887, adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The deceased entered the defender’s premises on a legitimate errand, viz., to buy old barrels for firewood, and it did not make his errand less legitimate that he was mistaken in supposing that the defender sold barrels. That took the case out of Walker v. The Midland Railway Company,¹ on which the Sheriffs had proceeded, because there it was held that the deceased had no legitimate reason for being in the place in which he met his death. The principle of that case was identical with the present pursuer’s contention, for had the opinion of the Judges been that the deceased there had legitimate grounds for being where he was, the judgment would have been for the plaintiff. That principle was supported by other authorities.² (2) The deceased

* “NOTE.—. . . This case has from time to time been put off in order to have the official report of the case of Walker v. The Midland Railway Company. That case had just been reported in the newspapers a few days after the diet of proof before me. It appears that no report in the ordinary law reports has been given, the explanation being, I understand, that the case was regarded by the reporters as one of special circumstances. The case, however, is reported in the periodical issue known as The Times Law Reports (which report, it may be noted, is reported by a barrister-at-law), vol. ii. p. 450. It appears, from that report, that a gentleman in the St Pancras Hotel, in the middle of the night, intending to go to a w.-c., went into what was called a service-room in the hotel, where there was a sound of a drip of water, and fell down the cavity of a hoist in this room, whereby he was killed. It was held by a majority of the Judges in the House of Lords that there was no liability. I do not intend to go into details of this case, but I think the report referred to clearly shews that if there was no liability for the deceased Smith falling down a hoist in premises where he was paying for his living, a fortiori, there can be no liability in this case, where the deceased, at his own hand, went into premises which the defender did not open to the public.”

entered the defender's premises on the invitation of the defender. In the first place there was no notice of prohibition against his entering, such as the words "No admission" over the door. Then he entered without objection on the part of Anderson the defender's carter, and was directed by Norrie the defender's employee to go to the clerk, who also expressed no disapprobation. It must therefore be held that he had the authority of the defender to enter, and that implied that reasonable precautions would be taken for his safety;¹ such precautions here were wanting. (3) The hoist was in an unnecessarily dangerous condition. It was not in use, and the platform therefore ought not to have been at the bottom of the well and the chains off.² Further, the lamp should have been lit.³

Argued for the defender;—(1) This was not the case of a shop, which the public were invited to enter; it was a private place—a large manufactory and store, where no commercial transactions were carried on. The deceased therefore had no legitimate purpose in going to such a place to buy old barrels. The present case was a fortiori of Walker v. The Midland Railway Company,⁴ where the deceased was a guest in the hotel, and also of Batchelor v. Fortescue,⁵ where undoubtedly the deceased had a right to be in the works, but the ratio of the judgment was that he was not there on the owner's business. Similarly in Indermaur v. Dames,⁶ it was only because the injured person had gone into the works in pursuance of a contract with the householder that he was held entitled to recover. There was nothing of that sort here. The deceased was a mere volunteer or licensee, as it was expressed in England, who had entered private works by a private and back entrance in the dark for purposes of his own. If he chose so to enter, he entered at his own risk.⁷ As it was put in one case; if it was so dark that he could not see, he ought not to have proceeded along a passage which was strange to him—if there was light enough, he ought to have seen the danger.⁸ (2) There had been no invitation to the deceased to enter the premises—particularly by a private entrance which had not even the name of the proprietor on it. The only tangible ground for maintaining that there had been was the circumstance that Norrie had directed the deceased to go to the clerk. But it was to be observed that the deceased had already entered, and had indeed passed the source of danger, before he met Norrie, and further it could not be held that a chance conversation with an employee who was ignorant of the details of the business amounted to an invitation to enter binding on the defender. (3) The works were not in an unnecessarily dangerous condition. They were safe enough for the employees who knew the locality—and the defender's obligation to the deceased, if it existed at all, was no higher than towards his employees.

Parker.

The facts of the case are of the simplest nature. The defender, a soap manufacturer, has a store with two entrances—one from Port-Dundas Road and the other from Stirling Street. The Port-Dundas entrance is the usual entrance, that from Stirling Street has a wicket gate, but it is substantially a cart entrance. On the 3d December 1886, the deceased, whose representatives are the pursuers here, went into the defender's premises at about five o'clock in the evening—that is to say, when it was almost dark—and he went in by the cart entrance, through which he obtained access without meeting with any obstacle. After entering he saw one of the defender's employees, to whom he mentioned that his errand was to see whether they had any empty barrels for sale as firewood, and he was referred to the clerk upstairs. He accordingly went upstairs; on coming down he appears at first to have intended to leave by the Port-Dundas gate, but he changed his mind, turned round, and went towards the gateway by which he had come in. While doing so he fell into a hatchway, which had been left open without any protection to prevent people from meeting with such a disaster.

This action is brought by the representatives of the deceased, in order to recover damages, on the ground that the hatchway, which was in the passage from the Stirling Street entrance to the house, was left open without anything to protect it, or to prevent such an accident as here occurred, although there is a platform which if it had been raised would have made a cover for the hatchway flush with the rest of the floor, and although there are also chains which if placed in position on the pillars at each corner of the hatchway, would have made it safe against accidents like this. It is said on the part of the defender that he was under no obligation to see to the safety of persons in the position of the deceased, in the first place, because the deceased had not entered by the usual entrance, and in the second place, because he had come about his own affairs, and not about anything with which the defender had any concern. I do not think that these two arguments make any difference on this question if the defender is liable otherwise. If the deceased had been the most ordinary customer in the world, and if he had gone in by the other entrance, I think the result would have been just the same. But I am not prepared to say that this man in visiting the store as he did for purposes of his own was not exactly in the position of an ordinary customer. He came to see whether the defender had a particular article of merchandise for sale. It turned out that the defender had none of the article—at least none for sale—but the deceased believed that he might have. I think too that if these doors were kept open for the purposes of the ordinary traffic in which the proprietor was engaged, all the customers of the defender had a right to come in by the one door as much as by the other. Therefore, on this branch of the case, I am of opinion that if there was an obligation on the part of the defender towards any of his customers, it existed towards the deceased. But, in the second place, I am of opinion that there was such an obligation undertaken by the defender in this place of public merchandise. It is a private house, no doubt, in one sense, but is open, as all shops are open, to those of the public who have any dealings with the proprietor, or who wish to have dealings with him, and accordingly I am of opinion that the proprietor is bound to have his through way safe for customers or intending cus-

Parker.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The premises here have two entrances, and I think on the evidence that both are open to the public. In the line of persons coming in or leaving by one of these entrances—that leading to Stirling Street—is a store with two doors. At each door is a hoist leading to a cellar beneath, and the platform upon which the goods are raised or lowered serves also as a cover for the vacant space. When this accident happened to the pursuer's husband, the platform of the hoist nearest the Stirling Street entrance was at the bottom, not at the top, of the vacant space, which consequently was uncovered, and as it was quite dark that was manifestly dangerous. It is true that there is a lamp immediately above the hoist, but as it was not lighted at the time it might as well not have been there. There are also four pillars, one at each corner of the hoist, with chains to connect them, but as the chains were off, they too, with the pillars, might as well not have been there. The place therefore when the accident occurred was open, unlit, and unprotected, and it is a place, as several of the witnesses inform us, into which a person unacquainted with the locality might readily fall when it is in that open, unlit, and unprotected condition.

Now, the first question which I put to myself in this state of matters is, Was it a right or a wrong state of matters, irrespective of any question of liability to any particular individual? Was it right or wrong to leave such a source of danger in a passage along which people were coming and going "with goods and so on," as one of the witnesses puts it? I have no hesitation in saying that it was quite wrong. No reason or excuse can be suggested as a palliation for leaving this source of danger, which might be worth as much as a man's life—was worth as much, as this case shews. Then what is the defence? The pursuer's husband went in to see if he could get any old barrels for firewood. They had none to sell—it seems they did not sell any—and it is said that the pursuer's husband must therefore be taken as having no right to enter the defender's premises. Now, he certainly had no right which he could vindicate against the proprietor, who had a perfect right to exclude him if he pleased. But in entering this open door for the purpose which he had in view, was he doing what was right or wrong? I have no hesitation in saying that his conduct was not wrong. I think that there was nothing wrong in his entering these premises, or in his making the civil inquiry which he made about the firewood. I have therefore no difficulty in concurring with your Lordship in thinking that we should recall the 'Sheriffs' interlocutors.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. The defender maintained that the deceased was improperly in the premises on the evening in question, that if he had any right to enter at all he came in by the wrong door, and that in any case the defender was under no obligation to provide for his safety after he had entered. I do not think it necessary to determine any of those preliminary questions. Brady, the deceased, entered upon a perfectly lawful errand. Norrie, one of the defender's servants, sees him, but does not challenge him—does not tell him that he has no right to be there, or that he has come in by the wrong door, and that he must leave. On the contrary, when the deceased asked him whether he could buy any old barrels for firewood, Norrie told him to go upstairs to the clerk. Surely that was an authority to do that which he was told to do, and implied that he might do it in safety. He got upstairs in safety, and was on his way back when he met with this accident. I think that there was here what amounted to an invitation to enter, and consequently that the defender was under an obligation to have things in a reasonably safe condition for the person so invited to enter, both on entering and coming back, and that as things were not in such a reasonably safe condition, the defender must be held liable in damages for the injury sustained by the deceased.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that on the occasion libelled the deceased Francis Brady entered the premises of the defender for a legitimate purpose, and when leaving the same fell into the well of the hatch or hoist mentioned in the record, and thereby sustained injuries which caused his death; (2) that the said well was not lighted nor fenced; and (3) that the death of the said Francis Brady is attributable to the fault and negligence of the defenders in failing to light and fence the well: Find in law that the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuers, the widow and children of the deceased, accordingly: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against; assess the damages at £250, payable to the persons in the proportions following, viz.:—To the pursuer Hannah Sweeney Brady, widow of the deceased, £200; to each of Sarah Ann Brady and Thomas Brady, his children, £16, 3s. 4d.; and to the said Hannah Sweeney or Brady, as tutrix to Hannah Brady, also child of the deceased, £16, 3s. 4d.: Ordain the defenders to make payment of the said sums to the pursuers respectively: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court: Remit," &c.

Innominate contract—Proof—Parole—Guarantee by commission agent of a minimum price.—Question, whether, in an action of accounting between a principal and a commission agent, it was competent to prove by parole that the agent, in order to retain his principal's custom, had agreed in a particular transaction to pay a minimum sum as the price of the goods to be sold, whether that sum should be realised on sale or not.

Opinions per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young that it was not; per Lord Craighill and Lord Rutherford Clark contra.

IN June 1886 William Reid, herring merchant, Stettin, who was in the habit of advancing cash against consignments of herrings made to him by fishcurers in Scotland, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Wick against Reid Brothers, fishcurers, Keiss, for payment of £147, 12s. 4d., being the alleged balance due by them to him on an advance of £400 after deducting the prices realised by the herrings against which the advance had been made.

In defence, Reid Brothers averred:—“(1) In the month of September 1885 the defenders consigned a cargo of herrings from Shetland, per ship or vessel, ‘Wild Wave’ . . . the pursuer agreeing to make an advance of £400 to account of the consignment. . . . (2) In the month of October 1885 the pursuer's son, William Reid, Stettin, as holding himself to have been a partner of and as representing the pursuer, came to Wick, and the defenders having at that time only received £200 of the foresaid £400 agreed on, he, the pursuer's son, was annoyed at the delay, and non-implementation of the said arrangement, as condescended on in article 1 of the defenders' statement, and assured the defenders that the balance of the amount would be obtained forthwith. (3) When the pursuer's son was in Wick in the said month of October he knew that the defenders had a cargo of herrings shipped on board the vessel 'Swift' ready for dispatch, and in consequence of the disappointment as to the £400, the defenders were to send the cargo to another merchant. The pursuer's son, however, gave the verbal assurance that the balance of the £400 would be forthwith received, and he further agreed to give at least a free price of 26s. per barrel of crown branded full herrings, and 12s. per barrel of spents, mixed or small branded herrings, forming the 'Swift's' cargo. Upon these terms the defenders agreed to consign the 'Swift's' cargo to the pursuer, the pursuer in the meantime making a payment to account of 20s. on full herrings, and 10s. on spents, mixed or small herrings, per barrel." The defenders then set forth an account in which, giving effect to the alleged agreement as to the minimum prices of herrings, a balance of £119, 10s. 9d. was brought out as due to the defenders.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having agreed to pay the defenders for the herrings sent per the 'Swift' at the minimum clear price stated on record by the defenders in article 3 of their statement, the defenders are entitled to payment thereof as arranged and agreed on.

A proof was allowed.

On 17th February 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Harper) assoilized the defenders.

On appeal the Sheriff (Thoms), on 23d March, recalled that interdictor, and gave decree as concluded for.

The defenders appealed.

The arguments at the hearing were mainly directed to the question whether the agreement set forth by the defenders in article 3 of their statement could competently be proved by parole evidence.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The agreement alleged here is one of a somewhat eccentric and unusual kind. It appears that the defenders, who are fish-curers at Wick, consigned a certain quantity of herring to the pursuer, who is a fish-dealer at Stettin, to be sold by him on commission, and the agreement which the defenders allege is that the pursuer undertook that the fish should bring at least 26s. and 12s. per cran, according to their quality—that they should bring these sums whatever their market price might be. In short, the agreement, if it was entered into, amounted to this, that the pursuer was to give the defenders a bonus in return for the consignment of their fish, as he was indifferent about making a profit on this particular transaction, provided he could preserve the trade connection which the defenders were able to give him. That is an object which we can easily conceive might be of so much importance as to justify such an arrangement. It is said that such a bargain may be proved by parole evidence, and that it has been proved by the parole evidence which we have here.

¹ Authorities.—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 6; Edmonston v. Edmonston, June 7, 1861, 23 D. 995, 33 Scot. Jur. 514; *Forbes v. (His Lordship then proceeded to consider the evidence, and came to the conclusion that the parole evidence did not instruct the alleged agreement. His Lordship then continued.) But the question arises, and was argued to us, whether such an agreement can competently be proved by parole evidence. I have an impression that it cannot. I think it is a bargain with a condition which is repugnant to the nature of the original contract, like a contract of sale without a price. I think, therefore, that it falls within the rule of contracts of an unusual and anomalous character, which can only be proved by writ or oath.

June 8, 1887.

Reid v. Reid Brothers.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The defender's case is founded upon this special bargain—which Mr Murray represented to us as entered into on this occasion only and in order to serve a particular purpose—a bargain, namely, by which the pursuer agreed to make good to his principals 26s. and 12s. per barrel for different qualities of herring, whatever he sold them at. Now, I am inclined to agree with your Lordship in thinking that such a bargain is an unusual and anomalous one, and one accordingly which our law will not sustain unless it is supported by the writ or oath of the party disputing it; but I should desire, if possible, to avoid deciding that question, and I am of opinion, even if we may competently regard the parole evidence here, that the agreement on which the defenders found has not been proved.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree with your Lordship in the result, but if it were necessary in order to come to a decision in the case to give a final opinion on the competency of parole evidence here, I should be obliged to come to a different conclusion from your Lordships. The pursuer undertook to dispose of the defenders' herrings as their agent, and we have here a dispute regarding one of the terms of that contract. The proof therefore relates to the proof of these terms, and is incidental to the proof of the contract itself. You may call it an out-of-the-way contract or an extraordinary contract, but if you are entitled to inquire by parole evidence whether the contract itself existed or not—and it is not disputed that you are—then by parole evidence also may you find out whether any of the conditions which are represented to have formed part of the contract really did so. I do not give that as my final opinion. I only say if it had been necessary to express such an opinion, it would have been that just stated. I however agree with your Lordships in thinking that the parole evidence fails to shew that the bargain alleged by the defenders was that which the parties truly entered into. (His Lordship then considered the evidence.)

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—If this question were to be decided entirely by the parole evidence, and on the footing that written evidence is not requisite, I should incline to the opinion that the defence has been established. There remains the further question whether the defenders are entitled to proceed on parole evidence only, or whether alleging an agreement like the present, they must prove it scripto or by the oath of their adversary. As I have no voice in the decision of the case I shall refrain from expressing an opinion on this interesting question, contenting myself with saying that my impression rather is in favour of admitting parole evidence.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the account-current between the pursuer and defenders libelled exhibits a balance of £147, 12s. 4d. due by the defenders to the pursuer on account of money advanced by him to or for them on certain consignments of herrings made to him by them for sale; (2) that the defenders do not dispute the accuracy of the said account, except in so far as they allege that in consideration of receiving the said consignments the pursuer undertook to make good to them prices at the rate of 26s. per barrel for herrings of one quality, and 12s. per barrel for herrings of another quality, whether these prices were realised on sale or not, and free of all charges; (3) that the defenders have failed to prove that the pursuer came under the obligation alleged: Therefore dismiss the appeal," &c.

Lease—Removing—Title to sue.—The estates of A were sequestrated in 1876, and his trustee sold to B his right and interest in an inn (which he held of the proprietor under a verbal lease). The trustee granted an assignation of the rents under declaration that "I have no title to the said subjects" beyond the act and warrant, and that "I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said A, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor." A continued in possession of the inn till his death in April 1886. In March 1886 B had raised an action of removing against him, which was in dependence at the date of his death. In May 1886 B presented a petition in the Sheriff Court, for a warrant for the summary ejection of A's widow, in which he averred that he was proprietor of the subjects occupied by the defender, and founded on the assignation as his title. On this petition the Sheriff found that A's widow had no right or title to occupy the subjects, and granted warrant for her removal. A's widow brought a suspension thereof in the Court of Session. In his answers B averred that after the date of the assignation, A occupied the subjects as his tenant under a verbal agreement to that effect. The Court (diss. Lord Shand, aff. judgment of Lord M'Laren) refused B a proof of his averments of tenancy, and suspended the proceedings complained of, on the ground that B had no title to sue the removing.

1st DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
B.

PRIOR to 1876 William Sinclair was tenant of an inn at Urquhart, Elgin, under a verbal lease from the Earl of Fife, who was proprietor of the ground on which it was built. The building had been largely added to by Sinclair.

In 1876 Sinclair's estates were sequestrated.

On 27th January 1877 the trustee exposed to public sale his right and interest as trustee foresaid in and to the subjects possessed by Sinclair under the Earl of Fife. That right and interest was purchased by James Leslie, brewer, Elgin, for £82. By assignation, dated 5th and 6th February 1877, the trustee, with consent of the commissioners on the sequestrated estate, made over to and in favour of James Leslie, All and Whole his, the said trustee's, right and interest in the subjects in question. The assignation contained this clause:—"And I, as trustee and with consent foresaid, assign the rents, and I declare that I have no title to the said subjects beyond the foresaid act and warrant in my favour, and that I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said William Sinclair, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor: And I, as trustee, and with consent foresaid, bind myself to free and relieve the said James Leslie, and his forebears, of all ground-rent and other public and parochial burdens: And I, as trustee, and with consent foresaid, grant warrandice from fact and deed." No. 149.

On 18th March 1886, Sinclair having up to that date remained in possession of the inn, Leslie raised in the Sheriff Court of Elgin an action of removing against Sinclair. In the condescendence Leslie averred that he was heritable proprietor of the subjects, and that they were occupied by Sinclair as his tenant for the year ending Whitsunday 1886. Sinclair entered appearance in the action, but he died in April 1886. June 9, 1887.
Sinclair v.
Leslie.

On 26th May 1886 Leslie raised an action in the Sheriff Court craving for warrant to summarily eject Mrs Sinclair and her family from the subjects. In his condescendence he averred:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is proprietor of the hotel and other premises situated in the village of Urquhart, and county of Elgin, as at present occupied by the defender, who is the widow of William Sinclair, sometime hotel-keeper, Urquhart. The pursuer's title to said premises is herewith produced. . . ." The only title he produced was the assignation above set forth.

Mrs Sinclair denied the pursuer's title, and pleaded that as she had been confirmed executor-dative to her husband, she was entitled to the tempus deliberandi to determine whether she should sist herself in her husband's room as defender to the above-mentioned action.

After certain procedure the Sheriff-substitute, on 16th June 1886, sustained the plea that the action was premature, and sisted the process until the expiry of the tempus deliberandi.

Leslie appealed to the Sheriff (Ivory), who, on 29th September 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the defender has no legal right or title to occupy the subjects in question: Therefore decerns; and grants warrant against the defender, in terms of the prayer of the petition."

On 7th October Mrs Sinclair presented a note of suspension.

The above facts were stated in the complainer's condescendence.

The respondent averred;—(Ans. 2) At the time of purchase the building was in the course of erection, and he paid for finishing it; he subsequently improved it. "On Sinclair's failing to pay the ground rent due in June 1883, Lord Fife's factor wrote to the respondent requesting payment, and the amount was paid by the respondent on 10th September 1883." On 19th March 1886 the respondent sold the property for £186. Lord Fife's factor agreed to grant a feu-charter to the purchaser. The respondent was recognised by Lord Fife as proprietor. He also paid the county assessments as proprietor. (Ans. 3) "Denied that after the date of said assignation, Sinclair occupied the said subjects as tenant of the Earl of Fife. Explained that, from that time, he occupied the said subjects as a yearly tenant of the respondent, under a verbal agreement to that effect with the respondent. According to said agreement, the rent payable by Sinclair to the respondent was to be £15 a-year. Sinclair was generally in pecuniary difficulties, and frequently entreated the respondent not to exact the rent, nor turn him out of the premises. In February 1883, the previous Martinmas half year's rent remained unpaid, and the respondent took out sequestration, and obtained decree therefor on 21st February 1883. At the same time, he also took out sequestration for the half year's rent then current, and obtained decree of the same date. The decrees are herewith produced. On 5th February 1883, the respondent caused a notice of removing to be served on Sinclair, warning and charging him to remove at the following term of Whitsunday. Execution of intimation of removing is herewith produced. The respondent did not proceed further with the sequestrations or removing, owing to Sinclair producing a cautioner for the rent. This was a man named Scott, a foreman on the

No. 149. railway then being constructed between Elgin and Buckie, and who was living in Sinclair's house. On Scott becoming cautioner, and the complainer; Mrs Sinclair, promising verbally to attend to the house, and pay the rent, the respondent granted the delay asked."

June 9, 1887.
Sinclair v.
Leslie.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The respondent has no title to sue an action of removing against the complainer. (6) The respondent's averments of ownership are not relevant for probation; and separatim, all parties interested in the question of ownership have not been called.

The respondent pleaded;—(2) The complainer having no legal title to occupy the subjects in question, the action is groundless, and the suspension should be refused.

Receipts for the rent of the subjects (£1, 0s. 4d.) were produced for the years 1884-85-86. These receipts bore that the rent had been received from Mr Sinclair (the last from his heirs) by the Earl of Fife's factor.

In the Valuation-roll for 1886-87, Sinclair's representatives were entered as tenants under the Earl of Fife.

On 1st February 1887, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the respondent has no title to sue a removing in reference to the subjects libelled, and therefore suspends the proceedings complained of."*

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the decree of ejection complained of ought to be suspended. The defender's husband, William Sinclair, was a tenant under Earl Fife of a hotel in the village of Urquhart, which, I understand, he had erected at his own cost and risk, but to which he had no title, and no right to demand a title. On his bankruptcy in the year 1876, the trustee for William Sinclair's creditors exposed Sinclair's right and interest in the hotel and pertinents to sale, and the respondent became the purchaser. But inasmuch as Sinclair had no right susceptible of being asserted in a Court of law, the purchase, though followed by a deed of assignation, carried nothing except the right to occupy the premises as tenant until the next Whitsunday term. Sinclair accordingly remained in possession until his death in 1886, a period of nine years, counting from the date of his bankruptcy. If we count from the date of his entry to the subjects, the period of his occupation would, of course, be longer—how much longer does not appear, and is not essential to the case. On Sinclair's death his possession was continued by his widow, against whom the respondent has obtained decree of ejection before the Sheriff Court of Elgin.

"In this process of suspension the respondent avers that William Sinclair recognised his, the respondent's, right, and paid him rent for the hotel. He does not found upon receipts for rent, but he refers to two decrees of sequestration for rent which he obtained against Sinclair in the Sheriff Court.

"The question which I have at present to consider is, whether the respondent has a title to prosecute an action of removing. The title on which the respondent founds is the assignation granted to him in 1876 by the trustee for Sinclair's creditors. I have already expressed the opinion that this assignation carried nothing except the right to possess the subjects until the ensuing term. The proprietor, Lord Fife, might have given a lease, but no lease was obtained, and the assignation, not being followed by possession, came to an end at the ensuing term. I cannot hold that it was continued by tacit relocation; because I conceive that possession, actual or civil, is the foundation of every title of tacit relocation, and in the present case the possession was that of William Sinclair. The Sheriff has found 'that the defender (suspender) has no legal right or title to occupy the subjects.'

"This is very probably true in fact. But before I can reach that fact, or apply my mind to its consideration, I must first be satisfied that the person who is going to eject the actual possessor of the building has himself a title of possession. I assume, without proof, that the suspender is in possession. If she were not, the present proceedings would be inappropriate. The proprietor is not interfering. I suppose he is satisfied with Mrs Sinclair as a tenant. If he Leslie reclaimed to the First Division. The argument of the reclaimer is fully set forth in Lord Shand's opinion, and that of the respondent in the opinions of the other Judges.

At advising,—

Sinclair v.
Leslie.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that the owner of the hotel and the ground on which it is built was the Earl of Fife. How long William Sinclair was in possession of that hotel does not quite appear, but for a number of years apparently he was so. He had originally acquired the ground with some little building upon it, and he himself expended money on the erection of an hotel. This state of matters continued to subsist until the year 1876, when Sinclair's estate was sequestrated and Mr Kynoch was appointed trustee. Notwithstanding the sequestration, however, there is no doubt that William Sinclair continued in possession of the hotel. He had no title as tenant beyond a merely verbal lease. In short, he was a tenant at will; but on the faith of Lord Fife not removing him he had expended money on the building of the hotel, as I have already mentioned; and there is no doubt that if the building had been Mr Sinclair's own property it would have formed a valuable asset of his estate. But, unfortunately, he had no title to it at all. He had no title to the ground. His right could only endure till the next term; that was the only legal right he had to possession of the subjects at all. It was in the power of Lord Fife to do anything in his favour that he thought equitable and right; but, as far as the mere title was concerned, William Sinclair never had any right to that ground, or to the buildings upon it, except merely from year to year. The building was erected on Lord Fife's property, and it became the property of Lord Fife just as much as the ground itself.

Now, the trustee in Sinclair's sequestration thought he might make something of the supposed right of William Sinclair, and accordingly he persuaded the reclaimer here to give him £80 for what is called an assignation, and that assignation bears that he was to assign any right that Sinclair had; but it contains this important declaration—"And I, as trustee, and with consent foresaid, assign the rents, and I declare that I have no title to the said subjects beyond the foresaid act and warrant in my favour, and that I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said William Sinclair, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor." Now, that is certainly a curious declaration on buying such a subject as that at the price of £80; but with that we have nothing to do. The result was, that the reclaimer got it, but it seems to me he got nothing except the right to enter into and occupy the place of William Sinclair until the next term. If Lord were supporting the respondent, the case would be very different. Now, at the close of the argument I inquired if the respondent had any further written evidence to offer in support of his claim to the character of principal tenant under Earl of Fife, and in particular whether he could produce receipts for rent in his own name. The answer was, that the respondent desired a proof of his averments. A proof on the question of title to sue is not a proceeding which we would be disposed to allow as a matter of course; and, looking to the admitted facts as to possession, I am of opinion that this is not a question which can be elucidated by parole evidence. Apparently the respondent has been proceeding upon the assumption of some kind of tenant right which he thinks he acquired by the trustee's assignment in his favour. But it has not been made clear to me that any such right is known to the law, and I therefore sustain the plea that the respondent has no title to sue, and suspend the whole proceedings, and find complainer entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in this Court."

Sinclair v.
Leslie.

Fife chose to recognise him as tenant of the ground and give him a lease of it, well and good; but he did not derive such a right from the trustee, nor had he the smallest shadow of right to make any demand on Lord Fife. That being the case, we are met by the fact that that is the title upon which the reclainer sued the action in the inferior Court, and he sets it out quite distinctly that he is proprietor of the subject—that he is heritable proprietor of the subject—that is his title in the libel for removing; and in support of that allegation he produced this assignation, which demonstrates that he is not proprietor. And then he goes on to say that Sinclair is tenant of the subject, having been tenant of Lord Fife at one time, but being now the tenant of the petitioner, who is now the proprietor; and there is not another word of averment in the record except what I have read. He produces his assignation, and says—"I am proprietor, and you the defender are tenant, and you won't pay your rent, and therefore you must remove." That is the whole case. Now, the question that naturally occurs to one at first for consideration is, What was it the duty of the Sheriff to do in such circumstances? There surely can be but one answer to that, and that is to dismiss the action for want of title. If a man sues an action as proprietor, and has not any title as proprietor, it seems to follow of necessity that the summons must be dismissed. But this was not done, and consequently we have this complaint against the decree of removing; and in this process of suspension it is averred for the first time that the pursuer in the removing, instead of being proprietor of the subject, which he obviously is not, is a lessor of the subject through William Sinclair, who is now succeeded by his widow. And it is in that capacity that it is averred in the third statement—"That the respondent having taken no enforceable right under his said assignation, the said William Sinclair continued for a period of nine years or thereby after the date of the said assignation to occupy the said subjects as tenant of the Earl of Fife, to whom he paid his rent," and so forth; and then an answer to that averment is made that "he occupied the said subjects as a yearly tenant of the respondent under a verbal agreement to that effect with the respondent"; and that "according to said agreement the rent payable by Sinclair to the respondent was to be £15 a-year."

Now, that statement is made for the first time in the answer to the complainer's statement of facts in support of the suspension, and the respondent asks a proof on that. I see perfectly well from the statement of facts, as we have them before us, that this is a statement made merely as an after-thought. It never occurred to this gentleman to represent himself in the inferior Court as a lessor at £15 a-year. He was proprietor, and nothing but proprietor; and on that case, as proprietor, I think his case must stand or fall from beginning to end. The fact is, that William Sinclair never was out of possession of this subject, and his widow has possessed it since his death, and the rent has been paid by Sinclair and his widow to the proprietor of the subject, and not a penny of the alleged £15 which is said to be payable to the reclainer has ever been paid. It is said that proceedings have been taken to enforce payment of the rent, but they were not brought to a point, plainly because the reclainer saw very well that he could not succeed. In fact, the position of Sinclair remains undisturbed from the time he became tenant-at-will of that ground under the Earl of Fife down to his death, and has since been continued by his widow.

Now, what was the right? What kind of a right was it that Leslie, the respondent, took under that assignation? As I have already said, it was simply a right to possess the subjects until the next term as a tenant-at-will. But it was said that that must be held to be fortified by tacit relocation. Well, there must be some foundation for tacit relocation; there must be some sort of possession or there can be no tacit relocation. I shall assume the possession might be civil possession, and not actual possession. The actual possession was with Sinclair, and it could not be that. But was there civil possession—the only possession which it was possible Leslie could have? He did not receive a penny. Where was the possession? There was neither actual nor civil possession, and, therefore, there could be no tacit relocation; and the consequence is, that the right of this reclaimer, whatever he had under that assignation, has long ago come to an end. In short, he has no more interest in that subject than any of your Lordships. For these reasons I am quite clear that the Lord Ordinary has done right, and that his interlocutor should be adhered to.

Sinclair v.

Leslie.

LORD MURK.—I have come to the same conclusion. The suspension which is now before us was brought against Leslie on the allegation that he was not proprietor of this hotel. Has he a title? If not, he is not proprietor; and in the circumstances, when that objection is taken, I fail to see what answer there is to it. It is quite plain that the assignation is not a title to the property. There are a variety of documents produced to shew that there has been a sale of this property to him, and that the factor for Lord Fife had intimated that he was quite ready to recommend Lord Fife to grant a feu-charter; but, so far as I can see, that has never been done. That being the state of matters, as your Lordship pointed out, the case comes before us on a new view—that Sinclair, on the faith of that arrangement, held, as a sort of subtenant, under the respondent Leslie, at a rent of £15 a-year. Now, that statement is made for the first time in this action, and it is not alleged that there has ever been any payment made of rent by Sinclair to Leslie, or that it has ever been asked. Now, on that there is a proposal to send the case to proof. I do not see, looking at the variety of the documents, that, ex facie, there ought to be such a proof. For there are the receipts granted to Sinclair after this assignation for five consecutive years, in which Lord Fife gives Sinclair a receipt on paying £1, 0s. 4d. of ground-rent; and, in the face of that, the reclaimer alleges an agreement, and asks for a proof to shew that, in point of fact, he held of Leslie. I do not see that that can be granted. I admit the doctrine that was stated distinctly—that if a party, who was not a proprietor, but had some charge of a property, or right to it, lets that property to another individual, and that individual declines to pay his rent, he is bound to pay it. But there is confusion and contradiction in this case; and I cannot think that the allegation of this verbal agreement, if it was acted on at all, should be sent to proof in an action of ejection which was brought by the reclaimer here as the proprietor of an hotel of which he was not proprietor.

LORD SHAND.—I feel constrained in this case to differ from your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. I concede to the fullest extent that the respondent, the reclaimer, has not a good title to the property; but I think the case ought to be decided on this principle—that if a party takes a tenancy from a man who has a defective title, the person who so takes that tenancy cannot challenge the title of his lessor. The title of his author may be utterly bad, but it is not in the mouth of the man who takes that tenancy to say to the other, "You have no title." And it appears to me that on the facts of this case as averred, it being as I think well averred that the present suspender took and holds the property from the respondent, the case ought to go to inquiry, and that there is a risk of injustice in deciding it on the view which your Lordships take, without inquiry.

Sinclair v.
Leslie.

The state of facts as averred—and to that alone we are entitled to look here. for the case has been disposed of upon the respondent's own statement—is this: William Sinclair, a hotel-keeper in the village of Urquhart, seems for a number of years to have held one of these long leases or feus common in northern counties, from Lord Fife. A house seems to have been put up on that feu, and the property was held from his Lordship for payment of £1 a-year. We all know that that is a very common tenancy in the north of Scotland. People do not take care to obtain their titles. They hold on, year by year, knowing that the landlord who has a record of his feus or leases in his books will act fairly by them and give them a regular valid title if required; and they go on, year by year, putting up buildings on these feus on the faith that the landlord will recognise them as the owners. Mr Sinclair was in possession of the property on an understanding of that kind, and the house was worth very much more than £1 a-year. He was sequestrated in 1876, and the trustee then acquired his right to the property, such as it was, against Lord Fife, and the reclaimer came forward and bought that right, paying £80 for it. It may be that Lord Fife was not bound to recognise that transaction. If he was not, I should think he was probably bound to regard the value of the buildings on the feu, if that was a melioration, and that the claim for such melioration was at least a strong ground on which a pecuniary claim could have been based. But however that may be, what followed next, according to the respondent's averments, is that, having paid £80, he arranged with Sinclair that Sinclair should become his tenant, not at £1 but at £15. The relation then which arose between parties, if that statement be proved, was plainly this, that in the first place, whatever the respondent's right in the subject was, Sinclair agreed to become his tenant; in the next place, that the respondent was the person liable in £1 a-year to Lord Fife; and third, that Sinclair agreed to pay him £15 a-year. So that there was the relation of tenancy or proprietorship, whichever you choose to call it, with reference to a long lease or feu, and a subtenancy was created, if that statement be true—and the case has been decided on the footing that it is true. Having made that arrangement, Leslie proceeded to lay out a large expenditure on this property. His averment is that he has thus laid out £80, and he has produced vouchers for some of the expenditure. In what capacity was that done? Plainly in this capacity, that, following out the arrangement on which he was to get £15 a-year from the complainer as his tenant, he laid out money in his character as proprietor. In the next place, we find that in addition he at one period took out sequestration against this tenant, and there was no appearance, and decree was granted. It is explained that the decree was not followed out, as he did not wish to deal harshly with the tenant, and because he got caution for the rent. In the third place, we find him assessed for taxes and county assessments, and that he pays these assessments; and in the fourth place, there is at least one if not more payments by him of the ground-rent of £1 to the landlord towards the end of the period we are dealing with. Further than all this is the fact that in the exercise of the right which he had he proceeds to sell the subject, and sells it at a price beyond £180; and finally we have documents that go to shew that the landlord's factor intimated that he was prepared to recognise his right, and would give a feu-charter to the purchaser. Now, it is in that state of facts as averred that this respondent is turned out of Court in a question with the party who, he says, took the subjects from him as tenant—and turned out of Court on the ground that he, the respondent, has no title. Supposing it to be conceded that this title is open to a serious or even fatal objection in a question between him and Lord Fife, it appears to me in that state of the facts that it is not in the mouth of Mrs Sinclair, the widow of Sinclair, to plead want of title; for the respondent is prepared to prove that Sinclair did take his hotel from him, and has held it from him since that time; and I think there is a great body of prima facie evidence in the matters I have alluded to tending to shew that that is the case. I am clearly of opinion that in these circumstances there ought to be a proof.

I am bound to say I do not much admire the record that has been made up on behalf of the respondent. There is a want of explanation as to the continued dealings between Leslie and Sinclair year after year, such as I think was called for in the circumstances of the case; and, second, there ought to have been explanation as to the payment of £1 from time to time made by Mrs Sinclair. It was a very right thing that Mrs Sinclair should have made at least the payment of £1 of rent to Lord Fife as she failed to pay her rent to the respondent. The case appears to me to be one, however, in which the respondent has well averred facts and circumstances which go to shew that the suspender's husband took and held the property from the respondent, and that his widow takes and holds it still from him. She has never got any title. The property stands in Lord Fife's books now in name of Sinclair's representatives simply because there never has been any transfer of the title. But I think the case as stated is one in which the tenant disputes the title of the person from whom he took his premises; and I therefore think it ought to be sent to proof, and that it is not sufficient to say the respondent has no title. As to the record in the Sheriff Court, the respondent there averred that the complainer had been his tenant for a number of years. That is the substance of his case, and is sufficient. The farther detail is specification merely. It should have been given in the Court below, but may, in my opinion, be properly admitted, if necessary, as it has been admitted, in the record in this Court. On the whole matter I think the case ought to be sent to proof.

LORD ADAM.—I think the question for us to decide is whether the decree of ejectment was properly pronounced in the Sheriff Court or was not. In order to ascertain whether that be so or not I think we must go to the averments on which the reclamer founded his case ab initio. I do not think that in a case of summary action of this sort you can defend a decree in an action pronounced in the Sheriff Court by averments of other rights and titles for the first time in the Court of Session. If that be a correct view of the case, and I think it is, the question is, what was averred in the Sheriff Court? The only averment in the Sheriff Court was that the pursuer there was proprietor of premises in the village of Urquhart, in the county of Elgin, occupied by Mrs Eliza Lamb or Sinclair, who is the widow of William Sinclair, sometime innkeeper at Urquhart. I think the first duty of the Sheriff was to see the title produced. If he looked at the title produced it was as clear as anything could be that he was not the proprietor. I think the Sheriff should have dismissed the action, and it is of that ground that my judgment here is founded. I do not know, nor have I made up my mind, whether or no the averments now made would be sufficient to support the eviction. I could very well see that it might require a great deal of inquiry. But I think it is too late. I quite endorse all that has been said by Lord Shand and by Lord Mure—that if a party takes a right from another he cannot question it. I do not dispute that in the least. But that was not what was said in the Sheriff Court. Mr Lealie did not say that he had a right to this subject under certain documents, and that Mrs Sinclair was a sublessee. If that had been the case that would have been a matter for inquiry in the Sheriff Court into the right of Mr Lealie and Mrs Sinclair. But that was not the case in the Sheriff Court. The pursuer in that Court produced a document which shewed that he had no title at all—at least not the title he founded on in the Sheriff Court—and that was the ground of judgment. I have only to add that so far as my judgment goes, what we decide ought to have no influence with Lord Fife as to which of the two shall get a title to the subjects. I think the case is apart altogether from that question.

THE COURT adhered.

Meditatio fugæ—Jurisdiction—Execution in a foreign country.—Held (1) that a meditatio fugæ warrant could not be put into execution furth of Scotland, and (2) that a creditor who had by means of such a warrant brought a debtor from England to Scotland was not entitled to avail himself of the fact that he had brought the debtor within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

ON 12th March 1887, on the petition of Archibald Mason Adam, the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Lees) granted a warrant to apprehend John Crowe who was stated to be in meditatio fugæ, and about to leave Scotland for America without making payment of a sum of £300 alleged to be due to Adam by him.

ON 9th April 1887 the warrant was endorsed by a Liverpool magistrate, and Crowe was thereupon apprehended when on board a steamer about to sail for Montreal.

ON 12th April Crowe made a deposition before the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Spens), and on the 13th the Sheriff-substitute found that the apprehension was not a competent proceeding, and that Crowe was not lawfully within the jurisdiction, and dismissed the petition.

ON 14th April, the Sheriff (Berry), on appeal, adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor.*

* "NOTE.—After consideration I agree in the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute that this petition should be dismissed. I think it impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that the respondent has been brought against his will from England to Scotland under the warrant of apprehension granted by Sheriff Lees on 12th March last, and indorsed by a Justice of Peace for Liverpool on 9th April. To grant under such a concurring warrant of an English magistrate a warrant for incarceration of the respondent as meditating flight from Scotland seems to me contrary to the principle on which a fugæ warrant proceeds. It may be a question how far I can consider under what authority the English magistrate proceeded in indorsing the warrant, but there can be little doubt

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—(1) It had been the custom in Glasgow to have meditatio fugæ warrants executed in the same way as the present.¹ The apprehension having proceeded upon an ex facie legal warrant, the Sheriff was bound to deal with the respondent on the footing that he was legally brought before him. He had nothing to do with the modus of the apprehension.² It was the tendency of the law to allow a warrant granted in one country to be executed in another.³ (2) No objection had been taken by the respondent when he made his deposition to the competency of the apprehension. The defect of jurisdiction on the part of the Sheriff ought to have been pleaded in limine, but instead of that the respondent, without taking any such objection, had deponed that he was illegally apprehended, because he was under contract to go to America, and was to return shortly. The respondent had prorogated the Sheriff's jurisdiction.⁴

Crowe.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this case is so clear that it is not necessary to call for any answer. The argument has been very well stated. The ground on which I proceed in dismissing the appeal is precisely that stated by the Sheriff, that it was "an abuse of the warrant granted by Sheriff Lees to bring back the respondent forcibly from England to Scotland, and that the petitioner is not entitled to avail himself of the fact that by such a proceeding he has brought the respondent within the jurisdiction of this Court." The respondent is not in my opinion legally within the jurisdiction of the Court, and I think the apprehension in England was altogether beyond the warrant on which it proceeded. The circumstance that the English magistrate authorised his officers to execute the warrant does not affect the question. The respondent was not in meditatione fugæ when apprehended, and Sheriff Lees' warrant had no efficacy for apprehension in England.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—As pointed out by Lord Rutherford Clark in Kidd v. Hyde, 9 R. 803, the fact that imprisonment for debt has been abolished has materially affected the utility of meditatio fugæ warrants. I agree with your Lordships that the Sheriff was right in dismissing the application. It is quite clear that that such an indorsement is not authorised by the Act 11 and 12 Victoria, c. 42, relative to the indorsement of warrants against persons for crimes or offences against the laws of Scotland. But the ground on which I proceed mainly is that it was, in my opinion, an abuse of the warrant granted by Sheriff Lees to bring back the respondent forcibly from England to Scotland, and that the petitioner is not entitled to avail himself of the fact that by such a proceeding he has brought the respondent within the jurisdiction of this Court. There is a conflict of authority between different Sheriffs-substitute on the point, and I have the highest respect for the opinion of Sheriff Glassford Bell, who took a different view in 1855 from that which I have expressed. But the opinion since acted on by Sheriff Dove Wilson, and substantially adhered to in his work on Sheriff Court practice, commends itself more to my approval. The pursuer's agent asked that I should grant a warrant for the detention of the defender, but I declined to do so, as inconsistent with the view I take of the case."

No. 150. if the appellant had stated at the first that the respondent was not merely in fuga, but was outwith the country, the Sheriff would have refused the deliverance or dismissed the application. The warrant was got on the footing that the respondent was still in this country. It completely fell the moment he went out of Scotland. If the appellant's argument is sound, the result would be that even after the fuga had been completed by the arrival of the person against whom it was sought to execute the warrant—it may be at a place on the other side of the globe—he could be brought back as still in fuga. Such a proposition is extravagant. The warrant has a limited effect, and its use is to arrest a man in fuga in the country and jurisdiction from which he is about to flee.

I do not think anything can be made of the second point. In a matter of this kind, where the liberty of the subject is involved, I think the respondent was quite in time in stating his defence.

Nuisance—Interdict—Erection of byre in burgh.—Held that the business of cowkeeping may be so conducted and regulated within burgh as not to be a nuisance.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant interdict against the erection of a byre for twelve cows within burgh—the cowkeeper having come under an undertaking to regulate his business so as in the view of the Court to obviate the possibility of its creating a nuisance to the neighbouring proprietors.

Nuisance—Restriction in feu-contract.—Opinions as to the effect of a stipulation in a feu-contract against the erection upon the feu of any house “for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars.”

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Nuisance.—The Dean of Guild having refused to sanction the erection within burgh of a byre for the accommodation of twelve cows on the ground that it was likely to create a nuisance, on appeal the Court, doubting the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to entertain the question of nuisance, sisted the process to enable the objectors to bring an interdict against the erection of the building in question. This having been done, after proof the interdict was refused, and in respect thereof the Dean of Guild's interlocutor in the other process was recalled, and a remit made to him to proceed with the lining.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians.
M.

JAMES FORREST was proprietor of a house, stable, and garden, known as 11 Jordan Lane, Edinburgh, about a quarter of an acre in extent between Jordan Lane and Nile Grove. Jordan Lane was a cul-de-sac, and contained a number of houses and villas. At the foot of the garden was a wooden shed, in which Forrest kept cows for some time previous to May 1885, when the magistrates refused to renew his licence to do so, on the ground that the premises were unsuitable for cowkeeping.

In December 1885 he presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court for leave to alter or remove the premises in question, and to erect a new byre to accommodate not more than twelve cows, and also a straw and turnip shed adjoining.

The adjoining proprietors in Jordan Lane and in Nile Grove lodged answers objecting to the erection of the byre as a nuisance to the neighbourhood and injurious to health. They further stated,—“The respondents aver that twelve cows travelling up and down the lane when taken to and from pasture will be a constant terror to timid persons living there, besides keeping the roadway in an offensive state, both to sight and smell; the lowing of the beasts night and day, accumulation of manure, and loading and carting away of the same, will altogether completely destroy the amenity and salubrity of the locality. The manure from the eleven cows now on the premises accumulates at the rate of two cart-loads a-week, so that for twelve cows there will be an accumulation of offensive matter to even a greater extent. The petitioner also proposes to enlarge the stable, and erect a boiler and tubs for the boiling and mixing of cows’ meat, both of which will be offensive and a nuisance.” They also founded upon the following condition, both in Forrest’s titles and in their own, binding the feuar “not to erect or allow to be erected on any part of the ground thereby feued any house or houses for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars”; and upon the provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867.*

Manson v.
Forrest.

The petitioner denied the respondents’ averments, and stated that the cows would only travel along the lane twice a-year—when going to pasture in spring, and returning in the beginning of winter—the byres being unoccupied during a part of spring and the whole summer and autumn—and that while the byre was occupied the manure would be removed daily if the Court required it.

The Dean of Guild, on 11th February 1886, found that the keeping of cows by the petitioner had caused a nuisance, and refused the petition.

Forrest appealed to the Court of Session, and argued that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction to entertain a question of nuisance, or at least that he had jurisdiction on such questions only in so far as they were architectural.

The respondents argued that the proposed structure was in contravention of the titles of both parties, and that the Dean of Guild was the proper judge of that question.² Further, he could entertain the question of nuisance.³

Ultimately, on the respondents’ motion, the First Division pronounced an interlocutor sisting the process to allow the objector to apply for an interdict against the erection of the proposed building.

Accordingly Donald Manson and Mrs Ferguson, proprietors of the subjects on either side of Forrest’s property, brought an interdict in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians to have Forrest interdicted from erecting June 14, 1887.

Manson v.
Forrest.

The averments on both sides were a repetition of those set forth in the Dean of Guild Court case.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The subjects belonging to the defender being unsuitable for keeping cows or for the erection of byres for that purpose, and the situation being unsuitable for carrying on the business of cowkeeping, without destroying the amenity of the locality, creating a nuisance, and injuriously affecting the health of the neighbourhood, the pursuers are entitled to interdict as craved. 2. The defender's present premises, or the proposed byres, and the business carried on, or intended to be carried on, are nuisances in the sense of the statute before mentioned. 3. The construction of the proposed byres, and the carrying on of the said trade or business, will be as nuisances contraventions of the feu-right of the ground on which it is proposed to erect the byre, and the pursuers are entitled to object to the same.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—2. . . . Et separatim, In any event the action is premature. 4. The action ought to be dismissed, in respect (1) that the erection of the said proposed buildings is within the defender's rights of property; and (2) that they can be used and enjoyed by the defender without creating a nuisance.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), after proof,* on 25th November

* The petitioners adduced several witnesses, who deponed that the smell of the cows had been very objectionable, and that they had been disturbed by their lowing; that Jordan Lane was very narrow, and that a cab could not turn in it except at two places; that the accumulation of manure in the lane was very unpleasant, that numerous complaints had been made against the respondent, and that he had been twice convicted of nuisance in connection with the place. Dr Russell, one of the magistrates of the city, deponed,—“I do not think it would be a proper thing to erect such premises. I think they would constitute a nuisance. The keeping of straw and turnips, and the boiling of the food for the animals, will always generate a bad smell. The accumulation of manure from twelve cows will be very considerable. There is no other way, so far as I know, of taking the manure from the byre except along Jordan Lane. I think the carrying on of the trade of a cowfeeder at defender's place may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars. (Q.) Will it lower the value of their property? (A.) Probably.” In cross.—“I know the byres throughout the town, or at least a great many of them. . . . I have never examined Mr Reid's byre” (which was also in the Morningside district, with villas near it), “and I know that there have been complaints from the neighbours on account of it. I know that Mr Reid keeps over a hundred cows, and several horses. (Q.) He boils all his cows' and horses' meat on the premises? (A.) I may state that there are a great many conditions of things which we are trying to get rid of. (Q.) Do you consider Mr Reid's byre a nuisance? (A.) I will state generally my opinion, that all byres should be outside the town. There are many things in an unsatisfactory state which we are trying to reform, but we cannot do it all at once.” Dr Littlejohn, medical officer of health for the city, gave evidence to a similar effect.

The defender led evidence that the proposed byre was to be built of brick, and cemented to the height of 7 feet inside, the floors and water-channels to be of concrete, and the troughs of fire-clay. Dr Stevenson Macadam, city analyst, deponed—“Taking into consideration the nature of the proposed buildings and the situation, I think it is a suitable place for keeping cows. . . . I believe it would not be a nuisance to keep cows there. Cross-examined—(Q.) You would not choose a residence yourself next door to a byre? (A.) Not if I could help it.” Professor Walley, Principal of the Royal Veterinary College, Edinburgh, deponed—“(Q.) You don't think that twelve cows being kept there would be a nuisance if they were properly attended to? (A.) Certainly not, in 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the business of cow-keeping, which the defender proposes to carry on at his property in Jordan Lane, cannot be conducted without being a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars: Finds, therefore, that said business falls within the prohibition in the defender's titles, which is quoted on record: Repels the defences: Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the defender from erecting, or allowing to be erected, on any part of the ground belonging to and occupied by him at No. 11 Jordan Lane, Edinburgh, any house or houses or other buildings or erections for the purpose of carrying on the trade or business of cowfeeder or cowkeeper in said ground, and decerns." No. 151.

Mr Forrest appealed, and argued;—The restriction in the petitioners' titles did no more than declare the common law rights of parties. If the word "may" could be read as "may possibly" or "may probably," it would be different, for the clause would then have prevented the erection of any building for the purpose of trade or manufacture. But a byre was not necessarily a nuisance, as a slaughter-house or a house for the boiling of blubber was. But even in the case of declared nuisances, the Court had hesitated to grant an interdict ab ante,—if it was at all possible to take means to obviate the nuisance.¹ But a byre was not a nuisance, so far as decision went, any more than a stable was.

the proper acceptation of the word nuisance, if the manure was to be removed frequently. Cross-examined—There is always a little smell connected with the conducting of a byre, but if the place is properly attended to the smell is not harmful." Professor Williams, Principal of the Veterinary College, Leith Walk, deponed—"I think the place is a very good one for such a byre. I don't think there is any chance of a nuisance being created by the keeping of twelve cows there, if the byre is properly constructed and well kept." William Secular, inspector of markets and byres, deponed—"Assuming that the byre was well conducted, and the manure regularly removed, it would not create a nuisance in my opinion."

* "NOTE.— . . . The pursuers and defender hold the subjects respectively belonging to them under titles which contain an obligation not to erect on the ground belonging to them 'any house or houses for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars.' It appears to the Sheriff that the question to be decided in this case is, has it been proved that the business of cowkeeping, which the defender proposes to carry on in Jordan Lane, could not be conducted without being a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars? The Sheriff is of opinion that this has been proved. In the first place, there is evidence as to the way in which the defender conducted his business while he had only a licence for six cows; and that evidence shews that the byre was not well kept, and that the defender had been twice convicted of nuisance in connection with the place. In the second place, there is evidence to shew that the business of cowkeeping, no matter how well conducted, would, in the locality in question, be a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars. No doubt there is a good deal of conflicting testimony on this point, but the Sheriff concurs with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking that the weight of the evidence is in favour of the pursuers. Dr Stevenson Macadam, who is the leading witness for the defender, when asked if he himself would choose a residence next door to a byre, says, 'Not if I could help it'; and Professor Walley, another witness for the defender, has to admit, on cross-examination, 'that there is always a little smell connected with the conducting of a byre.'

"In the circumstances, the Sheriff thinks that the pursuers are entitled to the interdict which has been granted."

Manson v.
Forrest.

This was the first case in which an interdict had been asked against the erection of buildings, where the nuisance complained of was not among hitherto recognised nuisances. Before an interdict could be granted, the nuisance must be shewn to be inevitable.¹ The Court would not proceed upon the extreme views which were enounced by Drs Littlejohn and Russell in their evidence. Cattle-sheds, cow-houses, and byres were dealt with under the Act 29 Vict. cap. 17 (sec. 3 of which is quoted infra in the Lord President's opinion) as quite legal within burgh, but as requiring supervision and inspection. Under that Act the magistrates had to grant a licence to such places each year, which was an effectual check against their being neglected or mismanaged so as to cause nuisance. Further, the Public Health Act, 1867, secs. 16 and 30, drew a distinction between things which were necessarily nuisances and things which might or might not become so. Under that Act byres were not necessarily nuisances.

As matter of fact there were many byres in the suburbs of Edinburgh and within the burgh. Mr Reid's byre for 100 cows was in the immediate neighbourhood. Where a nuisance existed, and a complaint was made against it by anyone having an interest to complain, it made no difference whether the locality was town or country. What was a nuisance in a town was equally so in the country, if anyone was so near it as to feel it. But in the present case there was no sufficient evidence to support the petitioners' case. The medical witnesses made vague general statements which went too far about offensive smells, injury to health, and loss of amenity, but the Court would not proceed upon these.

The petitioners argued;—The law of nuisance was a branch of the law of good neighbourhood. What amounted to a nuisance was a matter which depended to a large extent on degree and locality.² It was conceded that there was no case where a byre had been held to be a necessary nuisance. But the business of a cowfeeder, although quite unobjectionable in the country, was not so in the town. And the evidence which had been adduced shewed that it would create a nuisance in the present case. The lowing of the cows of itself constituted a nuisance in town. If the common law was not enough to warrant the granting interdict against a possible nuisance,—the words of the title in the present case supplemented what was wanting.³ It was proved that a nuisance—which need not necessarily be injurious to health, although there was evidence in this case that the byre had hitherto interfered with the health of the neighbourhood—had existed in the past, and that it was likely to be aggravated in the future. If there had been a clause in *Swinton v Paddie*⁴ like that here, interdict would have been granted at once. Besides it was to be kept in view that the defender had been previously convicted of nuisance. It was no doubt the case that the existence of byres in town was recognised in the Public Health Act, 1867, and the Cattle Sheds Act, 1866 (29 Vict. cap. 17), but these Acts provided for their regulations on the footing that they were nuisances. They could not be said to legalise them. It had been held that the magistrates' licence did not amount to a legal warrant to commit a nuisance.⁵

Before the close of the discussion, the following minute was put in by the appellant:—" Gillespie, for the appellant, James Forrest, stated that in the event of the said appellant being found entitled to erect a byre as proposed upon his property in Jordan Lane, and to keep cows therein, he undertakes that he will not boil or steam turnips to feed his cows upon the premises in Jordan Lane; that he will remove the manure from the said premises once every day except on Sundays, and that before eight o'clock A.M.; and that the carts which remove the manure shall be loaded within his own property. The appellant further undertakes that the cows belonging to him shall not, unless in exceptional circumstances, pass along Jordan Lane oftener than twice in the year, viz., once in spring, when they go out to pasture, and again towards the beginning of winter on their return from pasture."

Forrest.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The contention of the petitioners in the action for interdict in the inferior Court was that the proposal of the defender to erect buildings of the nature of a byre or cowhouse was illegal, and ought to be prevented. A proof was allowed by the Sheriff-substitute, and a great deal of evidence was led upon both sides. I think the result of the petitioners' evidence amounts very much to this that a cowhouse or byre within a town is necessarily a nuisance, and ought not to be permitted under any circumstances. To affirm such a proposition would certainly be to introduce a novelty into the law, and also into the practice as it obtains in all towns in Scotland where cows are kept within burgh for the use of the inhabitants. This would be a very startling doctrine, which the Court could not adopt without the most serious consideration. But I do not think the case has been pressed to that length, seeing that the pursuers have other contentions of a much more plausible nature, which they have supported upon other grounds.

The pursuers' first argument is founded upon the restriction which is contained in the titles of all the feuars who have appeared. I shall consider this immediately, but, in the first place, I think we must start with this as a general proposition that byres and cowhouses, under proper regulations, are not only lawful in a burgh, but are necessary and expedient. They have been made the subject of legislation in the Act of 1866 (29 Vict. cap. 17), which was passed expressly for the purpose of "regulating the inspection of cattle-sheds and cowhouses and byres within burghs and populous places in Scotland. And the third section of that Act provides:—"The magistrates of royal burghs, and also of parliamentary burghs in Scotland, shall have power to require, and shall require, all cattle-sheds and cowhouses and byres within their burghs to be inspected by an officer appointed by them, and, if found to be suitable for such purpose, to be licensed by them for the period of one year; and the magistrates shall likewise have power from time to time to make rules and regulations for the proper sanitary condition of the same, and to fix and determine in each licence the number of cattle which may be kept in each such cattle-shed, or cowhouse, or byre; and if any person shall keep any cattle within any burgh without such inspection and licence, or shall violate any of the conditions of such licence, or of any of the rules and regulations made by the magistrates, he shall, on conviction before any two of them, be subjected to a penalty not exceeding £5 for each such offence, and a like penalty for every day after the conviction for such offence, upon which such offence is continued." These are very strong provisions, which are very well calculated to prevent all improper, careless, and negligent keeping of such premises. That they are necessary provisions, I can quite believe, but the fact

No. 151. that they exist shews that the practice of cowkeeping in towns is thoroughly recognised, and that towns are not required to look to the country districts for their supply of milk. Not only is cowkeeping not necessarily a nuisance, but the practice is at least a matter of convenience, if not of necessity, and is rather to be encouraged than the reverse. Of course, if it becomes a nuisance, it can be interdicted. The mere fact that the business is quite a legitimate one does not prevent its being put a stop to, if it is conducted in an improper fashion, and it is in the power of anyone to apply to have it interdicted.

June 14, 1887.
Manson v.
Forrest.

But apart from these considerations the petitioners found upon the condition which is contained in the titles of all the feuars under which they were taken bound "not to erect or allow to be erected on any part of the ground thereby feued any house or houses for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars." Mr Jameson has construed this provision as meaning that it is absolutely illegal to erect a building for the purpose of carrying on any trade which under any circumstance may come to be a nuisance, i.e. which, if carried on in an improper manner, may become a nuisance. For my part, I am not disposed to construe a restriction on the use of property in an extensive or liberal way, and I do not think the fair meaning of this provision is that which is contended for. I think the fair meaning is that no house or houses shall be erected which are likely to become, or under ordinary circumstances would become, a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars. If it were to be construed literally, it would mean that no houses were to be erected where any trade or business might be carried on, which, although in the ordinary case innocuous and harmless, may be so conducted as to create a nuisance. It would therefore come to this that the carrying on a trade of any kind would be prohibited. If this had been what was intended, I think the restriction should have been differently worded, and should have in terms prevented the erection of all buildings except dwelling-houses only. But I am of opinion that the clause as it stands does not extend the rights of the feuars further, or at least much further, than the common law does.

It is said that the respondent has kept a dairy before now, and that he appeared in a bad light at that time, and there appears to be some ground for this. At all events, I take it for granted that this was so. But if this proposed building is allowed, and a cowhouse is put up, he will be subject to the provisions of the Act of 29 Vict. cap. 17, and of the subsequent Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), which contains a great many very important provisions for the suppression of nuisances.

Further, a minute has been lodged by the appellant, which I think very much alters the complexion of the case. It must be kept in view that the action is brought not for the purpose of suppressing an existing nuisance, but for the purpose of interrupting the progress of a building, and it will depend upon the use to which the building is afterwards put in carrying on the business whether it can be interfered with. At present, all is speculation in regard to the future conduct of the business. In the minute the appellant undertakes that he will not boil or steam turnips on the premises, that he will remove the manure once a-day, and that the carts which remove it shall be loaded within his own property, that his cows shall not pass along Jordan Lane oftener than twice a-year, once in spring when they go out to pasture, and once in the beginning of winter when they return to the byre. It rather appears to me that if this undertaking is fairly fulfilled, a great deal will have been done to prevent the possibility of the byre being converted into a nuisance. The particulars which are enumerated in the minute, and which it is said will be avoided, are just the particulars which are founded on by the petitioners as constituting the nuisance. I think the appellant has made a very fair offer, and it would be a strong thing to prevent him from beginning his business in the face of this undertaking. But, having made this offer, if he violates it, and recourse is had to the Court, it is very clear that we should be obliged to see that its terms have been strictly fulfilled, and complied with.

Manson v.

Forrest.

I should propose to your Lordships to recall the interlocutors of the Sheriffs, and to embody the appellant's undertaking in our judgment, so as to shew the conditions upon which he has been allowed to proceed with the erection of the building.

LORD MURE.—The Sheriffs have here granted interdict substantially in terms of the prayer of the petition,—the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, to which the Sheriff has adhered, being that “the business of cowkeeping, which the defender proposes to carry on at his property in Jordan Lane, cannot be conducted without being a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars.” If I thought that this was clearly established, I should have been disposed to take the same course as that which has been followed by the Sheriffs. But I cannot adopt that view of the evidence. For it appears to me that there is a good deal of contradiction on the part of the witnesses who have been examined, and that there is evidence of weight leading to a different conclusion from that at which the Sheriffs have arrived. That evidence amounts to a clear expression of opinion on the part of men thoroughly competent to judge, that the business of a cowfeeder may be carried on without creating a nuisance in the neighbourhood. Having regard to these opinions, and to the terms of the minute which has now been put in by the appellant, I am satisfied that the course which your Lordship has proposed is the one which ought at present to be adopted, and that the interdict may be recalled until it is seen whether a business conducted in the manner undertaken by the appellant can be carried on without creating a nuisance.

LORD SHAND.—I have come to the same conclusion, seeing that the appellant has now given the undertaking to which your Lordship has referred. The case with which the Court has usually to deal is an application to interdict an existing nuisance,—where a work or manufacture is being carried on so as to produce an offensive smell or other unpleasant or injurious consequences amounting to a nuisance, or where a business is being actually engaged in causing a nuisance. But in the present instance the application is to interdict buildings which are being erected for the subsequent conduct of a business.

If the question had arisen in this state of circumstances as one of common law, irrespective of title, I should have had very great difficulty in entertaining it. I do not say there would have been difficulty if it were quite clear that the buildings when built and in use would certainly produce a nuisance. But in such a case as the present, where I think I may safely say that everything depends upon the mode upon which the business is conducted, I should have had great difficulty in interfering with the erection of buildings by an interdict.

The petitioners have, however, founded upon the terms of their titles, and I think these make the case to some extent a special one. The titles prohibit even the erection of buildings for carrying on a trade which may cause a nuisance, and if the buildings were of that character, and there were no undertaking so to carry on the business as to prevent this, I am disposed to think the complainers would have been entitled to an interdict. The special undertaking by the defenders, however, makes all the difference, for if that be carried out I am satisfied that the business so carried on would not be a nuisance.

The question of nuisance is to a great extent one of circumstances and of neighbourhood, and I agree with your Lordship that it is impossible to say that byres within burgh are in all circumstances a nuisance. The Legislature recognises their existence within burgh as reasonable and usual. It is no doubt the case that no one is entitled so to use his own property as to materially injure the health or materially affect or diminish the comfort of his neighbours, as, e.g., by the storing of offensive materials, or the carrying on of a business causing offensive smells or deleterious gases. And when this is done the act complained of will be put a stop to. The result of the evidence which has been led in this case is that the boiling of the cows' food, the carting of manure, and the frequent passing of the cattle through the narrow lane in question, looking to the character of the houses adjoining the lane, would, I think, have created a nuisance. But the defender has come under an undertaking that none of these things shall be done in future. A byre will be built, in which twelve cows will be accommodated, but the neighbours will know little about them beyond the fact that they are there. I cannot say that under these circumstances the building will constitute a nuisance which can be put down either at common law or under the statute. It will be a different matter if the undertaking is not honestly or fairly implemented, and it will then be for those interested to make application to the Sheriff for the necessary protection.

LORD ADAM.—If parties had been relying upon their common law rights only I should not have had much difficulty in refusing the petition for interdict, because before granting an interdict ab ante in a matter like the present, I should have needed to be satisfied that the business could not be conducted without its necessarily creating a nuisance. In that case, I think the respondent should have been allowed an opportunity of starting his business, and of shewing how he would conduct it; and in the event of his doing so, so as to create a nuisance, the feuars might then have applied for interdict.

But the respondents also found upon the clause of restriction which is contained in their titles. I think it is impossible to give a literal meaning to the words which are found there, "which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars"; and I agree with Lord Shand that they may possibly confer more than the common law rights of parties. If, for example, it had been proposed to carry on any trade or manufacture which in the ordinary mode of conducting it would have had the result of creating a nuisance, I think it might possibly have been interdicted; but I do not think it necessary to decide that now.

If we were to decide the case against the appellant, there would be an end of the matter. But if, with all the care which can be given to the conduct of the business, which will now be carried on in terms of the appellant's undertaking, the respondents should still find they have a grievance, it will be open to them to come to the Court and apply for a remedy. This appears to me to do away with any objection which can be urged against the course which we are now to take.

THE COURT pronounced these interlocutors:—

I. In the interdict case: "Find that the building proposed to be erected by the appellant on his property in Jordan Lane, Edinburgh, is intended to be used as a byre or cowhouse: Find that:

the respondents have failed to prove that the carrying on the business of cowkeeping in the proposed building will necessarily be a nuisance: Find that the said business, if conducted properly, and under proper conditions, will not be a nuisance: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 25th November, and of the Sheriff, dated 31st December 1886, and in respect of the undertaking of the appellant contained in the minute for him, No. 26 of process, refuse the prayer for interdict: Find no expenses due to or by either party, and decern," &c.

Fraser v. Bell.

Reparation—Dangerous animal—Dog—Consequential damages.—A porter brought an action against the occupier of a house at which he had been delivering coals, alleging that he had received injuries through the occupier's dog leaping upon another porter who was working along with the pursuer, and causing him to drop a piece of coal on the pursuer's foot; and further that the dog was known by its owner to be of vicious and ferocious habits. Held that the action was relevant.

JOHN FRASER, a coal-porter in the employment of coal-merchants in Edinburgh, brought an action against James Adam Bell, residing in Lauder Road, Edinburgh, to recover £100 as damages for an injury alleged to have happened to him through the defender's fault.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff-substitute of Midlothian.
I.

The pursuer stated that on 24th March 1887 he was in the course of his employment engaged, along with a fellow-servant, in conveying a quantity of coals to the defender's house and delivering them there; that the coals were in large lumps, which he and his fellow-servant had to carry from the cart into the cellar of the defender's house. "While the pursuer's fellow-servant was in the course of doing so the pursuer himself had necessarily occasion to stand beside him, to assist and relieve him at the cellar of large and heavy pieces of coal which were on the back of the pursuer's fellow-servant. When that was being done a large dog belonging to the defender suddenly rushed out of the defender's house and sprang upon and attempted to bite the face of the pursuer's fellow-servant, who, in consequence, was suddenly and irresistibly compelled to drop the burden of coals which he was holding on his back, and the coal fell and seriously crushed and fractured one of the pursuer's feet. The pursuer and his fellow-servant did nothing to provoke the dog on the occasion."

He further alleged that he had suffered great pain and loss, that the injury arose from the culpable neglect of the defender, or of his servants, or others there for whom he was responsible. (Cond. 3) " . . . The dog referred to, by its ferocious and sudden attack on the pursuer's fellow-servant as before stated, was the direct occasion of the pursuer's injury. It is believed and averred that the dog was of vicious and ferocious

No. 152. habits. The defender knew that fact, and that it was dangerous for strangers like the pursuer to pass near to it on his (defender's) premises. On occasions before the said accident the defender and others of his household had to take means to control it when attempting to jump on and alarmingly attack persons in a similar manner. On the occasion when the pursuer was injured as aforesaid, the dog had immediately before shewn to the defender's servants in the house a vicious and ferocious inclination to rush out of the house and attack the pursuer and his fellow-servant while discharging the duty which they were engaged at on the premises. The defender knew that the pursuer had to convey the coals into his house on the date referred to. He also, knowing the dangerous character and habits of the dog, should have taken precautions by way of chaining up the dog while the pursuer was lawfully on the premises, or to have taken some similar precaution to prevent the dog getting out of the house at the time the pursuer and his fellow-servant were at the place for the purpose stated on the occasion referred to. The defender, however, culpably and recklessly failed to adopt precautions of any kind, or to give the pursuer any warning of the danger which existed from the presence of such a dog on the premises."

June 14, 1887.
Fraser v. Bell.

The defender denied liability, attributing the injury to the fault of the pursuer's fellow-servant or to accident. He averred that the dog was quiet and domesticated, though sometimes frolicsome.

He pleaded;—The pursuer's averments are not relevant and sufficient to support the prayer of the petition.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) sustained this plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—The cause of injury was the act of the dog in leaping at the pursuer's fellow-porter, and so causing him to drop the lump of coal on the pursuer. The case was as if one had wrongfully pushed another, and he had come against a third person and injured him. The action would lie against the person who gave the original push.¹

There was sufficient averment of ferocity on the dog's part, and of the defender's knowledge of that. It was sufficient to aver that the dog was ferocious, and that the defender knew it. It was not necessary to go on to state individual instances in which the dog had bitten individuals before.² In any view, even if it were not such a dog as required always to be chained, it was negligence not to chain it on this particular occasion when the pursuer was working about the house, and the dog had been, as he alleged, trying to get at him to bite him.

Argued for the defender;—It was clear from the pursuer's statements that he had been hurt in consequence of an innocent gambol of the dog. Against the dog's character there was no relevant statement, because there was no specification of particulars from which vice might be inferred. If a dog were known to be vicious, the owner must, no doubt, restrain it at all hazard. That was all that was decided in Burton v. Moorhead.² Again, if a dog, though not vicious, were known to be mischievous—e.g., to have a habit of poaching—there might be an action against the owner if he allowed him to indulge in his troublesome pro-

* "NOTE.—In the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, the pursuer's statement shews that the occurrence through which he met with the injury libelled was purely accidental, and not one for which the defender can be held responsible."

pensity and harm resulted.¹ But there was a third case, that in hand, of a dog which was frolicsome but not vicious. It was not a duty to chain up such a dog, or to restrain it in any way from going about. It was lawful to have it going about the premises unless it were fierce, and there was no sufficient statement that it was. It was an accident without fault.²

Fraser v. Bell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion on the whole that this case, which is a somewhat peculiar one, ought to be sent to proof. I am not prepared to throw it out on the ground that it is not relevant.

It seems that the pursuer was, along with another man, engaged in putting coals into the defender's cellar. This dog, which we are told is a collie dog, was on the premises, and it is said by the pursuer, in the first place, that it is ferocious, and in the second place, that for some time before the accident which occurred on the day in question it had shewn a disposition to assail these two men, and that that was what the dog ultimately did. Whether or not it was to do them any injury that the dog did act so, we cannot say; but the result of what it did was that it alarmed one of the men, who dropped a piece of coal on his companion's foot. That is the whole case as it now stands, and the result of the inquiry which must take place will depend on how far the allegations—somewhat strong allegations—which are made in condescendence 3 are supported by the proof. I think, as I have said, that the case must go to proof.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. The case is peculiar; it is not clear whether the dog flew out to bite the pursuer and his companion or not, but it is said that it caused alarm on the part of the pursuer's companion, with the consequence that a piece of coal was dropped upon the pursuer's foot. If the defender was in fault in not restraining the dog, it seems to me plain, and I did not understand it to be disputed, that, though the sufferer was not the person on whom the dog leaped, still the pursuer may recover, because the dog was the cause of the piece of coal being dropped or thrown from the man's back.

It is contended, however, on the part of the defender, that there is no relevant allegation as to the character of the dog, that though it is said to be ferocious—and illustrations of that are given in article 3 of the condescendence—still, without specification of particulars as to its alleged vicious character, enough has not been stated. I think, however, on the contrary, that enough has been stated, and I am the more persuaded of this because I think the pursuer will not succeed in his action unless he proves knowledge of the dog's vicious or mischievous character. If that is not proved the action will fail. I agree that the action must be sent to proof.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is relevantly stated that the dog was ferocious, and that the defender knew it. That being so, the action is relevant. If the pursuer requires to prove ferocity, and the defender's knowledge of it, I think he had better consider whether he should go further—whether, in fact, he can possibly succeed.

Reparation—Carriage—Child—Contributory negligence.—Two children, aged three and five, who were crossing a crowded city street, unattended by any person in charge of them, were knocked down and injured by a passing vehicle. In an action by their father for reparation, it was proved that the driver was to blame. Held that it was not a good defence that the pursuer had contributed to the accident by allowing such young children to be in a place of danger without someone in charge of them.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Master's liability for servant's fault.—A shopkeeper instructed his salesman to remove certain articles from one of his shops to another. The salesman borrowed a van from a friend, who came with it to drive it, and the articles were placed on it with the shopkeeper's knowledge and assent. While the van was passing through the streets the salesman assumed the reins because his friend had become intoxicated, and owing to his careless driving an accident occurred. Held (diss. Lord Craighill) that the shopkeeper was not responsible for the consequences of the accident, because the salesman was acting outwith his duty in undertaking to drive the van.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ROBERT MARTIN, boltmaker, Glasgow, brought this action against George Ward senior, wine and spirit merchant there, George Ward junior, his son, and Newton & Blair, plumbers and gasfitters there, to recover £500, as damages for injury done to his two pupil children, Robert and William Martin (whose ages were five and three years respectively), through the fault, as was alleged, of the defenders.

George Ward senior had a spirit-shop at Partick, and another at Parkhead, Glasgow. George Ward junior was a servant in one of his father's shops. It was admitted that the pursuer's children were knocked down and injured, the elder severely, on the afternoon of 24th March 1887, in Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow, by a van driven by George Ward junior. The accident occurred at a point near its junction with Sharp's Lane, in which the pursuer lived, while the children were crossing Main Street towards North Street. The pursuer averred that the accident occurred through the fault of George Ward junior, or some other person in the van who had charge of it at the time, in the course of George Ward senior's business as a spirit-merchant; that the driver was intoxicated, and the van being driven recklessly and furiously, and without any proper lookout being kept.

The defenders denied these averments. It appeared from the proof that George Ward senior being desirous of having a number of bottles removed from his Partick shop to his Parkhead shop, had told his son George Ward junior to get them removed. He had given no instructions to have a van procured for the purpose, and deposed in this action that he had expected a barrow to be used. George Ward junior, however, went to the shop of Newton & Blair, who were plumbers at Parkhead, and had been doing plumber work for the Wards, and were on friendly terms with them, and arranged with them for the use of their van gratuitously for the purpose of removing the bottles. George Newton himself, one of the partners of Newton & Blair, accompanied him, and drove to Partick. A brother of Newton was also in the van. At Partick they went into Ward senior's shop, and George Newton was treated by Ward senior to drink. A man named Priestly joined them there, and he also had some drink. Newton and Priestly became the worse of drink, but the younger Ward and the other Newton did not. The bottles were placed in the van with the knowledge and assent of George Ward senior, and the van again started for Parkhead containing the Newtons, George Ward junior, and Priestly, George Newton again driving. After they had got some distance on the way George Ward junior took the reins, for the reason, as explained by him, that George Newton was driving unsteadily, and that he thought it would be safer. As he was driving through Main Street, Anderston, between four and five in the afternoon, the accident occurred. It was proved that the horse was proceeding quickly at the time, but not that the pace was furious. A number of witnesses who had been on the street at the time and had seen the accident gave evidence to the effect that the van was being driven carelessly, and that care was not being taken. On the other hand, George Ward junior and the other men in the van deponed that the pace was moderate, and the driving careful. They attributed the accident to the children having come out from behind a tramway-car which was passing at the time, and having been run over before George Ward junior, with every effort he could make, could pull up the horse. The bystanders, however, gave evidence that though a car had passed shortly before there was no car in the way at the time. The defenders did not call any witness who was on the car which they alleged had obstructed the view of the children from the van. The result of the accident was that both children were injured.

June 15, 1887.
Martin v.
Wards.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) found that "culpa is not proved against the driver, George Ward [junior]: Finds, separatim, that even had culpa been proved there was such contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer or of his wife in allowing such young children to be at such a period of the day in such a busy thoroughfare without some person to look after them to bar any claim of damages otherwise competent; therefore sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders, but finds no expenses due."*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) adhered, on the ground that fault had not been proved against the driver.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—It had been proved that the van was being recklessly driven, and that no tramway-car obstructed the view of the driver. Such young children could not be said to be guilty of contributory negligence. At all events, there was no negligence in their being on the street or in crossing. Greer's case shewed that there was no rule of law that a father or other guardian must have someone taking charge of a child if he allowed it to go out on the street.¹ The children were lawfully there, and it was for the driver to take reasonable care to avoid running down children. That was just one of his ordinary duties. Assuming such children to be capable of being guilty of contributory negligence, none had been proved.

Argued for the defenders George Ward senior and George Ward junior;—It was not proved that the driving of the van was reckless, and it was proved that, as the Sheriffs had held, a car obstructed his view. Even if the driving of George Ward junior were held to have been careless, the conduct of the children, and of their father in allowing them to be where they were, was contributory negligence. The carelessness of the children themselves lay in crossing the street without sufficient care when the tram-car was passing, that of the father in allowing such young children to be in a place of danger without proper precautions for their safety.¹ The case of Greer, quoted on the other side, was not in point, because there the parents of the injured child had no reason to believe that the child had wandered to a place of danger. Here, as in Morran v. Waddell, it was proved that the parents knew the children were in the habit of wandering along the streets. In any view, George Ward senior could not be held liable, as he was not in the van, nor had he any control of it. The utmost that could be said was that he knew it was being used by his son.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating his opinion that the driver ought to have seen the children, and that the defenders had failed to prove that the driver's view had been obstructed by a tramway-car, from behind which they had emerged)—I do not think that this was a case of contributory negligence at all. The children were entitled to be on the streets, and it is impossible to lay it down as a rule that every young child out upon the public streets must always have some person with him to look after him. Every driver knows that it is part of his duty—often the most agitating and difficult part of it—to avoid running over children on the streets, and experience shews that with ordinary care that can be done. I know of no case in which a child has been run over on a public thoroughfare in which a defence has been successfully stated that the child had no business to be there, and to get in the way of the vehicle. The cases quoted to us of a child allowed to stray on a canal bank or near a railway crossing are different, for these are examples of places whither the child ought not to be allowed to go. We have had occasion more than once lately to find that it is the duty of a driver to avoid injury to persons walking on the roadway. Therefore I am of opinion that there is here no place for a plea of contributory negligence. I am for altering the judgment, and finding the defenders liable.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

Young, for the defender George Ward senior, then submitted that he could not be held liable for the fault in the driving of the van. His son was indeed his servant, but only to sell in his shop, and had no employment to drive. The proper driver, indeed, was present, and George Ward junior only took the reins to avoid an accident. It was no ground of liability that the bottles in the cart were the property of George Ward senior, nor that he knew of the van being borrowed to convey them. All the orders he had given were to remove them, and the borrowing a van was his son's doing altogether. He was no more liable than if his son had been removing the goods in a cab and an accident had occurred.

The pursuer argued;—George Ward senior was liable because his work was with his knowledge being done at the time of the accident by his son and servant George Ward junior. It was true the latter was usually engaged in the duties of a salesman, but at the time in question he had been entrusted with other work, and his father had perfect knowledge of and had approved his mode of doing it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The point which we have now to consider is the No. 153.
 most obscure and delicate in the case, viz., whether George Ward senior is liable for the consequences of the accident. The van was not his. It belonged to June 15, 1887.
 Newton & Blair. But it is said on the part of the pursuer that he is responsible Martin v.
 for the accident, because the van was at the time being employed in his business, Wards.
 in other words that he was the hirer and user of the van when the accident occurred.

It is certain that Ward senior had occasion to remove articles from his shop at Partick to his shop at Parkhead. These articles were bottles, and owing to their number some vehicle was required. Ward thought a barrow would be sufficient, but he entrusted the removal to his son, and he found that the son had got a van from Newton & Blair. He saw the goods put upon the van and sent away, but the van was then in charge of Newton, the owner of the van. It did not occur to Ward senior that his son had anything to do with the driving of the van; on the contrary, he considered that his son had employed Newton & Blair to remove the bottles by means of their van from the one shop to the other.

If Ward senior had hired a van and the services of a vanman to remove bottles, and if in the course of doing so the vanman had run down a person on the street and injured him, I do not think that Ward would have been responsible. He would not have been in anyway to blame for the accident. I think that that was his true position. He allowed his son to take the use of the van when under the charge of the owner of the van. In other words, he allowed his son to employ Newton & Blair to remove the bottles in their van. He never understood or agreed that his son was to drive. It is of no moment whether Newton & Blair undertook to perform the work gratuitously, or for hire. In either case they undertook to perform it, and Ward senior agreed to nothing else.

No doubt Ward junior came in the end to be the driver, and was the driver at the time of the accident. But the reason was that the person who ought to have been driving had become drunk. In consequence, Ward junior seems to have thought it best to take the reins, and perhaps he was right enough to do so. But I do not think that that makes Ward senior liable for the driving of the van. The son is the father's servant, but only in the shop. He was not his father's servant when driving the van, for he had no authority from his father to drive it. He was then acting for Newton in consequence of Newton's incapacity.

I think, therefore, that we ought to assoilzie Ward senior. But I feel bound again to say that it is very unfortunate that this point was not stated till the very close of the debate, and that I come to this result not without misgiving.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I confess that my impression was different, and that even now that impression is not removed. I am inclined to think that Ward senior is liable. There is no doubt that the van was being used for the purposes of his business, and that a person engaged in his business obtained it. It is true that Newton went also with the van, but not on his own concerns, but in the service of Ward and for his purposes. If there had been no knowledge by Ward that the van was employed on his business, then Ward would not be liable, but he had knowledge of it and had left to the son's discretion the arrangements as to the removal. It is said that a van was not to be got, but a barrow. But the

No. 153. son obtained a van and not a barrow, and the father when the van came made no objection to it, and the question is whether, seeing what he did, he must not be taken as content to take things as they might turn up without making any inquiry. I incline to think Ward liable because the van was given for his benefit, with his knowledge, and he did not repudiate what his son had done. But while that is the inclination of my opinion, I understand that the judgment will be as Lord Rutherford Clark has suggested.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, Find in fact (1) that on the occasion referred to in the record Robert and William Martin, children of the pursuer, aged respectively five and three years, when crossing Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow, were knocked down and run over by a horse and van, whereby the elder of the two was severely hurt, three of his ribs having been broken, and his chest crushed, while the younger was injured in his right arm; (2) that the horse and van were the property of the defenders Newton & Blair, and had been lent by them to the defender George Ward junior for the purpose of carrying certain articles belonging to his father, George Ward senior, from his shop in Partick to Parkhead; (3) that on leaving the said shop the van was driven by the defender George Newton, but afterwards, and when the accident happened, by the defender George Ward junior; (4) that it was then proceeding rapidly, and the children were injured as aforesaid by the fault and negligence of the defenders George Newton and George Ward junior, in failing to pull up the van on coming in sight of them; (5) that it is not proved that the said defenders were prevented from seeing the children by the intervention of a tramway car: Find in law that the defenders George Ward junior and Newton & Blair are liable to the pursuer in damages for the injuries sustained by his children as aforesaid: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against; assess the damages due to the pursuer at £150 sterling; ordain the defenders the said George Ward junior and Newton & Blair to make payment of that sum to the pursuer; find them liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in the inferior Court and in this Court; remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report; assoilzie the defender George Ward senior from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

Reparation—Slander—Company—Interdict.—Where the officials of a company had prepared and published, but without the authority, knowledge, or assent of the directors, a libellous circular concerning another company, and the latter company asked for interdict against the former circulating the document in question, the Court found that the publication and circulation by the officials of the defenders' company having been allowed to continue after the action was raised and the facts were brought to the knowledge of the directors, the pursuers were entitled to interdict. No. 154.

THE BRITISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE AND LOAN COMPANY, LIMITED, brought an action against the Pearl Life Assurance Company and their Dundee superintendent, Mr Dewars, to have the defenders interdicted from printing, publishing, or circulating certain handbills containing representations of a nature calculated to injuriously affect the pursuers' business, and from otherwise interfering with it by influencing persons assuring with the pursuers to transfer their policies to the defenders or otherwise. Ultimately the only handbill founded on was one entitled "Scandalous Revelations," which represented the pursuers as conducting their business in a scandalous and improper way, as having defrauded a woman who was insured with them by paying her 40s. instead of £20, and of having withheld payment of moneys legally due under their policies.

In answer the defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The proceedings alleged against the defenders' company being ultra vires of the officials of the said company, the said action is incompetent against the defenders as a limited company incorporated under the Companies Acts. (3) The allegations of the pursuers are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to warrant the prayer of the petition.

On 29th March 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) found the pursuers' allegations relevant to sustain the claim of damages, but not the interdict.

On appeal the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson) recalled his substitute's interlocutor, and found there were no relevant or sufficient statements on record to support the conclusion for damages, and in regard to the conclusion for interdict, he allowed both parties a proof.

The defenders having appealed to the Court of Session, the pursuers stated at the hearing that they now insisted upon the conclusion for interdict alone, and having been allowed to amend their record to the effect of specifying with more detail the method of circulation and its injurious effects, the Court, on 26th June 1886, remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith), after proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the handbill entitled 'Scandalous Revelations' was prepared and printed in Dundee, and extensively published in and about Dundee by officials of the defenders' company, including the district superintendent, John Dewars, who is called as a defender; but finds that the preparation and uttering of the said slanderous document was not directly effected by the Pearl Insurance Company, or expressly authorised by them, or carried out with their knowledge or assent: Further, finds that the composition and printing of said handbill was executed on the employment of one or more officials of the defenders' company, and that the uttering of it was effected by canvassers and other officials of said company, including the defender Dewars, on purpose to improve its business through inflicting injury on pursuers' business: Further, finds in fact that the defenders, as a company, authorised (1) canvassing and transference of the contributors of the British Legal; (2) canvassing by means of handbills, though not of the handbill complained of; and (3) that the defenders' business derived benefit from said conduct of the officials: Finds in law that the defender Dewars is liable to answer as an individual for the utterance of said handbill, and further, that the defenders are liable for the illegal acts of their officials in respect that they acted in the defenders' interest and within the scope of their implied mandate: There-

* "NOTE.—The main question arising on the proof is whether the corporate defenders fabricated and uttered the said handbill entitled 'Scandalous Revelations,' either directly or by agents for whom they are responsible.

"The pursuers in their minute of amendment, No. 268, aver direct authorship and uttering by the defenders and the defender Dewars 'acting on their express instructions.' If this averment be essential to the pursuers' case, then I cannot help thinking that they have failed in the proof except as against the defender Dewars acting according to his own instructions and devices.

"There is no proof whatever that any direct or leading official of the defenders' company composed this handbill, or uttered it, or knew of its existence until the raising of this action had forced it upon their attention. Two representatives of the defenders from London, Mr P. J. Foley and James Roll—the former managing director, the other an ordinary director who appears to take special interest in the Scotch department of the business—both swear that they had nothing to do with the publication of this bill. A minute of directors is the proper evidence of a resolution binding a large company, but of the pursuers' allegations there is neither written nor oral evidence. But although a company may not be the direct authors of a legal wrong—the express instructors to print and publish slander—they may be the indirect, but nevertheless responsible, authors, because of the acts of their agents or servants. An agent can bind his principal within the limits of his mandate, a servant within the scope of his employment. . . . Here what the defenders gave their servants to do was canvassing—that is, puffing their own company, disparaging rivals, and, when possible, 'transferring' to themselves the contributories of rivals with all their obligations, but no part of the premiums they had been paying, it may be for years. They taught their servants by precept and example to canvass by means of handbills, the gist of the handbills being the disparagement of rivals. The servants were imitative rather than intelligent, and the zeal with which they set about doing their masters' work in their masters' own way has carried them over the bounds permitted by the law of libel. If a master enlists the zeal of a servant for purposes of aggression or aggressive business competition, and if he has not selected a servant with the proper knowledge or discretion, or has not instructed him sufficiently, and if the uninstructed zeal serves the master's ends, why should he not be responsible?

"There are, in my opinion, four material elements of fact established against the defenders. First, They authorised an attack to be made upon the business of the pursuers' company by directing or encouraging their canvassers to persuade the contributories of the pursuers' company to desert the pursuers and go over to the defenders. Second, They prepared and printed handbills in London, and placed them in the hands of their canvassers for distribution in Dundee, thus by implication authorising this mode of canvassing by handbills as a mode fit to be adopted and used by their canvassers. Third, Their canvassers and collectors being so led to believe that canvassing by handbill was within the sphere of their mandate, prepared, printed, and uttered handbills, and, inter alia, the slanderous handbill complained of. Fourth, That said bill was an effective although illegal instrument for canvassing purposes, and was used to the benefit of the defenders and to the prejudice of the pursuers.

"Now, are these elements of fact in their combination sufficient to involve the defenders as a company in liability? The difficulty lies in the fact rather than in the law, and it lurks in the uncertainty that is left to exist about the exact scope of the employment given to the defenders' servants. They for certain thought they were doing well both for themselves and for their masters when they were using this offensive handbill. It is asserted that the master is not liable for the servant's crime, and generally speaking he is not, because crime is for the most part personal. But the railway company is often liable for the

The Pearl Company appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;— In England, before the recent legislation, a libel was established in the common law Courts by the verdict of a jury.¹ Now that law and equity were fused, the English Courts no longer experienced a difficulty in granting injunctions. But while they were competent, they were unusual, and the Court only granted them in very exceptional circumstances, and, as a matter of statutory duty, under the Judicature Act. Here an interdict was the only remedy now sought, and it would be the first time that the Scottish Courts had granted interdict in such circumstances. But it was sought against a corporation in respect of the issue of the bill by their officers, for whom they were said to be responsible. But a corporation could only act through its agents, and as its constitution certainly did not confer power upon the directors or upon its inferior officers to commit criminal or quasi-criminal acts, the only redress open to the pursuers was to have repetition of the profits, i.e., by way of damages.² But damages were not now sought. And further, a corporation was only liable even then in so far as they had taken benefit. Further, there was no example of an interdict being granted against a corporation on account of the malice of its officials. The proper course was to interdict the wrongdoers. The case against Mr Dewars was special, but he had acted under great provocation, and the action against him should be dismissed, with expenses to neither party.

The British Legal Company, the respondents, argued;—It was enough for their case if they could shew upon the evidence that the libel had been kept in circulation after the action was raised, the directors of the corporation taking no steps to stop it. This was clearly proved. A principal would not escape merely because he did not know of the action of his subordinates—if only he took benefit from the wrongous act, and if it was done within the scope of the employment.³ The benefit in this case was seen in the increased membership of the appellants' company, owing to the measures which were taken to withdraw members from the respondents' company. In these circumstances interdict was a compe-railway servant's culpable homicide; and the master is often liable for the offence of the servant against laws applicable to the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquor. The legal quality of the servant's wrong scarcely affords any available test of the master's liability. The true test lies in what the servant was employed to do; if he does it right, all well for his master; if he does it ill, and to the injury of some extraneous person, his master is liable for his wrong-doing, just as much as if he had done it himself.

“Had I been left to give untrammelled effect to my own judgment, I should have held that the right conclusion to come to would be to give the pursuers one shilling of damages, and modified expenses. But the pursuers, by their skill in pleading and in refraining from pleading, have for this cause apparently established the proposition in law that, though the circulation of the slander of which they complain may be stopped by interdict, it affords no just ground for entitling them to claim damages. The only remedy I can give them is interdict, and that I must do, though I have not the least idea how they can apply it, except as against Dewars. . . .”

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After going over the evidence, and coming to the conclusion that it was proved that the circulation of the pamphlet entitled “Scandalous Revelations” had gone on after the present action had been raised, and consequently after the matter had been brought to the knowledge of the directors]—That being so, I am of opinion that this interdict should go out against the company just as it has against Mr Dewars, because although it may be very true that when a company comes forward and denies any participation in the acts of their agents which are complained of as libellous, they cannot be held responsible therefor,—yet if when a libel is complained of and brought fairly under their notice by legal proceedings, they do not take instant and very energetic steps to put a stop to the evil complained of, they subject themselves to a liability to be interdicted and to be held responsible for anything that may happen afterwards.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—“ Find that the handbill entitled ‘ Scandalous Revelations ’ was prepared and printed in Dundee, and was, in the months of November and December 1885, extensively published in and about Dundee by officials of the defenders’ company, including the district superintendent, who is called as a defender; but find that the preparation and uttering of the said slanderous document before the present action was raised was not directly effected by the defenders’ company, or expressly authorised by them, or carried out with their knowledge or assent; but find that since the present action was raised, and the facts above found were brought to the knowledge of the directors of the defenders’ company, the said handbill continued to be published and circulated in Dundee and its neighbourhood by the officials of the defenders’ company, and that such continued publication was caused by the negligence of the said company and its directors in not sufficiently superintending and controlling their officials in and about Dundee, and preventing them from continuing said publication: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in this Court,” &c.

ROBERT ROBERTSON, Petitioner (Appellant).—Darling—Watt.
MOSES THOMAS (Burgh Surveyor of Govanhill), Respondent.—C. S. Dickson—Law.

Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Nuisance.—The surveyor of a burgh objected to warrant being granted by the Dean of Guild Court for the increase of certain stabling accommodation belonging to a carriage-hirer, on the ground that the buildings proposed to be enlarged were in the middle of a square of buildings densely populated, and that the smell and noise from them would constitute a nuisance, and that the danger of fire in the district would be increased by them. The Dean of Guild having allowed a proof as to these objections, the petitioner appealed, and maintained that they related only to the use of the proposed building and to alleged nuisance, which were beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. The Court (disc. Lord Rutherford Clark) refused the appeal on the ground that it was expedient that the facts should be ascertained before determining whether the questions raised by the objections fell within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild.

Robertson v.
Thomas.

ROBERT ROBERTSON, carriage-hirer, Govanhill, and proprietor of certain 2^d Division. stables there, presented a petition to the Magistrates of the Burgh of Govanhill, as having the jurisdiction within that burgh which any Dean of Guild of a royal burgh has therein, for warrant to execute certain Guild Court. alterations thereon. I.

The petition was served on the neighbouring proprietors, who lodged no answers, and on Moses Thomas, the burgh surveyor.

The burgh surveyor objected to the proposed buildings on the following grounds:—(1) That the proposed buildings would cause very disagreeable smells, which would be prejudicial to the public health by vitiation of the air; (2) that there would be continuous and great noise arising from the petitioner's large business of stable-keeping; (3) that the presence of large numbers of horses (thirty to forty) which the proposed buildings would accommodate might be the cause of epidemic disease of a serious kind in the neighbourhood; (4) that the proposed buildings would greatly vitiate the air by the emission of the large amount of smoke which must arise in the preparation of food for so many horses, and otherwise in connection therewith; (5) that the stables would give rise to the presence of large numbers of rats in the neighbouring houses, to the annoyance and danger of the inhabitants; (6) that the risk of fire in the neighbourhood would be much increased by the existence of the proposed buildings; (7) "this respondent's objections are accentuated by the fact that the proposed buildings will be in the centre of what is almost already, and will soon be entirely, a hollow square (that is a square built on all four sides), the area of which is little more than an acre in extent, through which there is no provision for a current of pure air, or for ready access in case of fire or otherwise, and dwelling round which there is already a population of about 500, which will be increased when the square is entirely built to 700 or 800"; (8) "the proposed buildings are in contravention of section 16 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867,* and section 177 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862."†

* Section 16 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 101, provides that "the word nuisance under this Act shall include . . . (c) any stable, byre, pig-stye, or other building in which any animal or animals are kept in such a manner as to be injurious to health; (d) any accumulation or deposit of manure or other offensive matter within fifty yards of any dwelling-house within the limits of any burgh, or wherever situated if injurious to health; . . . (e) any work, manufactory, trade, or business injurious to the health of the neighbourhood, or so conducted as to be offensive or injurious to health; . . . (f) any chimney, not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house, sending forth smoke so as to be injurious to health. . . ."

† Section 177 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, provides—"It shall not be lawful to form, lay out, or build any court unless the same shall be of a clear width of fifteen feet, measuring from the buildings or intended buildings therein; provided always that to any such court in which there shall be more than eight houses, there shall be an additional width of one foot for every such additional house; provided also that there shall be an entrance to every such court of the full width thereof, and open from the ground upwards."

Robertson v.
Thomas.

The petitioner pleaded, inter alia;—(3) No jurisdiction relative to objections. (4) Objector's pleas are irrelevant.

The respondent, Mr Thomas, pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The proposed buildings being of a nature to cause serious annoyance and discomfort to the neighbours, and danger to the public health, the petition should be refused. (3) The proposed buildings being a nuisance both at common law and by statute, should not be sanctioned.

The magistrates, after hearing parties, allowed the respondent a proof of the averments in his objections, and to the petitioner a conjunct probation.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.

No objection was stated in the Single Bills to the competency of the appeal, but when the case was called in the Summar Roll the respondent objected to the competency, and argued that the judgment of the inferior Court, being an interlocutory judgment allowing a proof, and not a final judgment, could not be appealed. There was no provision for such an appeal in the Court of Session Act, 1810.* The whole ground of the appeal was that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction to deal with the objections, but it was not disputed that he had jurisdiction to deal with the petition, and the proof was required to shew whether the matters detailed in the objections, when established, would or would not be of a nature with which he was competent to deal. It would be premature in the state of the averments to decide without any inquiry that the whole objections stated in the public interest were outwith the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. With regard to the cases cited on the other side, that of *Millar v. Crawford*¹ was distinguishable, because the Dean of Guild there had thought he ought to ascertain who was proprietor of the disputed ground, and allowed a proof of possession, in the first place; while *Colville v. Carrick*² was a question of disputed title arising between private parties, whereas this was a question raised in the public interest, and not involving any dispute as to title. In *Lang v. Bruce*³ the point was not raised, and the reason probably was that the Dean of Guild had erred in the interlocutory judgment by directing certain operations to be performed, and there was no interest to raise the question of competency, since it was more convenient for the parties to have the merits of the judgment decided. In *Moffat v. Denham*⁴ it was held "premature to allow advocacy on proper defect of jurisdiction while a proof has been allowed in the inferior Court, with a view to give a judgment on an objection to the jurisdiction." The Dean of Guild had jurisdiction where a building would naturally, if not necessarily, lead to a nuisance.⁵

* The Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, sec. 36, provides "that bills of advocacy from the Sheriffs or other inferior Judges in Scotland against interlocutory judgments shall be allowed only upon the following grounds,—first, of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction, personal objection to the Judge, and privilege of party; secondly, of contingency; thirdly, of legal objection with respect to the mode of proof, or with respect to some change of possession, or to an interim decree for a partial payment, provided that in the cases specified under this head leave is given by the inferior Judge."

Argued for the appellant;—The appeal was competent both at common law and under the Act of 1810. The Dean of Guild had here gone into a matter with which he had no right to deal. He had jurisdiction to entertain the petition, but no jurisdiction to take up a mere allegation of nuisance, and the Supreme Court could restrain him whenever he proposed to enter on a field outwith his competency, both at common law and on the ground of incompetency under the Act of 1810. It was analogous to the case of a competition of heritable right. The Supreme Court would not allow the Dean of Guild to enter on an inquiry involving a competition of heritable right, or to go outside any statutory limit of his powers and an appeal was competent against a judgment by him which involved such an incompetent inquiry.¹ In *Pitman v. Burnett's Trustees*² the appeal, if competent at all, which was not disputed, must have been under the Act of 1810. The Dean of Guild Court had no jurisdiction as to the use of a building, or as to a mere question of nuisance. That was now well settled, and Colville's case was directly in point,³ as was also Forrest v. Manson, decided in the First Division more recently.⁴ If, then, the respondent's averments were all established, the case would require to come back to this Court, on the ground that the Dean of Guild could not competently deal with it. It was, therefore, not only competent, but in the interest of both parties, that the Court should decide between them now.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is difficulty in this case arising from the extreme slenderness of the statements on record. I have come, however, to the conclusion that the appeal cannot be sustained.

The petition prays the Magistrates of Govanhill, exercising the jurisdiction of Dean of Guild, to appoint service on neighbouring proprietors and on the burgh surveyor, and thereafter to "line the ground described in the condescendence, and approve of the proposed alterations thereon, conform to the plans and sections herewith produced."

The only person who has appeared to object is the surveyor of Govanhill, and he makes these statements:—First, that the buildings will be the cause of very disagreeable smells, which will be prejudicial to the public by vitiation of the air; second, that the petitioner's business will cause great noise; third, that the presence in the proposed buildings of the large number of horses which it is proposed to accommodate will be the cause of epidemic disease; fourth, that the emission of smoke from the proposed buildings in the course of preparing food for so many horses will cause vitiation of the air; fifth, that the stables will give rise to the presence in neighbouring houses of numerous rats; sixth, that there will be a risk of fire; and then he makes what seems to embody the most substantial objection in his seventh and eighth statements, which are as follow—(his Lordship quoted those statements). Now, the Dean of Guild Court allows a proof, and the petitioner appeals on the ground that the objections taken are beyond the cognisance and jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. To the competency of this appeal it is objected by the respondent that it ought not to be entertained by us because the judgment appealed against is an interlocutory judgment only. In order to maintain its competency the appellant powerfully argued to us that the allowance of proof is an excess of jurisdiction. If I were quite satisfied on the face of these objections that they include matters only which are entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court, I should give effect without difficulty to the appellant's argument. But I am of opinion that that is not the nature of the case. This stable is in the centre of a square of buildings. That is the nature of the building which is the subject of dispute, and while it may be quite true that the Dean of Guild has no legal authority in a simple case of nuisance unconnected with questions of the structural nature of the building, still he may be a competent judge as to a question of nuisance which is connected with structural alterations on a building, or with the structural arrangements of a building within his jurisdiction. That is the ground of my judgment. I am clearly of opinion that there are cases of nuisance, and cases as to the use of buildings, which cannot come under the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild because they do not involve questions of the character for which he is the proper judge, but that, on the other hand, it is no answer to say what the appellant says here, if the nuisance is connected with a structural alteration of the building itself, and the use is the use of that building. But I say more. A building may be innocuous in one place and a nuisance in another. This stable, for example, might be quite innocuous in another place, but noxious in the place here in question. I think, though I have not come to that result without difficulty, that that is the result of the cases quoted to us, and that there is no case in which the objection was one taken to a building in regard to its particular locality and surroundings in which it has been held that there was no case for inquiry. If I were to take some of those objections by themselves, I might be inclined to say that they are not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, but I do not think we ought at this stage to limit the inquiry. I think the Dean of Guild is entitled to make the proposed inquiry. The result of that may be to bring out that the matters put forward as objections are outside of his jurisdiction, but I do not think we can say so as yet.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion, and in the grounds of it. The view of the Dean of Guild is that he is not without inquiry able to say that all the objections stated are such as to be outside his jurisdiction, although in the end of the day it may turn out that all the objections are beyond his jurisdiction. I am not satisfied myself that all these objections are outside his jurisdiction, and I think it would be a strong thing for us at present to say, for example, that the objections founded on the General Police Act and the Public Health Act as to the natural consequences of the proposed erections, and the carrying on of the appellant's business in them, are matters entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. Unless satisfied of that, I think it was right to make sure of the grounds of judgment by allowing a proof. I think it would be inexpedient to recall this interlocutor. We do not by supporting it assert that the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction will in the end be sustained, but only that a decision upon that would at present be premature.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have felt, and still feel, great difficulty here. If I had to give an opinion on the merits of the question between the parties,

I should have taken more time to consider my judgment. But your Lordships propose that the proof shall go on, every question of competency and otherwise being reserved. That judgment cannot prejudice these questions, though it may cause delay and expense, but as it is suggested by your Lordships I am relieved from entering on the important questions as to the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. I only add, but without stating reasons, that I am not prepared to concur in the judgment proposed. I do not enter on my reasons, because to do so would be to discuss matters on which in future I may have to give an opinion.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties on the appeal, dismiss the same, and affirm the judgment of the Dean of Guild appealed against," &c.

LIQUIDATOR OF THE NORTH BRITISH BUILDING SOCIETY, Petitioner.— No. 156.

R. Johnstone—Ure.

DAVID GORDON M'LELLAN AND OTHERS, Respondents.—D.-F. Mackintosh— June 23, 1887.
Strachan. North British Building Society v. M'Leilan.

Building Society—Winding-up—List of contributories.—In the winding-up of a Building Society, the liquidator presented a note to the Court setting forth a scheme of settlement of the list of contributories. The following questions, arising on the construction of the rules of the society, were settled by the Court:—

Bank Interest.—Rule 13 of the society provided that "Any member holding any share, in respect of which no advance has been made, which, by the subscriptions paid and the profits thereon, shall have accumulated to £25 (the amount of said share), shall be entitled to receive the amount thereof, with bank interest from the date of completion, and his connection with the society in respect of the same shall cease." Held that there being no stipulation to the contrary, and as the funds of the society were operated on from day to day, interest was due at bank current account rates.

Advanced and unadvanced shares.—A shareholder who held forty shares of the society of the nominal value of £1000 obtained an advance of £500 from the society. Held that in the winding-up he was to be treated as having received payment by anticipation of twenty completed shares and as a holder of twenty unadvanced shares, and not as having obtained a loan on the security of his forty shares.

Fines.—Rule 3 of the society provided that members in arrears two fortnightly instalments should pay a fine. The liquidator admitted that at the date of the last balance-sheet of the society no fines had been levied on certain members, and that it was not the practice of the society to exact fines in terms of the rule. Held that the liquidator was not entitled to enforce the rule in the winding-up.

Non-timeous withdrawal of shares.—By rule 12 it was provided that members on whose shares no advances had been made might "on one month's notice in writing to the manager withdraw his or her subscriptions paid thereon," with interest at a certain rate, "and the same shall be paid as soon after the expiry of the month's notice as the funds will permit." Held that members who only gave notice of withdrawal within one month of the date of the winding-up could not benefit by the rule.

Interest on advances.—Rule 15 provided,—"Any member who has been granted an advance shall, from the date of granting the same, become liable for such a rate of interest as along with the interest allowed by the bank will amount to five per cent until said member has received said advance, when he shall pay to

No. 156. the society interest thereon at the rate of five per cent on the full amount of said advance; and all interest shall be payable at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday; and members failing to pay the same within fourteen days thereafter shall be charged interest thereon at five per cent from the term of payment." Held that the rule ceased to be operative when the society ceased to be a going concern.

Society v.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

CERTAIN questions, arising in the liquidation of the North British Building Society, were brought before the Court in special case Tosh v. North British Building Society, and were decided by the Court of Session, of date July 10, 1885 (12 R. 1271), and by the House of Lords, of date July 30, 1886 (ante, H. L. 6).

The proceedings in the Society prior to 9th July 1884, when a petition for liquidation was presented, are narrated in the House of Lords report in the present volume, p. 6 (H. L.).

On 19th July 1884 the Court pronounced a liquidation order and appointed Mr J. L. Selkirk official liquidator.

On 18th March 1887 the liquidator presented this note in the liquidation, in which he craved the Court, inter alia, "to settle a list of contributories in the liquidation of the Society in conformity with the list hereto appended."

In the petition he stated that the contributories were classified in that list "in accordance with the judgments pronounced by the Court of Session and House of Lords," above referred to. The scheme was divided into the following four sections:—"Section A embraces the names of those members who had completed or withdrawn their shares prior to the commencement of the liquidation, and shews the sums due to each respectively. In accordance with the judgment of the Court of Session, members in this section are entitled to be paid out in the order of the priority of the completion or withdrawal of their shares, and preferably to all the other members of the Society, borrowing or non-borrowing. The liquidator has therefore ranked the members in this section in the order of date of their completion or withdrawal; and he proposes to pay them out from time to time as the funds in his hands permit.

"Section B of the list embraces the names of non-borrowing members who had not withdrawn or completed their shares prior to the commencement of the liquidation. The liquidator proposes to pay out these members pari passu after the members whose names are included in section A have been paid out.

"Section C of the list embraces the names of those borrowing members who gave due notice prior to the commencement of the liquidation of their intention to redeem their securities and renounce their shares.

"Section D of the list embraces the names of the remaining borrowing members. The liquidator proposes to deal with these members in accordance with the judgment of the House of Lords, as having impliedly given due notice of their intention to redeem, and as being bound to redeem their securities at Martinmas 1882."

Answers were lodged to this note by various members of the Society. They raised the following questions:—

I. Bank interest.—John Taylor and others stated in their answers,— "The respondents are shareholders holding completed shares in said Society. As such they are entered in section A in the list of contributories appended to the note. . . .

"In a note at the foot of the list of contributories embraced in said section the liquidator states that 'the contributories who hold completed shares will be entitled to "bank" interest, in terms of Rule 13. The liquidator understands the term "bank" interest to mean the rate allowed by Scotch banks on sums at the credit of current accounts kept with them, No. 156. and will act accordingly.'

"Rule 13 provides that 'any member holding any share in respect of which no advance has been made, which by the subscriptions paid and the profits thereon shall have accumulated to £25 (the amount of said share), shall be entitled to receive the amount thereof, with bank interest from the date of completion, and his connection with the Society in respect of the same shall cease.'

June 23, 1887.
North British Building
Society v.
M'Lellan.

"The respondents maintain that 'bank' interest means interest at the rate allowed by Scotch banks on sums lodged with them on deposit-receipt, and that they are entitled to interest at that rate on the amount of their shares from the date of completion until the date of payment."

The liquidator, acting on a suggestion of the Court, lodged a minute in process, which set forth his arguments on each question raised by the respondents. In that part of his minute which dealt with Mr Taylor's answers he stated,—“The liquidator maintains that 'bank interest' means interest at current account rates. He refers to Rule 13, which provides that 'bank interest' is to be payable on completed shares from the date of their completion, but that the shares shall only be payable in their order and as the funds of the Society will permit. The funds of the Society consisted of small sums—entry-moneys, fines, and subscriptions—paid in from day to day. These sums were lodged in bank on open account. They were not lodged on deposit-receipt, but on account-current; and the liquidator maintains that the 'bank interest' which the rule contemplates as payable to the member holding completed shares was the interest which the Society received on their current account with the bank, and not interest at a higher rate. That was the meaning attached to the rule and acted on while the Society was a going concern.”

II. Advanced and Unadvanced Shares.—D. G. M'Lellan was entered on the list as a borrowing and an investing member. He stated in his answers,—“On 11th September 1876 the respondent subscribed for forty shares in the said Society, and obtained a pass-book in which these forty shares are entered as numbering 7525 to 7564 inclusive, and in which are also entered the instalments paid on said shares from time to time. There is also credited yearly in a stock-account at the end of said pass-book the profit from time to time allocated upon said shares. At 30th November 1881 (the date of the last balance-sheet) the said instalments amounted to £340, and said allocated profits to £14, 18s. 11d. Since that date the respondent has paid to the Society instalments on said shares amounting to £95, also credited in said pass-book, making the total instalments paid in respect of said shares £435.

“On or about the 26th September 1877 the respondent obtained from the Society, in respect of said forty shares, an advance of £500, and granted in favour of the Society a bond and disposition in security therefor over heritable property belonging to him at Duke Street, Glasgow. The said bond and disposition in security is herewith produced. The respondent regularly paid at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas yearly interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the full amount of said advance, up to Whitsunday 1882.

“On or about the 13th May 1882 the respondent sent a notice to the Society withdrawing the shares in the Society standing in his name; and on 23d May 1883 the respondent's agents, without prejudice to said notice of withdrawal, gave the Society notice, in terms of Rule 27 (quoted infra), of the respondent's intention at Martinmas 1883 to redeem his property by renouncing said forty shares and paying any balance that might be due to the Society, after deducting the instalments paid in

No. 156. respect of said shares and interest thereon, as provided in the first part of the above-quoted rule.*

North British Building
Society v.
M'Lellan.

M'Lellan's name was entered on the list in schedule B in respect of twenty of his shares on which the liquidator alleged no advance had been made, and also in schedule D in respect of shares held by him as representing the advances made to him.

M'Lellan stated his contention thus in his answers:—"The respondent contends that the advance of £500 was made to him in respect of the whole of said shares; that the subscriptions or instalments from time to time paid on these shares have extinguished pro tanto said advance of £500; and that the liquidator is not entitled now to treat the half of said shares as advanced and the other half as unadvanced shares. The effect of the liquidator's proposal will be to rear up against the respondent a debt which has been by said payments from time to time extinguished, and notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords, to convert the respondent's shares ex post facto from borrowing to non-borrowing shares, and so render the respondent liable for a share of the losses of the Society."

William M'Geoch junior was in the same position as M'Lellan.

With reference to these members the liquidator stated in his minute,—
"2. The respondents, David Gordon M'Lellan and William M'Geoch junior, are both borrowing members and at the same time investing members. In respect of the shares held by them, against which no advance has been made, their names have been placed by the liquidator in section B as 'non-borrowing members who had not completed or not withdrawn their shares prior to 13th May 1882,' and in respect of the shares held by them representing their respective advances, their names have been placed by the liquidator in section D as 'borrowing members who fall to be dealt with as having given due notice of their intention to redeem and as being bound to redeem their securities at Martinmas 1882.' The entire losses of the Society, in terms of the judgment of the House of Lords, fall to be borne by the investing or unadvanced members (sections A and B of the note), as distinguished from the borrowing members (sections C and D of the note). At the date when the respondent M'Lellan got his advance he held, and had held for a considerable time, forty shares, representing a nominal capital of £1000, and the advance made to him was £500, representing a capital of twenty shares, in respect of which he granted in favour of the Society a bond and disposition in security in ordinary form; and at the date when the respondent M'Geoch got his advance he held, and had held for a considerable time, fifty shares, representing a nominal capital of £1250, the advance made to him being £450, repre-

* By Rule 14 of the Society it is provided that "Any member desirous of an advance shall make application to the directors for the same, who shall thereupon consider and determine said application. Any person holding shares on which six months' subscriptions have been paid, and who is not more than one month in arrears, shall be entitled to apply for an advance in the manner above provided."

By Rule 27 it is provided,—“Any member who has given any property in security to the Society may, on giving three months' notice prior to the term of Martinmas or Whitsunday in any year, redeem the same by renouncing the shares representing the advance made thereon, and paying the amount of said advance under deduction of the instalments paid in respect of the same, and interest thereon, and his interest in said Society, so far as said shares are concerned, shall cease; . . . or when the subscriptions, with the share of profits of any member who has received an advance, are equal to the amount of said advance, then the payments of said member, in respect of said shares on which the advance has been made, shall cease, and his connection with the Society in respect of the same shall terminate.”

sending the capital of eighteen shares; and in respect of which he granted a similar bond. The accounts kept in the books of the Society in connection with the shares of each of these respondents were in both cases opened a considerable time before they applied for their advances, and remained unaltered after the advances were given without distinguishing them into advanced and unadvanced shares. But for the rules of the Society and the Building Societies Act, under which the Society is established,—6 and 7 William IV. c. 32,—the respondents would be obliged to repay the full amount of their advances, and all the shares held by them would bear their proportion of the Society's losses. The effect of the House of Lords' judgment in Brownlie v. Russell, 10 Rettie (H. L.), page 19, is that an advance under the statute and under the rules does not mean a loan upon the security of the shares, but that the Society pays to the member by anticipation the amount or nominal value of the shares which represent the loan, and each instalment paid upon the shares representing the loan is practically a payment to account of the bond until all the shares representing the loan are paid in full, when the loan is held to be paid up, the advance of the amount of the shares being extinguished. That judgment was followed in the appeal in the special case for this Society.

"The liquidator has applied the judgment of the House of Lords by placing the respondent M'Lellan in section B in respect of twenty shares held by him upon which no advance has been made, and in section D in respect of the twenty shares held by him representing his advance of £500; and by placing the respondent M'Geoch in section B in respect of thirty-two shares held by him upon which no advance has been made, and in section D in respect of the eighteen shares held by him representing his advance of £450. These respondents object to the liquidator dealing with their shares in this manner, and claim that the instalments paid on all their shares, irrespective of the fact that they represent an amount in excess of their respective advances, should be applied towards their bonds. The liquidator founds on rules 12, 14, 16, 26, and 27, on the Lord Chancellor's opinion in the appeal case, 14 R. (H. L.), p. 13; and on Lord Watson's opinion in Brownlie's case, 10 R. (H. L.), 19.*"

14. Disposal of the Funds.—"When the directors shall consider they have sufficient funds on hand, they shall advance the same in such sums to members as to them shall seem proper, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per cent, and upon payment of such a rate of premium as to them may seem fair and reasonable. Any member desirous of an advance shall make application to the directors for the same, who shall thereupon consider and determine said application. Any person holding shares on which six months' subscriptions have been paid, and who is not more than one month in arrears, shall be entitled to apply for an advance in the manner above provided. III. Fines.—Rule 3 of the Society provided,—“The capital of the Society shall be raised in shares of twenty-five pounds each, payable by fortnightly instalments of one shilling and threepence per share, and by interest arising therefrom. Any member in arrears two fortnightly instalments shall pay at the rate of one penny per share per fortnight for each and every fortnightly subscription in arrear, and should said member continue in arrear until the fines incurred thereon shall equal all the subscriptions actually paid, said member shall then cease to be a shareholder, and shall forfeit all interest therein. But in case of bad health, poverty, or other casualties, the directors shall have power to suspend payment of past and future subscriptions and future fines, on application by the member or any of his or her family, but all suspended payments shall be charged interest at the rate of five per cent per annum.”

The liquidator stated that he had “charged completed shareholders who were in arrear of their instalments with fines up to the dates of completion, the withdrawn shareholders in the same position with fines up to the dates of withdrawal, and the general body of borrowing members with therein to any other person, along with the shares representing the same, provided all arrears of principal, interest, and penalties be paid, on payment of a transfer fee of two shillings and sixpence for every share so transferred.”

26. Transfer or Exchange of Property held in Security.—“Any member who has received an advance from the Society upon the security of any property, may, with the consent of the directors, transfer his or her right and interest in the same to any other person, along with the shares representing the same, provided all arrears of principal, interest, and penalties due thereon are paid; and the purchaser thereof shall become a member of the Society, and subject to all the rules and entitled to all the privileges thereof; and shall pay on entry a transfer fee of two shillings and sixpence for each share represented by the property so transferred; and he shall grant, if required, a bond of corroboration for the advances, interest, and penalties, so far as unpaid. Any member who has received an advance may exchange the same from one property to another, provided the directors are satisfied with the proposed new security, on payment of a fee of two shillings and sixpence for each share representing the advance so transferred.”

27. Redemption of Property.—“Any member who has given any property in security to the Society may, on giving three months' notice prior to the term of Martinmas or Whitsunday in any year, redeem the same, by renouncing the shares representing the advance made thereon, and paying the amount of said advance, under deduction of the instalments paid in respect of the same, and interest thereon, and his interest in said Society, so far as said shares are concerned, shall cease; or any member who has given any property in security to the Society may redeem the same as above by payment of the whole sum borrowed and other dues thereon, and retain his shares in the same manner as if no advance had been made in respect of said shares, and he shall be entitled to have the same re-advanced to him in terms of Rule 26, or to transfer the same to any other party without the payment of any further premium, but subject to the payment of the difference of interest between the bank and the Society rate until re-advanced, and thereafter the regular rate of interest thereon. Any member redeeming his property by either of the plans aforesaid shall pay a fee of two shillings and sixpence for each share representing the advance so redeemed; or when the subscriptions, with the share of profits, of any member who has received an advance are equal to the amount of said advance, then the payments of said member, in respect of said shares on which the advance has been made, shall cease, and his connection with the Society in respect of the same shall terminate. In the event of any property being redeemed or completed as aforesaid, the deed granted in security thereof shall be duly discharged, by a receipt or acknowledgment endorsed thereon, signed by two of the trustees and the manager, in terms of the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 32, and bonds shall be discharged by the trustees or any two of them.”

fines up till Martinmas 1882, being the date when their implied notice to redeem took effect and the date up to which they were bound to continue paying their instalments. He admitted that no fines were shewn in the account for 1881, and that in practice fines were not enforced when the company was a going concern.

William M'Geoch junior and others were debited with fines. M'Geoch averred;—"The respondent further contends that the liquidator is not entitled to debit him with fines. No fines are debited to the respondent in his pass-book; he was at no time during his connection with the Society charged with fines; nor was it the practice of the Society to exact fines in terms of Rule 3, or otherwise."

4. Non-timeous withdrawal of shares.—In respect of Rule 12 (quoted supra, p. 831, footnote), John Caldwell and others were placed on the list in schedule B, on the ground that they had not given notice of withdrawal a month prior to 13th May 1882, the date of the liquidation.

In support of his view he referred "to the Court of Session judgment in the special case, 12 R. p. 1286; and to the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society case, July 6, 1883, L. R., 24 Ch. Div. 421, and Nov. 28, 1884, L. R., 10 App. Ca. 33."

5. Interest.—By Rule 15 it was provided,—“Any member who has been granted an advance shall, from the date of granting the same, become liable for such a rate of interest as along with the interest allowed by the bank will amount to five per cent until said member has received said advance, when he shall pay to the Society interest thereon at the rate of five per cent on the full amount of said advance; and all interest shall be payable at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday; and members failing to pay the same within fourteen days thereafter shall be charged interest thereon at five per cent from the term of payment.”

With reference to cases alleged to fall under this rule, the liquidator stated;—“(5) Several borrowing members whose names appear on section D maintain that they are not liable in interest on the balances due by them from Martinmas 1882, or otherwise that they are only liable in simple interest at bank deposit rates. The liquidator maintains that he is entitled to charge interest on the balances due by these members at five per cent from Martinmas 1882 till payment, in terms of their bonds and dispositions in security. And on each half-yearly payment of interest in arrear he maintains that he is entitled to charge interest, limited, in terms of the bonds and dispositions in security, to one-fifth part of the amount of the half-yearly payment. The liquidator concedes that the judgment of the House of Lords in the special case decides that on payment of the balance of the debt due under their bonds at Martinmas 1882 these borrowing members were entitled to be free of the Society. But the respondents did not consign or tender the amount of their debts, and hence the liquidator maintains that the usual rule must be applied, and that interest under the bond is payable from the date when the debt and interest became due till payment. In charging interest upon the periodical payments of interest in arrear, to the extent mentioned in his note, the liquidator conceives that he is simply giving effect to the stipulation contained in the borrowing members' bonds, which provides that one-fifth part more of each term's payment of interest shall be due in name of penalty in case of failure in the punctual payments. By the failure to pay punctually the Society has received no interest on the moneys which

No. 156. should have been paid, whilst the member has been lucratus to a corresponding extent. In charging interest on cash termly payments the liquidator is following what he understands to be the usual practice.”

M'Lellan and others, who were charged with interest under this rule, maintained that a balance fell to be struck, under the judgment of the House of Lords in the special case, at Martinmas 1882—(ante, H. L. 6). That balance had been tendered to the Society prior to the House of Lords judgment, but it was refused. The liquidator was therefore not entitled to interest since that date.

At advising, LORD ADAM delivered the opinion of the Court (the other Judges present being the LORD PRESIDENT, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND),—

LORD ADAM.—The questions for decision in this case, raised by the note for the liquidator and the several answers thereto, will be found most conveniently stated in the minute lodged for the liquidator, and I propose to give my opinion on them in the order in which they are there set forth.

Before doing so, however, I may state that it has been settled by the previous proceedings in this case—that the 13th May 1882 is the date at which the winding-up virtually commenced—that advanced members are not bound to share the losses of the Society, and that unadvanced members with completed shares, and all members who had withdrawn prior to 13th May 1882, have priority in ranking over members whose shares were not completed or not withdrawn.

The first question is raised by the answers for John Taylor and others, who are members holding completed shares in the Society. It arises under Rule 13, and is whether, in terms of that rule, such members are entitled to interest on the amount of their shares from the date of completion until the date of payment, at the rate allowed by Scotch banks on sums lying on deposit—receipt—or at account-current rates only.

The rule says that the member shall be entitled to receive the amount of his share “with bank interest”; what is here meant by bank interest? In the absence of anything in the rules to indicate any intention to the contrary, I should have thought that interest at current account rates was intended, and I think the matter becomes quite clear when we have regard to the nature of the business of the Society, that the funds came in from day to day in numerous small sums, and were paid out again from day to day. It appears to me that this excludes the idea that the money in the hands of the Society was intended to be lodged on deposit-receipt, or otherwise than on current account, and in point of fact it is stated by the liquidator that they were so lodged. I am clear, therefore, that the liquidator is right in proposing to allow interest at current account rates only.

The next question is raised by the answers for David Gordon M'Lellan, and for William M'Geoch junior. There seems to be no difference between the two cases, and the decision of M'Lellan's case will rule that of M'Geoch.

It appears that M'Lellan, on 11th September 1876, subscribed for forty shares in the Society, representing a nominal capital of £1000. On 26th September 1877 he applied for and obtained from the Society an advance of £500, and at the same time granted in their favour a bond and disposition in security for that sum over property belonging to him in Duke Street, Glasgow.

The liquidator proposes to treat twenty of these shares as fully advanced shares, attributing the advance of £500 to such shares only, and to treat the other twenty as shares not completed and not withdrawn—and to apportion the instalments since paid between each set of shares respectively. The respondent, No. 156. on the other hand, claims that the advance of £500 shall be attributed to the whole forty shares, and that the whole instalments since paid shall be applied towards payment of his bond. The result is that by the liquidator's mode of stating the account a sum of £266, 6s. 2d., with interest from March 1882, remains due to the Society, while by the respondent's a sum of £2, 3s. 10d. is brought out as due to him by the Society.

June 23, 1887.
North British Building
Society v.
M'Lellan.

It would appear that the shares in question are numbered in the respondent's pass-book from 7525 to 7564 inclusive. The account kept in the books, in connection with the shares, which was opened a considerable time before the advance was applied for, and remained unaltered after the advance was given, does not distinguish between them as advanced and unadvanced shares. But I understand that, although a number of members may have both advanced and unadvanced shares, the books do not in any case recognise the difference between them.

In the case of Brownlie v. Russell, Lord Watson described an advance under the rules of that society in these terms,—“An advance,” he says, “under the statute and under these rules does not mean a loan by the society on the security of the shares; it signifies this, that the society pay by anticipation the amount of a member's shares upon receiving in return certain considerations which are fixed by the rules. The considerations given by a member obtaining payment of his shares by anticipation in terms of these rules were that he should pay interest monthly along with each instalment, and, further, that he should protect the society from loss by giving adequate heritable security for the amount advanced to him.”

When the present case was previously in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor referred with approval to the description there given by Lord Watson of advanced shares in Brownlie's case, and he says that, when the rules are looked at, the present case is undistinguishable in this respect from Brownlie's case, and he then comments in support of this conclusion on Rules 16, 26, and 27 of this society.

An advance is, therefore, under the rules of this society payment by anticipation to a member of the amount of his share or shares. It is not a loan on the security of his share. But the rules do not recognise a partially advanced share or a partially advanced member. A share is either an advanced share or an unadvanced share. An advance being payment of a share by anticipation, it must be either of a sum of £25, the amount of a share or of some multiple of that sum, and in the practice of the Society this was invariably observed.

The advance of £500 to M'Lellan was therefore payment to him by anticipation of a corresponding amount of shares—that is, twenty. He thus became an advanced member as regards twenty of his shares, and an unadvanced member as regards the other twenty. I cannot hold, as contended for by the respondent, that the advance of £500 was made to him in respect of the whole of his forty shares, which would be an advance of £12, 10s. of each share. It cannot be held to be an advance in security of his shares, nor can it be held to be a payment by anticipation of one-half of the amount of his shares. The rules do not recognise advances on such terms, and no practice has sanctioned it, if indeed practice could do so. I think, therefore, that the liquidator has rightly dealt with these shares.

This case, as I have said, will also rule M'Geoch's case.

The third question is, whether the liquidator is entitled, in terms of Rule 3

No. 156. of the Society, to charge non-borrowing members who had completed or withdrawn their shares prior to 13th May 1882, but who were in arrear of their subscriptions at the respective dates of completion or withdrawal of their shares, with fines up to the date of completion or withdrawal, and to charge borrowing members, who were bound to redeem their securities at Martinmas 1882, and were then in arrear of their instalments, with fines to that date.

June 23, 1887.
North British Building
Society v.
M'Lellan.

Rule 3 is in these terms :—"The capital of the Society shall be raised in shares of £25 each by fortnightly instalments of 1s. 3d. per share and by interest arising therefrom. Any member in arrears two fortnightly instalments shall pay at the rate of 1d. per share per fortnight for each and every fortnightly subscription in arrear, and should said member continue in arrear until the fines incurred thereon shall equal all the subscriptions actually paid, said member shall then cease to be a shareholder, and shall forfeit all interest therein."

This rule appears to be sufficiently clear, and would warrant what the liquidator proposes to do, but it is alleged by the respondents that at the date of the last balance-sheet (30th November 1881) no fines had been levied upon them, that they were never charged with fines at any time during their connection with the Society, and that it was not the practice of the Society to exact fines in terms of Rule 3.

The liquidator admits that no fines were shewn in the account for 1881, so that for the eighteen months prior to the date when the liquidation virtually commenced, no charge was made which could possibly be said to be a fine, and he explains that in imposing fines he has in no case gone back beyond the last payment made by any member, holding that if fines previously incurred were not imposed when that payment was made, he is precluded from now opening up the question; he further explains that the annual accounts for 1870 to 1880 inclusive shew certain profits of small amount (specified by him) which he represents as having been really fines though they were never entered under that name, but under the general charge of interest, and without notice to the members that any fines were ever imposed. The liquidator does not dispute the fact that Rule 3 was not in use to be enforced, and indeed it is admitted that the instalments as a rule were not regularly exacted or paid fortnightly by the members, but at irregular intervals of longer duration. All that the liquidator says is that it appeared to him that he ought to act as if the rule regarding fines was in force.

In the circumstances I am of opinion that the respondents are right in their contention that the liquidator is not now entitled to open up their accounts and to levy fines upon them in respect of their having been in arrear with their instalments at any time during their connection with the Society with the extraordinary pecuniary results which he brings out. It is clear that during the time the respondents were connected with the Society numerous members passed through the Society without this rule having been enforced against them, and I think it would be manifestly unjust to revive it now and enforce it against the respondents.

The next question is raised by the answers for John Caldwell and others, and the facts are these: Charles M'Lellan gave notice of his intention to withdraw his shares on 27th April 1882, John Caldwell on 3d May 1882, and Jane Semple on 4th May 1882. They are all non-borrowing members.

It will be observed that all these notices were given within one month of 13th May 1882, when the liquidation is held to have commenced.

The question is, whether these members are to be held, under Rule 12, as No. 156. non-borrowing members who have withdrawn their shares prior to 13th May 1882. Rule 12 provides that "any member holding shares on which no advance has been made may, on giving one month's notice in writing to the manager, withdraw his or her subscriptions paid thereon, with interest, &c., and the same shall be paid as soon after the expiry of the month's notice as the funds will permit." June 23, 1887.
North British
Building
Society v.
M'Lellan.

The question is not free from difficulty, but I think the respondents cannot be treated as members who had withdrawn their shares prior to 13th May 1882. The rule gave members only a right to withdraw on giving one month's notice. They had no right, therefore, to withdraw before the expiry of the notice, and continued therefore to be members of the Society till the expiry of the notice,—that is, until after 13th May 1882. In short, the one month's notice prior to the date when the winding-up of the Society virtually commenced was a condition precedent to their right to withdrawal. I think, therefore, that the liquidator is right in this case.

The fifth and last question is this, and it is raised by the answers for David Watson and others—The liquidator proposes to debit the balance due by them on their respective bonds with interest half-yearly from and after Martinmas 1882 until the bonds be fully paid, the interest being charged with interest from the date when due till payment. The respondents object to this, and maintain that they are not liable in interest at all on the balances due by them from Martinmas 1882 till the settlement of the list, or, at anyrate, that they are only liable in simple interest at legal rates thereon.

The liquidator refers to Rule 15 as justifying his charging interest on interest. Rule 15 provides that any member who has been granted an advance shall pay to the Society interest thereon at 5 per cent on the full amount of said advance, and all interest shall be payable at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, and members failing to pay the same within fourteen days thereafter shall be charged interest thereon at 5 per cent from the term of payment.

No doubt if the Society were still carrying on business under its rules, this rule would amply justify the liquidator's proposal to charge interest upon arrears of interest. But the Society is not carrying on business, and the rule is no longer applicable. The amount due by each respondent is a debt due by him to the Society, the amount of which is fixed as at Martinmas 1882. It appears to me that it is in the same position and subject to the same rules as regards interest as any other debt.

The respondents say that no interest at all is due because the delay in payment has arisen from the acts of the Society itself in refusing to settle with them on the terms now fixed by the judgment of the House of Lords.

On the other hand, the respondents neither consigned nor tendered the amount of their debts. In the circumstances it appears to me that the several respondents should be found liable only for simple interest at legal rates.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the cause, and heard counsel for the parties on the note for the official liquidator to settle the list of contributories, &c., No. 39 of process, answers thereto, Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, and 70 of process, and minute for the official liquidator, No. 83 of process, Grant the first, second, and third heads of the prayer of the said note, No. 39 of process, and with regard to the fourth head of the prayer of the said note, repel the answers

Reparation—Rule of the road—Passenger alighting from tramway-car run down by carriage following—Contributory negligence.—A passenger who had alighted from a tramway-car, and was crossing from the car to the pavement on the left, was knocked down by a van going in the same direction as the car, and passing it on the left-hand side. In an action of damages brought against the van owners for injuries thereby received, the Court assoilzied the defenders, holding that fault had not been proved on the part of the van-driver, while there had been carelessness on the part of the pursuer in not looking to his own safety.

Observed (per the Lord President) that the rule of the road requires that a tramway-car shall be passed by a following vehicle on the left-hand side.

G. F. JARDINE sued the Stonefield Laundry Company, Paisley, for damages 1st DIVISION. in respect of injuries sustained by him owing to the alleged carelessness Sheriff of Ren-of a vanman named Henderson in the employment of the defenders. frew and Bute.
Jardine had alighted from a tram-car on the Paisley Road on the left side M. next the pavement, and was walking towards the pavement, when he was knocked over by a horse yoked to a van belonging to the defenders, which came up from behind the car, and was passing it on the left-hand side.
The pursuer alleged that Henderson was guilty of reckless conduct and violation of the rule of the road in passing the car on the left side, instead of stopping his horse or passing on the right-hand side.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan), after proof,* on 17th December 1886, assoilzied the defenders, on the grounds set forth in the subjoined note.†

* Thomas Burnett, manager of the Paisley Tramways Company, a witness for the defenders, deponed,—“I was sometime engaged as inspector of tramways in Glasgow and also in London. The rule of the road as regards passing cars is to pass on the left side. That is the rule both in London, Glasgow, and Paisley. The reason of this is that tramway-cars coming the reverse way pass on the other side, and there might be accidents if vehicles passing a tramway-car pass on the right side.”

† “NOTE.—In the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute the evidence establishes that on the day in question the defenders' van was overtaking the tram-car, and was about to pass it, when the latter pulled up to stop. Immediately the vanman pulled up, but being close behind the tram-car, his horse passed the end of the car, and the pursuer, who in stepping off the car had not looked behind to see that the way was clear, was knocked down and injured. Fault on the part of the vanman there was none. He was on the proper side of the road, he was within his rights when he sought to pass the tram-car, and he did what he was

Stonefield
Laundry Co.

On appeal to the Court of Session LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM, after going through the evidence, adopted the Sheriff-substitute's grounds of judgment.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I so entirely concur with the views which have been expressed by your Lordships that I should not have thought it necessary to add a single word, were it not that I think the case is one of some public importance.

Tramway-cars are no longer a novelty among us. They are to be seen in almost every city in the kingdom, and people who use them and who pass along the street are bound to understand and to observe the rules which regulate that mode of traffic. There is one rule of the road which has been very much altered by the appearance of these new vehicles, viz., that one carriage overtaking another is bound to pass it upon the right-hand side. The new rule requires that when a carriage is coming up behind a tramway-car, and the car stops, the driver of the other vehicle shall pass upon the left-hand side. That is the opposite of the old rule. The new rule has been introduced from considerations of convenience and safety; and the reason is very obvious, because tramway-cars pass upon two lines of tramways, one in one direction and another in the other. If vehicles were to pass a car on the right-hand side, there would be very great danger of their coming into collision with another car coming the opposite way. That is the reason of the rule. If a person gets off a tram-car on the left-hand side, which is the proper side for the purpose, it is quite obvious that in passing from the tram-car to the pavement he is passing across a carriage way, and a carriage way which he ought to know may be travelled over at any moment by vehicles passing alongside of the tram-car. He is just as much bound to look after his own safety in crossing that carriage-way as if he were crossing from one side of the street to the other. It is just as much a carriage-way as the whole street, and while vehicles are bound to go at a steady pace and not to be driven furiously, foot-passengers crossing the carriage-way are bound to look after their own safety, and not to run obvious and unnecessary risk.

Applying these observations to the present case, it appears to me that, while there is no blame imputable to the driver of the van, and no ground for the allegation of undue haste in his driving, or of want of care and attention, there was very great carelessness on the part of the unfortunate man who was struck. He stepped down off the car without ever looking to the left to see whether any vehicle was approaching. If he had looked he would have seen the van, and would have waited until it passed. That is just the same thing as if, in proceeding to cross a street where there were no tramway-cars at all, he had failed to look to see whether there were any carriages close at hand which might run him over.

I think the fault was clearly with the appellant, and not with the defenders' servant.

bound to do, pulled up to stop when the tram-car stopped. What more could he be asked to do? The slightest and most ordinary care on the part of the unfortunate pursuer would have saved him from what happened. . . ."

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Process—Competency of Reclaiming Note—
Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 171.—Held that the Court of Session Act, 1868, did not apply to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts, and that a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in an appeal against a resolution of creditors in a sequestration under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was competently brought within fourteen days, and without leave of the Lord Ordinary.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Process—Resolution accepting composition offer—Appeal—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 138, 139, 169.—Held that an appeal by certain creditors on a sequestered estate against the resolution of an alleged statutory majority of their number accepting a composition offer by the bankrupt was competent under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and was not excluded by the fact that the appellants had another remedy under the 138th and 139th sections of the Act.

AN appeal was taken by Miss Mary Jane M'George and others, certain creditors on the sequestered estate of J. C. M'George, to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills against a resolution of certain other creditors (John Paton, Son, & Company, and others), that a composition offer by the bankrupt should be entertained. The appeal was presented in terms of the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856,* and on the ground that the resolution was not carried by the statutory majority of votes, certain votes given in favour of it not being valid.

The respondents (who were the creditors by whom the resolution had been carried) pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The appeal is incompetent, in respect of the provisions of sections 138 and 139 of the statute.†

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 4th June 1887, pronounced this interlocutor :—"The Lord Ordinary repels the first plea in law for the respondents : Refuses the motion made by the respondents at the bar for leave to amend their affidavits, and before further answer appoints the respondents to lodge within four days a specification of the documents which they seek to recover in support of their claims."‡

* 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79—Sec. 169 was,—“It shall be competent to appeal against the resolutions of the creditors at meetings either to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, provided a note of appeal shall be lodged and marked . . . within fourteen days after the date of the meeting at which the resolution objected to has been passed . . . ; and it shall in like manner be competent to appeal against any deliverance of the trustee or commissioners to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, provided the note of appeal shall be lodged and marked as aforesaid within fourteen days from the date of the deliverance. . . .”

† Quoted infra, p. 844, note.

‡ “OPINION.— . . . It is objected by the respondents that this appeal (which is brought under section 169 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856) is incompetent, and they maintain that the only competent mode in which the appellants can obtain a review of the resolution, or a consideration of the legality of the votes by which that resolution was carried, is by appearing before the Sheriff when the resolution is reported to him by the trustee as provided for by sections 138 and 139 of the Act. I think there can be no doubt that the appellants could have stated all the objection to the resolution which they now state before the Sheriff on the report of the trustee, if they had been pleased to adopt that course. But the fact that the Act in section 138 provides a certain remedy will not of itself make it incompetent for the appellants to resort to another remedy also provided by the Act. The remedy provided by section 138 is nowhere declared to be the only mode by which a creditor may bring a reso-M'George v.

M'George's
Creditors.

On 10th June the respondents presented a reclaiming note against that interlocutor to the First Division.

Miss M'George and others, appellants, objected in the Single Bills to the competency of the reclaiming note. They argued that the leave of the Lord Ordinary was necessary under the 54th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868. By the 171st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856,¹ under which the reclaiming note was brought, it was provided that any "judgment" of the Lord Ordinary might be brought under review. The word "judgment" in that section was to be contrasted with "deliverance," which was the word used in the 169th and 170th sections. "Deliverance" by the interpretation clause of that statute (section 4) included a great deal more than "judgment." The 71st and 127th sections were also in point,—because in these the terms "judgment" and "decision" were used,—both being different from "deliverance." The 171st section containing the term "judgment" must be read along with the Court of Session Act, 1868, the provisions of which in regard to reclaiming notes, and particularly of the 54th section, must be read into it.² The only difference was, that the time within which a reclaiming note must be presented was in every case limited to fourteen days, but in no case could a reclaiming note be presented without leave. Sequestration processes were not necessarily Bill-Chamber proceedings, and reclaiming notes in them fell to be presented according to the rules of the Court of Session Act.³

The respondents argued;—The question fell to be decided upon the terms of the Bankruptcy Statute only, and the Court of Session Act did not apply. The appeal was taken against a resolution of creditors to the Bill-Chamber under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act. It was clear that neither the 52d nor the 53d section of the Court of Session Act had to do with the matter, for they had no application to cases in the Bill-Chamber. The 54th section applied solely to cases initiated by some writ in the Court of Session. The distinction between a Court of Session and a Bill-Chamber cause was sharply marked in the 90th section. Further, a Bill-Chamber cause was not marked on the partibus, like a Court of Session case, to any particular Division,⁴ and in every Court of Session case the Division before which it was desired to bring it was so marked. Besides, the Bankruptcy Act had a code of procedure for "judicial proceedings" from section 169 onwards, and unless that was repealed it was still in force. All procedure in a sequestration process was in the Bill-Chamber.⁵ A decision of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in a sequestration process was subject to review where that was not expressly excluded under the Bankruptcy Act.⁶

lution to accept an offer of composition under review. On the contrary, section 169 authorises an appeal against any resolution which the creditors may adopt at meetings held by them, without exception. That being so I cannot hold an appeal incompetent which the Act expressly allows. I may refer to the case of Tennent v. Crawford, 5 R. 433, as deciding the principle on which I proceed in repelling the objection to the competency of this appeal. . . ."

Ordinary on the Bills in an application brought under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The appeal to the Lord Ordinary was taken against a resolution of the creditors in a sequestration which was carried by an apparent majority of their body in favour of accepting an offer of composition. I do not think it can be disputed that the appeal falls under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act. That section provides that "it shall be competent to appeal against the resolutions of the creditors at meetings either to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, provided a note of appeal shall be lodged and marked . . . within fourteen days after the date of the meeting at which the resolution objected to has been passed . . . and it shall in like manner be competent to appeal against any deliverance of the trustee or commissioners to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, provided the note of appeal shall be lodged and marked as aforesaid within fourteen days from the date of the deliverance . . ."; and the question comes to be, what is the proper mode of bringing under review of the Inner-House an interlocutor pronounced by a Lord Ordinary in an appeal of that kind. This seems to me to be settled by the 171st section of the Act. The 170th section, which is interposed between the two other sections to which I have referred, provides for bringing "under the review of the Inner-House, or before the Lord Ordinary in time of vacation, any deliverance of the Sheriff . . . (except where the same is declared not to be subject to review) . . . and such note, together with the process, shall forthwith be transmitted by the Sheriff Clerk to the Clerk of the Bill-Chamber; and the Lord Ordinary's decision shall, when not expressly made final by this Act, be subject to review of the Inner-House. . . ." It appears to me that the 171st section applies to both the previous sections, and therefore to every deliverance of the Lord Ordinary on an appeal under the 169th section and also in vacation under the 170th section.

M'George v.
M'George's
Creditors.

The words of the 171st section are,—“Where any judgment of the Lord Ordinary is to be brought under review of the Inner-House, the same shall be done by a reclaiming note in common form presented within fourteen days from the date of the judgment; and such reclaiming note shall be disposed of by the Inner-House as speedily as the forms of Court will allow.” These sections are not repealed by any subsequent Act, and, accordingly, they are binding in regard to all appeals or judicial proceedings taken during the course of a sequestration process. It appears to me that the sections of the Court of Session Act of 1868 to which reference has been made have no application to cases of this kind,—neither to proceedings in the Bill-Chamber nor to bankruptcy appeals—but to Court of Session actions only, which come to the Inner-House from the Lord Ordinary for review.

I therefore think the objection to the competency is unfounded, and that the case is strictly within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Statute of 1856, which allows a reclaiming note to be presented within fourteen days from the date of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

The Court, accordingly, on 14th June 1887, repelled the objection to the competency of the reclaiming note, and sent the case to the Summar-roll.

On 25th June following, when the case was called in the Summar-roll, the reclaimers, Paton, Son, and Company, and others, argued;—The appeal

No. 158. under the 169th section was incompetent. The only mode of bringing a resolution dealing with an offer of composition was under the 138th and 139th sections * of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Under these sections the trustee might report the creditors' resolution to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff. Delay would be inevitable if an appeal under the 169th section were sanctioned, because until it was disposed of the trustee could not lodge his report under the 138th section. The resolution, indeed, required the approval of the Sheriff or of the Lord Ordinary to make it effectual. Such a question as the validity of the votes, which was the matter of dispute in the present appeal, was best brought up in the trustee's report. There was a recognised special form for a report by the trustee in this matter.¹ There were special provisions in the Bankruptcy Act providing for review on special questions. A resolution at the first general meeting of creditors was never taken before any Judge but by the trustee. Under the 77th section questions in regard to the personal protection of the bankrupt were brought by the trustee before the Sheriff.² There was nothing in Millar v. Dodd expressly to the effect that an appeal under the 169th section was incompetent, but this was implied (cf. Lord Neaves' opinion, 1 Macph., p. 72).

M'George v.
M'George's
Creditors.

The appeals contemplated by the 169th section were appeals on the merits. To allow an appeal under that section here would be to abolish the discretion which was vested in the trustee by the 138th and 139th sections. A power of review under the 169th section as well as under these would lead to anomalies. Different objections might be stated on each occasion. It would be to do violence to the general spirit and intention of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to hold that the appeal under the 169th section was competent.

The appellants, Miss M'George and others, argued;—Both remedies were competent under the Act, either by the 169th section, or by the 138th and 139th. The Lord President's opinion on the competency of the reclaiming note assumed the competency of the appeal under the 169th section. The practice also was in favour of it.³ Convenience, too,

* The 138th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, enacts,—“If at the meeting held after the examination of the bankrupt a majority in number and nine-tenths in value of the creditors there assembled shall accept such offer and security, a bond of caution for payment of the composition, executed by the bankrupt or his successors or the partners of a company, . . . and the proposed cautioner, shall be forthwith lodged in the hands of the trustee; and the trustee shall thereupon subscribe and transmit a report of the resolution of the meeting, with the said bond, . . . in order that the approval of the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff . . . may be obtained thereto; and if the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, after hearing any objections by creditors, shall find that the offer with the security has been duly made and is reasonable, and has been assented to . . . he shall pronounce a deliverance approving thereof. . . .”

The 139th section enacts,—“In like manner, at the meeting held after the examination of the bankrupt, or at any subsequent meeting called for the purpose . . . the bankrupt . . . may offer a composition to the creditors on the whole debts,” and if this is accepted by a majority in number and four-fifths in value of the creditors, “a bond of caution shall be lodged, and a report made, and a deliverance pronounced, all in the same manner and to the same effect as is hereinbefore provided.”

pointed out the same course, because there was often great delay before the trustee presented his report.¹ A resolution rejecting an offer of composition, or refusing personal protection to the bankrupt, would be appealable by the bankrupt under the 169th section; why should not a resolution approving it? It was not the case that a resolution accepting a composition offer required to be approved by the trustee to make it effectual.² The reasoning in Tennent v. Crawford (Jan. 12, 1878, 5 R. 433) was in point.³ In *Millar v. Dodd*⁴ there was no resolution of creditors, and that was the ground of the opinion of Lord Neaves, who alone expressed doubts as to the competency.

M'George v.
M'George's
Creditors.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no difficulty or doubt about the competency of this appeal. The words of the 169th section are very broad and general, and give a right of appeal to any party interested, whether creditor or bankrupt, or anyone else, "against the resolutions of creditors at meetings," as it is expressed. This is undoubtedly a resolution of creditors at a meeting, and upon a very important question. And the point to be determined on the merits, as I understand, is whether that resolution was carried by a requisite number and value of the creditors present, so that prima facie the words of the 169th section clearly cover the case.

But it is said that in consequence of the statutory provisions by which this resolution falls to be carried into effect under the 138th and 139th sections of the Act, there is a kind of implied exception of this resolution from the general rule of the 169th section. I do not see any sufficient ground for that argument. No doubt when a resolution is carried it falls upon the trustee to report it either to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, and it would be quite competent, when the case comes before either the Lord Ordinary or to the Sheriff on that report, to raise such a question as the Court has before it now. This must be conceded, but it does not by any means follow that because there is such a remedy to a person dissatisfied with the resolution, he has not also the separate remedy of coming to this Court by appeal. The one remedy is not in the least degree inconsistent with the other. There are two modes in which he may obtain the redress which he desires, and both of them are competent. There is no anomaly in our holding this.

LORD SHAND.—The terms of the 169th section of the Act are so general as to apply to all resolutions which are passed at meetings of creditors. That being so, then undoubtedly this resolution which approves of an offer of composition is within the language of the section, and indeed it is one of the most important resolutions that can be passed by the creditors in bankruptcy proceedings. The question is whether, not by direct enactment, but by inference from other sections, there is anything to prevent an appeal being taken under that section against such a resolution. The argument is that the 138th section provides the only mode of review of a resolution accepting an offer of composition. It is provided by that section that the trustee shall report the resolution of the creditors accepting the composition, along with the necessary bond of caution, to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff for his approval, and that the creditors or any of them may then take objections before the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff pronounces his deliverance. Is it then further open to the creditors to take an appeal under the 169th section? The statute by the 70th section provides a special mode of reviewing the resolution of creditors appointing a trustee, but that is followed by a section (the 71st) directly providing that there shall be no appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff. Further, there appears to be no review open under the statute of a resolution of the creditors renewing the personal protection of the bankrupt in terms of the 77th section. It is said that review of a resolution accepting a composition offer is provided for specially under the 138th and 139th sections, and all other review is therefore excluded. But there is no language from which such exclusion can be clearly inferred as in the case of the election of a trustee, or the personal protection of a bankrupt. While it is contemplated by these sections that the same questions may be raised upon the report of the trustee as are now raised under this appeal, I am not prepared to hold that the implication derived from these sections is such as to deprive creditors of the benefit of the 169th section as well.

As I have said, the words of the 169th section are very general, and I think the argument for the respondents derives considerable force from the circumstance that a practice has grown up under which appeals under the 169th section against the resolutions of creditors accepting composition offers have been frequently entertained. Further, it is conceded that an appeal would be admissible against a resolution rejecting a composition offer, and it would be very difficult to hold that although such an appeal is good, an appeal is bad where an offer has been accepted. I therefore concur in the proposed judgment.

LORD ADAM.—We are dealing in this case with a resolution under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. It is called a "resolution passed at a meeting of creditors," but that means the same thing as a "resolution of the creditors." The 169th section enacts that "it shall be competent to appeal against the resolutions of the creditors at meetings either to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff." There is no limitation there as to the kind of resolutions which are to be appealed. But it has been argued that there are resolutions and resolutions—and that some are appealable under this section and some are not,—that there are some resolutions which require approval by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff in order to be operative, and that this is one of these, and cannot be appealed under the 169th section. I cannot find that there is any warrant in the Act of Parliament for such distinctions. These resolutions may be of a most important and serious kind, where a right of immediate appeal would be most valuable; and I have been clearly of opinion ever since the case was opened that this appeal under the 169th section is undoubtedly competent.

Strathie.

Bankruptcy Act, 1856—Election of trustee—Review of interlocutory judgment before appointment—Process.—In a sequestration a Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor disposing of certain objections to votes in the election of a trustee, and allowing a proof with reference to another objection. The candidate to whom the Sheriff's judgment was adverse appealed. Held that the Sheriff's judgment, in so far as it disposed of the objections, was final, and in so far as it allowed a proof, was incompetent.

At a meeting of creditors on the sequestrated estates of James Cunningham & Sons, bleachers, Barrhead, held in Paisley on 10th May 1887, Mr Robert Reid, C.A., and Mr David Strathie, C.A., were severally proposed for the office of trustee. Mr Reid had an apparent majority of the creditors in value to the amount of £3, 16s. 9d.

The proceedings having been reported to the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) objections were lodged by each candidate to certain votes.

The Sheriff-substitute, on 19th May 1887, pronounced an interlocutor, which, after sustaining an objection by Mr Strathie and repelling one objection by Mr Reid, proceeded,—“Further, as regards the objection stated by Mr Reid to the vote of Mr Thomas Anderson, merchant, Glasgow, before answer allows Mr Robert Reid a proof of his averments, and to Mr David Strathie a conjunct probation: Grants diligence against witnesses and havers, and appoints the proof to proceed within the Sheriff's Chambers, Paisley, on Tuesday, 24th current, at 10 A.M., and decerns.”

The effect of this interlocutor was to place Reid in a minority, unless his objection to Anderson's vote should be sustained.

Reid appealed to the Court of Session with the view of having the Sheriff's judgment altered in so far as adverse to him.

Counsel for Strathie contended that the appeal was incompetent under section 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856,* and argued;—No proof such as the Sheriff-substitute had allowed was admissible,¹ and that being so, the Sheriff ought to have proceeded to declare Strathie to be elected trustee, and if he had done so there could have been no appeal under the above section.

Argued for Reid;—The interlocutor was not final in the sense of the 71st section, because it did not contain an appointment of a trustee. And if it was appealable at all it was so in its entirety, and therefore it was admissible to attack any part of it, and to deal with the merits of the objections.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there has been a competition for the office of trustee in a sequestration. Objections were lodged in the usual manner under sec. 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, by each candidate against votes claimed by the other. The Sheriff-substitute heard parties upon these objections, and pronounced the interlocutor of 19th May 1887, which is now before us. That

* The 71st section is,—“The judgment of the Sheriff declaring the person or persons elected to be trustee or trustees in succession shall be given with the least possible delay, and such judgment shall be final, and in no case subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever.”

No. 159. interlocutor disposes of various objections which were stated, and it is in the usual form and in terms of the statute down to and including that part of it which repels the objection to the vote of Ross Robertson Auld and others. But then it deals with one objection stated by Reid to the vote of Thomas Anderson, merchant, Glasgow, which objection he was not able instantly to verify.

June 29, 1887.
Reid v.
Strathie.

In those circumstances the Sheriff-substitute, instead of repelling the objection, as he ought to have done, "allows Mr Robert Reid a proof of his averments, and to Mr David Strathie a conjunct probation." Now, it has been decided in several cases to which I need not separately refer that such allowance of proof is incompetent, and having in view these authorities that part of the interlocutor is beyond the power and jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and is not within the statute. That error being thus before us, I think our course is to quash that part of the interlocutor ante omnia. It is obvious that if the Sheriff-substitute had not fallen into the mistake of allowing a proof he would have proceeded in ordinary course to declare one of the candidates duly elected, and we ought therefore to send back the case to the Sheriff-substitute to complete the interlocutor. When that is done it will, I apprehend, be final, and not subject to any appeal quoad ultra.

We are not, by taking this course, affirming the competency of this appeal. It is the duty of the Court when such an irregularity is brought before it, consisting of an order which is beyond the statute and ultra vires, to put it right at once, and to send the case back to the Sheriff.

LORD MURE.—I concur. I agree that that part of the interlocutor which allows a proof is contrary to the rules which have been laid down in various cases in this Court, and that it cannot stand.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. In several recent cases the Court has decided that such proof as is here allowed is incompetent. If the objection had been one that admitted of instant verification by production of documents, or if a diligence had been asked to recover specified documents, the Sheriff might have allowed that. But that it is a proof at large which has been allowed. That is incompetent, and should not have been allowed.

LORD ADAM was absent on Circuit.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall as incompetent that part of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of date 19th May 1887, which allows a proof of the objection to the vote of Mr Thomas Anderson, and grants diligence: Remit to the Sheriff to complete his interlocutor in terms of the 70th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856: Find the respondent entitled to expenses: modify the same to the sum of £5, 5s., for which sum decern," &c.

Paterson. An antenuptial contract of marriage was entered into between M. them, whereby Mr Russell assigned and disposed to certain trustees a policy of assurance of £1000 for behoof of his intended wife in case she should survive him, but in case of her predecease, then for the children, if any, of the intended marriage. "And further, the said William Russell hereby assigns, disposes, conveys, and makes over to and in favour of the said Marion Paterson, his promised spouse, in case she shall survive him, the whole household furniture, books, plate, and other household plenishing and effects of every description, which now belong or shall at the time of his death belong to him, and that as her own absolute property." These were all the provisions made by Mr Russell.

On the other part, the intended wife assigned, conveyed, and made over "to and in favour of the said William Russell, her promised husband, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, All and Sundry the whole means and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging or indebted and owing to her, the said Marion Paterson, and all that she may acquire or succeed to during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, or that shall be belonging, owing, and indebted to her at the time of her death, with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour, and that as fully and effectually as if every particular of the said estate were herein particularly enumerated."

There were four children of the marriage, John James Russell, Marion Agnes Russell or Gardiner, Louisa Wingate Russell or Murray, and Helen Jessie Russell or Howatt.

The marriage subsisted till 29th August 1884, when it was dissolved by the death of Mr Russell.

Mrs Russell died intestate on 28th August 1886. Her estate, including the marriage-contract provisions of the policy of £1000, and furniture, was calculated to amount to £24,000, a large portion of which she acquired after the dissolution of the marriage.

Mrs Gardiner was appointed her mother's executrix-dative. A question then arose as to whether the whole estate of Mrs Russell, except so much of it as consisted of her marriage-contract provisions, fell in virtue of the conveyance by her in her marriage-contract to be paid over to the testamentary trustees of Mr Russell. They maintained that it did. On the other hand, Mrs Gardiner as her mother's executrix maintained that it did not, as did also the other daughters and their marriage-contract trustees, and the son Mr John James Russell. A special case was therefore stated for the judgment of the Court, Mr Russell's trustees being first parties, Mrs Gardiner as Mrs Russell's executrix being second party, John James Russell third party, and the three daughters and their marriage-contract trustees fourth parties.

All the parties except the first maintained that Mrs Russell's estate fell to be divided either as intestate estate among her four children as her next of kin, or alternatively, that her children were conditional institutes to their father under the destination in the marriage-contract, and as such entitled in their own right to their mother's estate.

The questions were:—“(1) Are the parties of the first part entitled to receive the estate of the said Mrs Marion Paterson or Russell (with the exception of the provisions in her favour in the said marriage-contract), and to administer the same as part of the estate of the deceased William Russell? (2) Does the estate of the deceased Mrs Marion Paterson or Russell fall to be administered as intestate estate, and to be divided accordingly among her children as her next of kin? Or—(3) Are the third party and his three sisters conditional institutes under the destination in the said antenuptial contract, and as such entitled in their own right to the estate of their mother?”

Argued for the first parties;—The terms of the marriage-contract left no room for doubt that the conveyance by the wife included three things—(1) her estate as at the date of her marriage; (2) her acquirenda stante matrimonio; (3) her whole estate which she might have when she died. She might indeed spend what she chose while she lived, but she had contracted as to the disposal of her whole means unspent and extant at her death. There was a material difference between the husband's conveyance and the wife's. He conveyed to her his household plenishing, plate, &c., “in case she shall survive him,” but it was significant that in her conveyance there were no analogous words “in case he shall survive her,” which, so far as it went, indicated that her gift was subject to no such qualification. Again, the threefold gift she made was clear from the use of the word “or,” which introduced the third branch of the gift. It was proposed on the other side to read “or” as equal to “and,” but that, even if admissible, went too far. It would reduce the conveyance of the acquirenda during marriage, a very common conveyance in contracts of marriage, so as to make it inapplicable during marriage, and applicable only to subjects which fulfilled the two conditions of being acquired stante matrimonio by the wife, and being also extant when she died. Again, it was proposed to give the words the meaning of being a conveyance only of property that was the wife's at the marriage, and came to her during it, and to treat the following words as merely explicative of the conveyance, and intended to provide for the event of the predecease. But then they were needless. The conveyance of acquirenda during marriage was complete without them, and provided quite sufficiently for her predecease. Further the words of exception, “with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour,” gave point to the argument that, as she made an exception in the clause in question of what her husband provided for her, she was intending to convey to him the rest. The conveyance too, was to the husband, “his heirs and assignees.” Now, these words used in a contract strengthened the argument that it was intended to give him a jus crediti from the first in the wife's property as at her death, and seemed also to indicate that it was in contemplation to provide for the event of the predecease of the husband whose heirs and assignees were to take his contract right if he died first. The cases of *Bell v. Cheape*¹ and *Earl of Fife v. Mackenzie*² were relied on on the other side to shew that a gift to A and his heirs and assigns, whom failing, to B, goes to B if A die before the testator, and thence it was inferred that as the husband predeceased the wife his representatives could not take, but the children would take as the wife's next of kin. That, however, ignored the distinction between contract and testamentary gift.³ For the same reason the children could not take as conditional institutes, which was their alternative contention.

No doubt there was a certain presumption against the contention of the first parties, and the Court would, if they could, read the deed as limiting the wife's conveyance to a conveyance for the purposes of the marriage only, and as conveying what came to the wife only during the marriage, instead of as a conveyance to the husband of all she might acquire many years after he died. That was the principle of the cases of Wardlaw,⁴ Carter v. Carter,⁴ Dickinson v. Dillwyn,⁴ and In re Edwards,⁴ cited on the other side. But in these cases the Court had found ground in the other parts of the deeds for escaping from the literal construction of a clause, and applying the presumption which was here excluded by the force of very simple and express provisions.

Argued for third and fourth parties;—It was an error to think there was a threefold conveyance. On the contrary, the so-called third head of the conveyance was a limitation of the conveyance of the funds the wife had when she married, and of those which she acquired stante matrimonio, to that portion she might happen to possess at her death, and on the assumption only that she predeceased her husband. Indeed, it was impossible to suppose that the conveyance should carry what she might succeed to long after she became, as she might have become, a childless widow. The Court would rather avoid such a construction as the first parties contended for (Wardlaw, Edwards, Carter and Dickinson, supra cit.),⁵ because it was improbable and unreasonable. No benefit could be derived from the clause of exception founded on on the other side, for the words were mere style taken from the Style Book,⁶ a reference to which shewed that they were really intended to apply to what was called the second head of conveyance, the acquirenda stante matrimonio. The Court would supply the words "in case he shall survive her" in the wife's conveyance. The very peculiarity of such words being absent from the wife's conveyance, though found in the husband's, occurred in the Earl of Fife v. Mackenzie, and the Court practically supplied them. That case could not quoad ultra be disposed of by saying it proceeded on a treatment of the deed as testamentary, as was argued on the other side, because both the opinions of some of the Judges and the interlocutors of Court went on grounds applicable to contract right. But, indeed, such cases as Bell v. Cheape (supra) were quite applicable. If the children did not take otherwise, they took as conditional institutes.

Russell's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case of considerable delicacy, and that delicacy is caused, I think, by bad conveyancing. The clauses of the marriage-contract before us appear to have been framed, one might say, in order to raise difficulty in its construction. But in deciding between the two competing constructions of that clause by which the wife makes a conveyance of her funds to her husband, I think that we must, to some extent, be guided by general considerations, as well as by the words of the deed. The general scheme of the marriage-contract is this. On his side, the husband conveys a policy of insurance for £1000 on his own life, and the sum contained in it to trustees; and that is the only trust-conveyance in the deed. Then the next provision is one by which the husband conveys, in favour of the wife directly, "the whole household furniture, books, plate, and other household plenishing and effects of every description which now belong, or shall at the time of his death belong, to him, and that as her own absolute property"; but that is all qualified by the words, "in case she shall survive him."

Then come the counter obligations undertaken by the wife, by which she "conveys and makes over from her, to and in favour of the said William Russell, her promised husband, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, all and sundry the whole means and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging, or indebted and owing to her, the said Marion Paterson, and all that she may acquire or succeed to during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, or that shall be belonging, owing, and indebted to her at the time of her death, with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour, and that as fully and effectually as if every particular of the said estate were herein particularly enumerated." Now, the trustees of the husband contend that there are three different branches of this conveyance by the wife to the husband—the first, of whatever she was possessed of at the time of the marriage; the second, of all she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage; and the third, of all belonging to her at her death. I do not think that is a sound construction of the marriage-contract. Undoubtedly, there is a distinction between the first subject conveyed and the second—what she had at her marriage is one subject, what she acquired during it is another. But, in what remains of the clause, there is no conveyance in direct terms of anything which is to be acquired by her between the termination of the marriage by the decease of the husband, if that should happen, and her own death. It is not what she might acquire during that period that is conveyed, but only things which might belong to her at her own death. These will comprehend the two former classes—things possessed by her at and during the marriage, if not consumed or expended by her; and it is therefore open to us to say that, when she speaks of things belonging to her at the time of her death, she is not necessarily speaking of subjects separate and distinct from those which belonged to her at her marriage and those which she might acquire during her marriage, but that the more natural construction is, that the words are merely applicable to the two sets of things already specially conveyed—that is, that it shall be a condition of her husband taking these things that they shall be her property at the time of her death. That is the most natural meaning to give the clause. And there is another point also not unworthy of notice. In the conveyance of furniture and household plenishing which is made by the husband there is the qualification, "in case she shall survive him," whereas these words, or rather words equivalent to them, are not in the conveyance by the wife to the husband. But I think they are to be implied from the very nature of the relation between the husband and wife and of the events contemplated. If the case had been put before these parties by their legal adviser at the time, "Suppose the husband died in a year or so after your marriage, and there are no children, is it your intention that the wife is to have nothing of her own, but that all of which she dies possessed—it may be many years afterwards—is to belong to the heirs and assignees of the husband," I think the answer would have been "Certainly not." And, indeed, it is a monstrous idea, for it would be to make a young widow without children penniless during the rest of her life. That is so repugnant to common sense that I think it would require the plainest words to induce us to give effect to such a proposition. Now, the words are not plain at all, but, on the contrary, on a fair construction of the marriage-contract—badly as it is expressed—it seems to me that it is clearly in the contemplation of the parties that this clause is to receive effect so far as the words "belonging or owing and indebted to her at the time of her death" are concerned as being a provision only in the event of the wife predeceasing the husband, or, in other words, of the husband's survivance.

There is not much aid to be derived from authority in a question of this kind; but the considerations which induced us to decide as we did in the case of Wardlaw (7 R. 1066) are, I think, quite applicable here. The conveyance made by the wife which we had to consider in that case was of "all and sundry whatsoever lands, heritages, sums of money, and other funds or effects, heritable and moveable, presently owing and belonging or which she, the said Margaret Richardson, may succeed to or acquire in any manner of way." These words are as general and comprehensive as any which we have here; yet we held them capable of being limited, so that what was acquired by the wife after the death of the husband could not be held to be comprehended within them. Now, the general considerations on which we there proceeded are quite applicable, as I have said, to this case. The one case does not rule the other, but the judgment in it is on the same lines as that which, I think, we ought to pronounce here. It is certainly not unworthy of notice also, that in the case of the Earl of Fife (3 Pat. App. 549), which has been quoted to us, there is the same contrast between the clause of conveyance by the husband and the clause of conveyance by the wife which we have in the present case. The husband there assigned and disposed to the wife, in case she should happen to survive him, and to her heirs, executors, and successors, "the whole moveable estate that should belong to him at the time of his death," while the conveyance by the wife to the husband was, that she became bound "to convey to her husband, his heirs and assigns, her whole heritable and moveable estate which presently do belong to her, or which may fall, accresce, or belong to her at any time hereafter during the subsistence of the marriage, and particularly," certain heritable estate, while, as to moveable estate, she "assigns and disposes to and in favour of the said Alexander Udny, Esq., her husband, his heirs and assignees, the whole moveable goods, gear, and effects which shall belong to her at the time of her death, including heirship moveables, household furniture, outright and insight plenishing, silver-plate, jewels, and linens, and, in general, all moveable goods and effects of whatever kind or denomination which shall belong to her at the time of her death." Notwithstanding the terms of that contract, the Court pronounced this judgment :—" Find that the clause in the said contract, giving to Alexander Udny Duff, his heirs and assignees, the moveable effects that should belong to Mrs Udny Duff at the time of her death, does not entitle the heirs or executors of Mrs Udny Duff to make any claim to these effects in competition with the Earl of Fife, the general donee of Mrs Udny Duff, or with Robert Duff of Fetteresso, who has entered a claim to some of them as a special legatee." So it appears that in that case the Court disregarded the fact that the wife's conveyance did not include the words, "in case he shall happen to survive her," and read the two clauses as if they both contained the same limitation. On these grounds, I am for answering the first question in the negative, the second in the affirmative, and the third in the negative.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that if we sustain the contention of the first parties we make over to the husband's representatives everything which the wife may have acquired after the dissolution of the marriage. In one reading of the words of the conveyance by her in the marriage-contract that construction may be given to them, but I think it is well settled by the case of Wardlaw, and the older case of Lord Fife, that, where such a clause, though it admits of such a construction, can also be read according to the more equitable construction by which it is held as applying to the wife's estate only at the marriage, and her acquirenda during it, that more equitable construction will receive effect. The same principle was, I think, acted on by the English Judges in the case of Edwards (L. R., 9 Ch. App. 97), which was quoted to us. That being so, I think the construction your Lordship proposes is consistent both with the general object of the contract and with the correlative clause by which the husband makes a conveyance in favour of the wife. Further, it is conceded that if we were to read "or" in the conveyance by the wife as equivalent to "and," the first parties' contention must be repelled. I am of opinion with your Lordship on the whole matter that the true construction is that the words apply to the wife's estate at the marriage and her acquirenda during it, and restrict the conveyance to the estate and acquirenda which are in existence at the time of the dissolution of the marriage.

LORD SHAND.—I think it is clear on general considerations that in the construction of a provision in a marriage-contract such as we have here nothing short of the most explicit and express words should be permitted to support a claim by the heirs and assignees of the predeceasing spouse to take the estate of the survivor, who may survive the dissolution of the marriage for many years, and enter into another marriage. The spouses with whose marriage-contract we are here concerned were married in 1857. Both of them lived for twenty-seven years,—the wife for twenty-nine years after their marriage. But the case may be figured of the husband dying the year after the marriage, in which case the claim would have been by his representatives to estate which the wife had possessed, or, it might be, acquired, during the twenty-seven years after his death. Every consideration of convenience, and, indeed, of propriety, should, I think, lead to the rejection of such a construction. No doubt such a conveyance as is here contended for by the husband's representatives might conceivably be made, for example, by words expressly assigning acquirenda after the dissolution of the marriage so far as not spent by the wife. But, in that case, there would probably be in the deed not only the words making the conveyance perfectly clear, but also in all probability the special reason for such an unusual provision would be stated, and the Court would give effect to it. But if the language will admit another construction, we ought so to interpret it. That is the principle of the English cases which were cited, and also of the case of Wardlaw and of the case of Fife. Taking the deed in that view, I have not felt much difficulty as to the decision of the question before us. It is no doubt possible to read the clause under discussion as conveying, first, the wife's property at the date of her marriage, second, her acquirenda during its subsistence, and third, her property at the date of her death, as if all three of these different subjects were intended to be conveyed. That is the one alternative view, and leads to the result for which the husband's representatives contend. But the clause may also be reasonably read in another way, and the first and strong observation to be made upon it is that when we come to the third part of it, the description of the property at her death is not a conveyance of all she might acquire after the dissolution of the marriage. That is said to be inferred from the words used, but I prefer to read the words as simply intended in a bungling form to be an amplification of the description of what she had already conveyed. She had given what she had at marriage and what she might acquire during it, and this third alternatively expressed clause is intended to be a sweeping up of what went before, and to be applicable to the case of her being the predeceaser. I am therefore for answering the second question in the affirmative.

Something was said as to the words "with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour." I think that was well met by the argument of Mr Murray that these were words of style to be found in the Juridical Styles, which were probably of no value, but, at anyrate, were really meant to qualify the second branch of the wife's conveyance, and not intended to affect or deal with the property belonging to her at the time of her death.

Therefore, on the whole matter, I have no difficulty in reading the words in question as meant to be applicable in case the wife predeceased the husband, just as in his conveyance the provision is expressly limited by the words "in case she shall survive him." In the case of his conveyance that is expressly stated; in hers I think it is stated by implication. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD ADAM was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, the second in the affirmative, and the third in the negative.

Writ—Description of lands—Description by reference—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 61, and schedule O.—In a description of lands by reference to a prior recorded deed, under the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 61, and schedule O, the omission to state the day of the month on which the prior deed was recorded will not invalidate the subsequent deed.

Writ—Description of lands.—A bond and disposition in security contained this description of the security subjects,—“All and Whole that piece of ground fronting Baker Street of Aberdeen, in the burgh and county of Aberdeen, being the subjects and others particularly described in the feu-charter thereof granted by” certain persons named and designed “in my favour, dated the 6th and 7th, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Aberdeen on the , all days of November 1882.” The foregoing were the only subjects in Baker Street, Aberdeen, belonging to the grantor. Held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that apart from the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 61, and schedule O, there was in the bond a sufficient description of the subjects.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
M.

ON 13th November 1882 Peter Murray, builder, Aberdeen, granted a bond and disposition in security for £1000 in favour of Miss Elizabeth Wood, in which the description of the security subjects was in the following terms:—“All and Whole that piece of ground fronting Baker Street of Aberdeen, in the burgh and county of Aberdeen, being the subjects and others particularly described in the feu-charter thereof granted by Basil John Fisher, residing now or lately in Aberdeen,” and certain other persons named and designed, “in my favour, dated the 6th and 7th, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Aberdeen on the , all days of November 1882.”

This bond and disposition in security was recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines on the 20th November 1882, the feu-charter referred to in the bond being similarly recorded on the same day but prior to the bond.

In January 1887 Murray's estates were sequestered, and a trustee appointed thereon.

In April 1887 the trustee presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for the approval of a scheme of ranking and division among the heritable creditors, under section 116 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

By this scheme the trustee, inter alia, proposed to disallow any ranking to Miss Wood on the price obtained for the subjects contained in her bond, on the ground that the bond was invalid in respect that, “in the opinion of the trustee, ex facie of this bond it is not possible to identify the subject of the security, there being a large extent of feuing ground on both sides of the said street called Baker Street, which feuing ground is to a great extent feued out and built upon. Further, the short description authorised by section 61 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act of 1874 having been adopted, it is absolutely essential that the date of recording the prior deed referred to, containing the particular description of the subjects, should be given, and that has been omitted.”

Miss Wood lodged objections, in which she maintained that both grounds of invalidity were unsound.

On 4th June 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) sustained the objections, appointed the trustee to rank the objector on the price of the subjects in Baker Street, Aberdeen, for the amount due under the bond, and No. 161. found her entitled to expenses.*

The trustee reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Where a person desired to take the benefit of a statute allowing a short mode of procedure instead of the form hitherto in use (and not abolished), he must adopt exactly the method prescribed by the statute.¹ Here the form given in the schedule had not been adopted, and the date was a blank. (2) Apart from the statute, there was not a sufficient description of the subjects here.²

Murray's
Trustee v.
Wood.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot see any reason for differing from the Lord Ordinary in his first ground of judgment, and therefore it is unnecessary to consider the other ground on which he proceeds.

The reference to the feu-charter is made in a bond dated 13th November, and the feu-charter referred to is dated the 6th and 7th November. It is plain, therefore, that the feu-charter had been obtained and the money advanced almost simultaneously, the builder not being able to complete his build-

* “OPINION.—(After narrating the description in the bond)—If the exact date of recording the feu-charter referred to had been inserted instead of being left blank, there can be no doubt that this description would have been sufficient under the provisions of the 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, sec. 61, which provides for the description of heritable subjects by reference to other deeds where the subjects are particularly described. But I regard what has been done in the present case as a substantial, if not exact, compliance with the provisions of that statute. The deed referred to is recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines, and is so recorded prior to the recording of the bond making reference to it; the reference made to it is such as will enable anyone reading to find it, for it is said to be recorded in the month of November 1882. Further, it appears from the bond that the deed referred to was executed on the 6th and 7th days of November 1882, while the bond in which the reference is made was recorded on the 20th November 1882, so that the search for the deed referred to is limited to the period between 7th and 20th November 1882. This appears to me to be such a reference as will enable anyone to find the deed referred to, and I think the statute does not require more to be done. No doubt the statute requires the reference to be as nearly as may be in the terms of the schedule thereto annexed, which runs ‘recorded in the on the day of .’ But, in my opinion, it would be straining the Act (in the present case with an unjust result) to say that no reference will fulfil its requirements unless the exact day of recording is stated. The purpose of the Act was to save the necessity for long description where such descriptions could be got from a deed duly recorded, and which was referred to in such terms as would enable anyone to find it.

“But assuming that I have taken too liberal a view of the requirements of the Act, I am still of opinion that the trustee is wrong. The description of the property is given in a heritable bond for the purpose of identifying the subject of the security, and, in my opinion, there can be no doubt about the identity of the subjects over which the bonds in question were granted.

“In the first place, the subjects are described as Murray’s property in Baker Street, Aberdeen, and it is not said that Murray had any property in that street except one. In the second place, it is not only Murray’s property in Baker Street, but the property conveyed to him by certain persons, fully designed by a certain deed fully described. I think these things, which appear ex facie of the bonds, are quite sufficient to identify the subject of the security.—Cattanach’s Trustee v. Jamieson, 11 R. 972.”

Now, in these circumstances, the deeds had to be registered in order to make the transaction effectual, and what was done was this: Both deeds were taken to the register on the same day—the 30th November—in order to be registered, instructions being given to have the feu-charter put on record first, so as to preserve the proper order between the deed referred to and the deed containing the reference. All that was quite regular, and in terms of the statute, the only omission being that the precise day of recording the feu-charter was not mentioned in the description in the bond, and the question is whether that is fatal to the validity of the bond. I am of opinion that it is not. I think it is clear that the reference given in the bond is sufficient to enable any person to know that the feu-charter referred to is to be found in the portion of the register applicable to the county of Aberdeen, and somewhere between the date of the charter and the date of recording the bond, that is to say, something like an interval of a fortnight. Therefore, the facilities for finding the deed referred to are, I think, ample. If there had been any difficulty in finding the deed referred to that would have been a substantial and important objection, but if there is no such difficulty, then I think the objection resolves itself into a technical objection as to whether the provisions of the statute have been literally complied with. Now, no doubt the schedule contemplates that the deed containing the reference should set out the date of the deed referred to, but whether the precise day must be set out as well as the month and the year, I cannot quite discover. In the schedule the day is left blank, and the section of the Act which incorporates the schedule says nothing, but merely refers to the schedule, directing, I observe, that the description is to be “in, or as nearly as may be in, the form set forth in the schedule.” I do not say that the day of the month should not have been filled in, but I cannot think that its omission constitutes such a violation of the statute as will infer the nullity of the bond.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

 Brough v.
 Adamson.

Husband and Wife—Destination—Conjunct fee and liferent—Property coming from wife's family.—A father by an inter vivos deed gratuitously disposed to himself in liferent for his liferent use alienably, and to his daughter and her husband “in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children” of the marriage equally share and share alike, “whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver” of the spouses, certain heritable property belonging to him. The husband was the longest liver of the spouses, and he was survived by children of the marriage. Held that under the destination no fee ever vested in the husband.

By a disposition dated 9th January 1834, William Greig, residing in St Cuthbert Street, Edinburgh, “for the love, favour, and affection which I have and bear to Lillias Greig or Brough my daughter, spouse of William Brough [primus], . . . and to the said William Brough, as well as to the children procreated or to be procreated of the marriage betwixt them, and for certain other good causes and considerations” disposed to himself in liferent for his liferent use alienably, "and to the saids Lillas Greig or Brough and William Brough, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children procreated or to be procreated of the marriage betwixt them equally share and share alike, whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver of the saids Lillas Greig or Brough and William Brough in fee," a shop, dwelling-house, and others, consisting of two stories, situated in Morrison Street, Edinburgh, all then possessed by Brough, together with the ground on which they stood, which shop, dwelling-house, and others composed the entire eastmost half of a tenement of two dwelling-houses of two stories and four apartments each, feued by James Marshall, builder, and forming part of the lands of Orchardfield; "declaring as it is hereby expressly provided and declared that the subjects hereby disposed shall not be sold or burdened at any time during the joint lives of the saids Lillas Greig or Brough and William Brough, except by their mutual consent, nor shall the rents of said subjects be affectable by the debts of the said William Brough, or by the diligence of his creditors during the lifetime of the said Lillas Greig or Brough, which declaration is hereby directed to be engrossed in the infettment to follow hereon."

Brough v.
Adamson.

Infettment was taken on this disposition in favour of "the said William Greig, Lillas Greig or Brough, and William Brough, for their respective rights of fee and liferent aforesaid."

Greig died in 1846.

Lillas Greig or Brough died in 1873, being survived by her husband and by one son and four daughters.

Brough, believing himself to be proprietor of the subjects, drew the rents and treated them as his own till his death in 1880. By his settlement he conveyed it with his other subjects in that street to his son William Brough secundus, who also treated the subjects in question as his own. He died in 1885, having previously entered into a contract of sale of the property. His son William Brough tertius made up a title as heir to him, and offered a conveyance. The purchaser declined to take the title, doubting whether the fee was really in William Brough primus, and application was made to the four sisters of William Brough secundus, the only children of William Brough primus other than William Brough secundus, to sign the disposition as consenters. They then took advice as to their rights, and were advised that the fee of the eastmost half of the tenement had vested in their mother Lillas Greig or Brough under the disposition of 9th January 1834, and that they were entitled to the same to the extent of four-fifths pro indiviso shares, as along with William Brough tertius, heirs of provision in special of her.

A special case was then stated,—William Brough tertius being first party, and the daughters of William Brough primus being second parties,—to have the opinion and judgment of the Court on the question: "Whether, under the said disposition by William Greig, dated 9th January 1834, the fee of the eastmost half of the tenement in Morrison Street was vested in the said William Brough primus, or in the said Lillas Greig or Brough?"

Argued for the first party;—The fee of the eastmost half of the tenement in Morrison Street, vested not in the wife, but in the husband. In the first place, the consideration of the deed applied to him as much as to the wife. Her father, the disponent, was moved by the love, favour, and affection which he bore to her "and to" the husband, as well as to their children. In the next place, the ultimate destination was to the "heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver" of the spouses, and the husband was the longest liver. There was nothing at all in the deed to lead to the view that the wife was favoured rather than the husband. Now, the husband was dignior persona, and even during their joint lives before it was seen who was to be the longest liver the fee was in him. Further, his assignees, he having been the longest liver, were the persons favoured. The destination most like that under discussion was that construed in Fead v. Maxwell,¹ where one of the spouses, being that one whose heirs and assignees were favoured, was held to be fiar, "not because the substitution did terminate upon her heirs, but because it was in favour of her heirs and assignees, and none but who is fiar can assign." The general canons of construction of such destinations were stated by Erskine.² The cases in which the wife has been held to be fiar were illustrations of the doctrine there stated.³ The case of Myles differed from the present, in respect that the property there was the wife's own originally, not as here the gift of one who, though her father, shewed no preference for her over the husband. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK pointed out that no fee was given to the longest liver, but only to the heirs and assignees of the longest liver, and suggested that it might be argued that there was a joint fee in the spouses.] Such a construction was favourable to the first party. There was in that view a joint fee in the spouses while they lived, with a right of accretion to the longest liver, who was the husband. The declaration that the subjects should not be burdened during the joint lives of the spouses, nor the rents be affectable by the husband's creditors while the wife lived, was also favourable to that view. In any other view, the difficulty had to be met, either by the one side or the other, that the heirs and assignees of a person who might be, and in this case actually was, only a liferenter were the fiars.

Argued for second parties;—The general principle was wider than the first party admitted, and it applied to this case. It was accurately stated in Fraser on Husband and Wife, ii. 1428-29, that while the husband was in dubio fiar in such conjunct destinations, the fee was "in that party through whom the subject originally came, so that if it belonged to the wife or her father, and be destined to the husband and the wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and to their heirs, the wife is fiar." The case of Myles, having the true scope of the principle in view, was stronger than the present. The same doctrine was borne out by other authorities.⁴ The declaration founded on by the first party, that the subjects were not to be burdened during the joint lives, nor to be affectable by the husband's debts while the wife lived, was surplusage, and it was, in any view, as consistent with a fee in the wife as with a fee in the husband. In the case of Blair,⁴ the subject came from the wife's father.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises questions which I have found to be of some difficulty. The only question to which I intend to address myself at present is that which is raised by the first question of law stated in the special case, which is,—“Whether, under the said disposition by William Greig, dated 9th January 1834, the fee of the eastmost half of the tenement in Morrison Street was vested in the said William Brough primus, or in the said Lilius Greig or Brough?" If we decide that question to the effect of finding that the fee of these subjects was vested in Lilius Greig or Brough then there arises another question, but at present the only question is, where was the fee? Was it in Lilius Greig, or in her husband?

No. 162.

Brough v.
Adamson.

The case relates to a branch of law on which there has been much decision—the law of conjunct fee and liferent.

The facts are simply these. There seem to have been three William Brouchs, and William Brough tertius, the first party to this case, is the grandson of William Brough primus. William Brough primus married Lilius Greig, and on 9th January 1834 her father William Greig executed the disposition, the construction of which is now in question. By that deed he conveyed to his daughter and her husband certain heritable subjects in Edinburgh, and the destination was in the following terms,—“I hereby give, grant, alienate, and dispose from me, my heirs and successors, to myself in liferent for my liferent use allenary, and to the saids Lilius Greig or Brough and William Brough in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children procreated or to be procreated of the marriage betwixt them equally share and share alike, whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver of the saids Lilius Greig or Brough and William Brough in fee.” Now, the question arises whether the daughter or her husband took the fee of these subjects under that destination.

The theory of the law of conjunct fee and liferent in Scotland was at one time supposed to be analogous to that of joint tenancy in England; that is to say, that there was a joint fee in both the spouses during their life, and an accretion of the fee to the survivor of them. But that has now for a long time been discarded, and it is now held that a destination to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent gives the fee to one or other of them, and only the liferent to the other. The only question therefore is, who has the fee? There have been various tests applied to solve this question, some of them somewhat inconsistent with each other. In the first place, the presumption is that the fee is in the husband, unless the contrary be shewn, and much has also been made to depend upon the side of the house from which the property came, whether the wife's side or the husband's. Certainly, if the deed was granted by a stranger, then the presumption is that the fee was in the husband. But it may be shewn from the circumstance of who was the granter of the deed that the fee was not meant to be in the husband, and then the presumption is shifted and the fee held to be vested in the wife. A good deal, too, has been held to rest on what is the ultimate destination of the subjects under the deed. Now, that is a most important element here. In this particular case the deed conveying the property came from the wife's side. It was her father who conveyed the property to the spouses, and the ultimate destination was to the children of the marriage, and only in the event of there being no children of the marriage to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver of the spouses.

I must say the question is not unattended with difficulty, for the husband was the survivor, and it was said for the first party that if there had been no children of the marriage his heirs would have taken the fee, which is undoubtedly true.

But I think the point is concluded for us by the case of Myles, 12th February 1857, 19 D. 408, quoted to us from the bar, and the case of Blair, 5 B. S. 335, which was also referred to. I think that if these cases were well decided there can be no doubt here. The case of Myles was even a stronger one than the present, because the disposition of the property there in question was executed by two sisters who held certain property pro indiviso, and resolved to divide it and grant conveyances of part to one of them and her husband, and of the other part to the other and her husband. Thus, the conveyance in favour of one of them, Mrs Calman, was granted by the wife herself and her sister, and it was "to and in favour of the said Ann Ritchie (Mrs Calman) and John Calman, and the longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the child or children procreate or to be procreate betwixt them, which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver, her or his heirs and assignees whomsoever, in fee." So that was as nearly as possible the same case as we have here. Lord Benholme in that case delivered a most able and exhaustive opinion, in which all the cases were carefully considered—a complete repertory of the law upon the whole subject—and he came to the conclusion that the wife was the fiar. With regard to this ultimate destination to the children of the marriage, whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver, Lord Benholme says, "that the survivor is here called to the fee only upon failure of children, which is inconsistent with the notion that the fee was vested in the survivor by the earlier part of the clause. According to the pursuers' argument, the surviving husband takes the fee both as institute and afterwards as substituted to the children. Whereas the sounder view seems to be that in the earlier part of the clause the survivor as survivor takes merely a liferent, while in the latter part, where he is called along with his heirs and assignees, he takes a fee as a substitute to the children. The children being thus in the destination preferred to the survivor qua survivor, the primary fee must be held to remain with the mother, the true proprietrix, to whom the children are heirs of provision." So here the truth is that the destination to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver is only a special destination in the event of there being no children of the marriage. I think that the fee was never in the husband, but was in the wife, Lilius Greig.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—Apart from authority, the first of the questions presented in this case would be difficult of decision; but fortunately, as I think, there is authority by which it is governed. There is first the case of Blair v. Henderson, June 16, 1757, 5 Brown's Supp. 335, and also the case of Myles v. Calman, Feb. 12, 1857, 19 D. 408. It may, no doubt, be said, and indeed at the debate was said, that the latter of these cases was distinguishable from the present, because there the subjects conveyed were conveyed by the wife. They were her own property; and consequently there was room for the contention that there was a stronger presumption that the fee was to go to her heirs than in the present case, where the property conveyed was not the wife's, but was the property of her father. This argument, however, is met and is displaced by the former case which I have cited, where the property conveyed was the property not of the wife, but of her father. Taken together, these decisions seem to me decisive of the present controversy, and consequently, in my opinion, the answer to the first question must be to the effect proposed by your Lordship.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT answered the question by finding that the fee of the subjects mentioned therein was in Lilius Greig or Brough.

v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

Ship—Charter-party—Guarantee that vessel should carry a certain dead weight of cargo.—By charter-party for a voyage it was stipulated that the vessel (then at sea) should proceed to G., and there load all such goods and merchandise as the charterers should tender alongside for shipment, including machinery, the dimensions of the largest pieces thereof being specified; but not beyond what the ship could reasonably stow and carry; that the charterers should pay a slump freight for the voyage, of £2200; that the “owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo”; that, “should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made” from the freight; and that a regular stevedore, to be appointed by the charterers, should be employed by the owners to stow the cargo, “to be paid by and to be under the direction of the master, who is responsible for improper stowage.” The charterers tendered 2000 tons of cargo, consisting partly of pieces of machinery, partly of coal, and partly of general goods. Had the coal and the machinery been stowed together the whole cargo tendered could have been loaded, but as the coals and the machinery were stowed in separate holds, only 1691 tons were shipped.

In an action for payment of the balance of the freight, which the charterers refused to pay except under a deduction in respect of the 309 tons not shipped, held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the guarantee that the vessel should carry not less than 2000 dead weight of cargo implied not merely that she should have a carrying capacity of that amount, but that she should actually carry the cargo tendered provided it was of such a description as could, to that weight, be stowed on the vessel; and that as the vessel could have carried the whole cargo tendered if the machinery and the coals had been stowed together, although that was an improper mode of stowage without the consent of the owners of the machinery and of the coals, the charterers were entitled to the deduction claimed, the duty of obtaining the consent of the owners of the machinery and the coals being on the shipowners and not on the charterers.

On a reclaiming note the Court (dis. Lord Rutherford Clark) adhered to the result of the Lord Ordinary’s judgment, but differed on the construction of the charter-party, holding that the clause of guarantee imported a guarantee of the vessel’s carrying capacity merely, but that the clause providing for a pro rata reduction applied if the vessel actually carried less than 2000 tons through no fault on either side, which the majority of the Court were of opinion was the case.

Lord Rutherford Clark agreed with the Lord Ordinary’s construction of the charter-party, but, being of opinion that the charterers were in fault in not obtaining the consent of the owners of the machinery and the coals to these articles being stowed together, thought that no deduction from the freight should be allowed.

By charter-party, dated London, 28th May 1886, it was mutually agreed between Robert Mackill & Company of Glasgow, managing owners of the steamship “Lauderdale” (then at sea), therein described as of 1134 tons nett register, and 1738 tons gross register, and Wright Brothers & Company, merchants of London, inter alia, as follows:—“That the said steamship . . . shall with all convenient speed proceed to such loading quay berth in Glasgow in such dock as ordered, and there ^{and} in the River as required by charterers, load from the factors of the said charterers all such goods and merchandise * as the said charterers or their agents shall tender alongside for shipment (including acids on deck to the extent of 10 tons weight if required by charterers), not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, water, and furniture, the charterers having the full reach of the vessel's hold and 'tween decks (bunkers and engine-room space only excepted), with liberty to remove stanchions, ladders, and wooden bulkheads if required. The whole of the vessel to be at the disposal, except room for 80 tons extra bunker coal, of the charterers for the conveyance of goods, live stock, dogs, &c., excepting such room as is required for the accommodation of the crew and stores for the voyage. Owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo. The extra expense (if any) of putting on board, stowing and taking out any piece or package exceeding 3 tons weight to be borne by the charterers. Should stock or dogs be shipped, owners to see they are properly fed and attended to during the voyage, the ship finding water only, charterers supplying the stalls ^{and}/_{and} kennels and food. . . . A regular stevedore and clerks as customary, appointed by the charterers, to be employed by the owners to stow and take account of all goods received on board, with the measurements, &c., to be paid by and to be under the direction of the master, who is responsible for improper stowage. . . . Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at merchants' risk and expense, and being so loaded, shall, on being despatched by charterers, therewith proceed under steam via the Suez Canal to Kurrachee, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same according to the custom of the port or ports on being paid freight as follows,—say for the use and hire of the said steamer a lump sum of £2200, say two thousand two hundred pounds, in full of all port charges and pilotage. . . . Should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made from the first payment of freight."

In pursuance of this charter-party Wright Brothers & Company tendered 2000 tons of cargo for shipment, including pieces of machinery not exceeding the measurements, &c. specified on the margin of the charter-party, and two lots of coal of respectively 100 and 270 tons weight. The remainder of the cargo was general goods. The machinery and the coal were stowed in separate holds, and being so stowed, the vessel was able to take on board only 1691 tons of the cargo tendered; had the machinery and the coals been stowed together, so that the coal filled up the interstices of the machinery, the whole 2000 tons tendered could have been loaded. The vessel left Glasgow with only 1691 tons on board.

Wright Brothers paid certain sums to account of freight, but claimed to be entitled to retain from the balance a sum in respect of the 309 tons short-shipped.

Mackill & Company and the other owners thereupon, on 2d November 1886, brought an action against Wright Brothers & Company for payment of the full balance.

The material points at issue were these,—(1). The construction of the pursuers' guarantee in the charter-party that the vessel should carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo. On that point the pursuers contended that all they had guaranteed was that the vessel should have particular part of the body of the document, was the following :—"Including machinery, the largest pieces of which measure about say,"—then followed the measurements, number of pieces, and weights.

a carrying capacity of 2000 tons dead weight, i.e., that she should be able to carry some cargoes of that weight, but not that she should be able to carry any cargo of 2000 tons which the defenders might choose to offer. The defenders contended that the guarantee imported that the vessel should be able to carry 2000 tons of any cargo (subject to the conditions as to machinery), provided it was a cargo reasonably to be expected for the voyage. (2) The question whether the duty of obtaining the consent of the owners of the coal and of the machinery to these goods being stowed together lay upon the shipowners or upon the charterers, assuming (what all the Judges held proved) that that would have been improper stowage without such consent. On this question each party maintained the other was in fault in not having obtained the consent of the owners of the machinery and the coals.

On 16th March 1887, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) after a proof, the results of which sufficiently appear from the opinions, gave decree against the defenders for the portion of the balance of the freight for which they admitted liability, and quoad ultra assolized them.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question to be decided is, what is the meaning and effect of the clause in the charter-party by which the owners guarantee 'that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo.' It is maintained for the pursuers that that clause is only a guarantee that the vessel could carry 2000 tons dead weight of cargo, but not a guarantee that she would carry that quantity on this particular voyage. I do not, however, so read the clause. To me its language is plain and unambiguous; and I think it means exactly what it says, namely that the ship shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight, and that upon the voyage with reference to which alone the parties were contracting. Had the carrying capacity of the vessel been the matter guaranteed, the clause could and would have been expressed differently. The other clause of the charter-party, which deals with the quantity of cargo, appears to me to support this view. It is there stipulated that if the ship should not carry the guaranteed dead weight, a reduction is to be made in the freight proportionate to that part of the cargo not carried. The comparison is to be made between what the owners have guaranteed the vessel shall carry, and that which in point of fact is carried, not between what is carried and the carrying capacity of the vessel. Taking the charter-party as a whole, I am of opinion that the defenders agreed to a slump freight, on the guarantee that for that freight 2000 tons dead weight of cargo should be carried, and that if less than that weight was carried the slump freight should suffer reduction in the proportion which the cargo not carried bore to the 2000 tons.

"But even if the pursuers were right in the view for which they contend, the result is not different. Let it be that what was guaranteed was that the vessel could carry 2000 tons. It is also bargained that if the vessel 'should not carry the guaranteed dead weight as above,' the freight should suffer abatement. It is certainly the same thing that is dealt with in both clauses as guaranteed; and so, whether the 2000 tons is the guaranteed capacity, or guaranteed cargo, the freight is to suffer abatement 'should the vessel not carry it.' The vessel did not carry more than 1691 tons, and therefore the freight effeiring to 309 tons falls to be deducted from the slump freight, provided that the short shipment is not attributable to the defenders. I think, however, that the owners' guarantee is subject to the implied condition that the charterers shall tender for shipment 2000 tons of cargo, and cargo of such a description as could, to that weight, be stowed in the vessel.

"There is no doubt that 2000 tons of cargo was tendered to the pursuers, and in my opinion it was cargo that could have been stowed in the 'Lauderdale.' Among the cargo there were two lots of coal, consisting respectively of 100 and 270 tons. These coals were placed in holds 3 and 4, and occupied space which would otherwise have been available for other goods. The defenders say that the coal should have been stowed, as was customary, among the machinery in holds 1 and 2, the size and character of the machinery making it inevitable that

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, although I am not quite prepared to affirm entirely some of the large spaces should be left unoccupied in the holds where it was stowed. It is out of the manner and place in which the coals were stowed that the whole difficulty between the parties has arisen, for if the coals had been stowed among the machinery (as could easily have been done), the after holds would have afforded space for at least 309 tons more cargo—that is, the whole cargo not shipped. It is proved that it is quite customary to stow coals among heavy pieces of machinery, provided that the owners or shippers of both coal and machinery consent to this being done. Without such consent it is not customary, and would be improper stowage, for the consequences of which the owners would be liable, not only at common law, but also under the stipulations of the charter-party in question. The pursuers say that they had no right to stow the coals among the machinery unless the consent of the shippers of both had been given, and that this was not given. On the other hand, the defenders say that they had nothing to do with the stowage of the cargo—that their whole obligation was to put the cargo alongside—and that if any consents were necessary to enable the pursuers to stow the cargo, it was their business to get such consents. Further, the defenders say (and I think it is proved), that they did consent, as owners of the 270 tons of coal, to its being stowed among the machinery, at a time when this could quite well have been done at an expense to the pursuers of less than £40. I confess I have had some difficulty with this part of the case, but in the end have come to the conclusion that the pursuers were in the wrong. I think they took and acted upon a false view of their duty and obligation to the defenders. Their view was practically this—‘There is the ship—put in her what you can. We have no responsibility in the matter’—whereas their duty, in my opinion, undoubtedly was to stow and carry the 2000 tons tendered to them, if it could be done, in order to earn the freight.

“It is said by Mr Craig, the stevedore, that he frequently asked for small cargo or broken stowage, and complained to the defenders’ agent of the want of it; and also that, if he had got suitable cargo, he could have put about 400 tons more on board than was carried by the ship. The defenders’ agent says he never heard of any such complaints. Both witnesses seemed to me truthful and frank; I cannot give the evidence of the one any preference over the evidence of the other. But in this conflict of statement I cannot hold it proved that the pursuers ever complained of the want of broken stowage. Even if they did, and assuming it to be the case that at some time there was a want of small goods for broken stowage, it would not alter my judgment. The defenders were not bound to supply cargo either of the kind or at the time demanded by the pursuers. They were bound to give 2000 tons of cargo (the selection or choice of which lay entirely with the defenders) which could be stowed in the ‘Lauderdale,’ and to place it alongside within ten days of the vessel’s being ready to receive it, or pay demurrage. No claim for demurrage is made, and therefore there is no question about the cargo being tendered in time; and as regards the rest of their obligation, the defenders did tender 2000 tons of cargo, which could have been stowed had the pursuers taken the trouble necessary to enable them to do it in a certain way. But how it was stowed, and where, was their business, not the defenders’.

“There is no question here raised of breach of contract on either side, or any claim in respect of such breach. The whole question is, What are the contract rights of parties under the charter-party? These, I think, are not doubtful. The pursuers undertook that their vessel would, or at all events could, carry 2000 tons dead weight of cargo for a slump freight, and it was agreed that if the vessel carried less than the specified weight, the freight should suffer a pro rata reduction. The pursuers’ vessel has only carried 1691 tons in point of fact, and left behind 309 tons of cargo tendered for shipment. The short shipment has not been caused by the fault of the defenders, and therefore I think they are entitled, under the charter-party, to the reduction which they claim.”

grounds on which he has proceeded. The case turns upon the construction of the charter-party, and upon certain facts in regard to the stowage of the cargo which lie within a very moderate compass. No. 163.

v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

It seems that the charter-party, which was executed in 1886, contained certain clauses on which substantially the dispute between these parties has arisen. The steamer was a large one, and the charter-party contains among other clauses one to this effect:—"Owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo." Then, it provides "a regular stevedore and clerks as customary, appointed by the charterers to be employed by the owners to stow and take account of all goods, received on board with the measurements, &c., to be paid by and to be under the direction of the master, who is responsible for improper stowage." Then, in regard to freight it provides—"And deliver the same according to the custom of the port or ports on being paid freight as follows, say for the use and hire of the said steamer a lump sum of £2200 in full of all port charges and pilotage." Then it provides the mode in which the freight is to be paid; and further on, the charter-party provides—"Should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made from the first payment of freight."

These are the clauses on which the case turns, and I am of opinion, in the first place, that the guarantee contained as to the carrying capacity of the vessel was a guarantee that the vessel was able to carry 2000 tons of dead weight. For the owners to guarantee that she should carry that weight of any cargo would be unreasonable. Then there is the clause providing for a pro rata deduction from the freight. I take that to mean that the freight is to be paid on the cargo actually carried, whatever that may be, and that if the cargo actually carried does not come up to 2000 tons, an abatement of the freight payable and calculated on the tonnage is to be made. And the provision does not seem an unreasonable one, because of course it was the interest both of the owners and of the charterers that the vessel should carry as much as possible—of the owners, in order that they might get their freight calculated on that tonnage, and the charterers, that they might have the most profitable use of the vessel. Therefore, it was quite a reasonable provision that while the vessel was capable of carrying 2000 tons, and was guaranteed reasonably to do so, the freight should be paid for in proportion to the actual tonnage of cargo carried. Of course that view implies that there is no fault on either side. If the owners, by improper stowage or otherwise, have diminished improperly the carrying capacity, then unquestionably the charterers will have a claim against them. On the other hand, there are many contingencies in the course of the voyage of a large vessel of this kind that might prevent the vessel carrying up to the 2000 without fault on any part, and it is to meet these contingencies that this clause has been introduced.

Such I take to be the actual meaning and intention of the charter-party, and now, how is application of that meaning to be made to the particular facts? The facts that require to be attended to are simply these—The stevedore was appointed by the charterers and paid by the owners. There was a certain quantity of coals taken on board, and there was also a certain quantity of machinery that had to be stowed on board; and the stevedore, acting upon his own responsibility, put the machinery into one part of the hold of the vessel, and the coals into the other. Unquestionably by so doing a good deal of space was occupied by the machinery which might have been occupied by ordinary cargo. One can easily understand how a difficulty on such a matter might arise. Complaint was made after this was done, but not before, that the stevedore had not packed the coals along with the machinery so as to fill up the interstices of space. It rather appears that this might have been done, but on the other hand, it does not appear that there was any duty on the part of the stevedore to do it. On the contrary, the evidence is clear that it was an arrangement which might be injurious both to machinery and to coals, and the stevedore says he never thought of doing so unless the owners of the cargo desired it. In this case apparently the owners of the cargo did desire it, but they did not express their desire until after the thing was done, and ultimately the dispute went off upon who should pay the expense of any alteration involved in the removal of coals from the place in which they had been stowed. I am of opinion that there has been no sufficient evidence that the stevedore did anything but what was reasonable and right in the stowage. If the charterers had sooner expressed their view he might have done otherwise, but I am not prepared to say that there was any failure on his part, and there was no fault on the part of the defenders. Therefore, the question really arises on the terms of the charter-party, and I am of opinion that, as the vessel did not carry cargo up to the 2000 tons, freight is not chargeable on that amount. I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

v. Wright

LORD YOUNG.—I also agree in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, although, like your Lordship, I am not able to concur in all the reasons mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's note. At the same time, I am not sure that my dissent from his reasoning is of exactly the same character as your Lordship's. I think there was here no blame imputable to the shipowners in the matter of stowage. I think they stowed the cargo that was presented to them properly, and that under the circumstances they would not have acted properly had they stowed it otherwise. The result was, however, that they were only able to put on board 1691 tons of the cargo which was presented, which was 309 tons short of the guaranteed dead-weight carrying power of the ship. That raises the question—and it is really the only question in the case—whether, under these circumstances, there is a claim for deduction from the stipulated freight to an extent corresponding to this 309 tons.

There are two provisions in the charter-party upon which the question depends. The one is that which guarantees the ship shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo. The other is the provision that should the vessel not carry the guaranteed weight as above mentioned any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata deduction per ton made from the freight.

Now, I do feel great difficulty in the case. I see great force in the view that the owners only guaranteed that this ship was of capacity to carry dead weight up to the 2000 tons, and that there was no failure with respect to that guarantee merely because the particular cargo tendered when properly stowed could be received on board only to the extent of 1691 tons. If you present a cargo which could be properly stowed only to the weight of 1600 odd tons, that does not shew the vessel is not of the guaranteed dead-weight carrying capacity, because whatever the dead-weight carrying capacity of a ship may be, it is quite plain that it will not carry any cargo you like to suggest up to that weight. The area of a ship will not permit it. Even when the cargo is stowed and packed proparly, the vessel may not accommodate anything like 2000 tons. On the other hand, No. 163. the considerations are strong that this was no extraordinary cargo—it was exactly such as was expected, namely, coals and machinery. There was, however, no fault on the part of the shipowners. They were responsible for the proper stowage. They stowed properly, and found that with proper stowage she could only carry 1691 tons. That puts all right in so far as they are concerned. Then the charterers, on their part, presented the very cargo which was expected, and just as the shipowners were disappointed by finding that they could not stow it up to the carrying power of the ship by 309 tons, so the charterers were disappointed by having 309 tons of their cargo left behind. Now, that is a kind of case which one would expect to find provided for in a charter-party. The intended cargo is stowed, but in the result they find that 309 tons must be left behind. Now, that being the actual case which has happened, what then? The charter-party provides that should the vessel not carry under this contract the guaranteed dead weight, then a pro rata deduction of so much per ton shall be made from the payment of freight. In point of fact this vessel did not carry the guaranteed 2000 tons by about 300 tons. If that case is not what is provided for by the words I have read, I have a difficulty in figuring the kind of case which would meet the clause. I therefore concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, which is, to allow a deduction corresponding to the 309 tons which the ship with proper stowage was unable to take on board.

July 5, 1887.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

I do not agree with the argument which was addressed to us in support of the view of the Lord Ordinary any more than I agree with the view of the Lord Ordinary, that it was the duty of the shipowner to put coals amongst the machinery. I think it was not his duty to do so. By the charter-party he was liable for proper stowage, and I think it is according to the evidence that no other stowage than that which was practised would have been proper. Therefore I do not proceed upon the view that the shipowner ought to have assented to the irregularity, although it may be frequently permitted, of putting coals amongst the machinery. I proceed simply upon the view which I have stated, that with an ordinary cargo, such as was contemplated to be taken, and without fault on either side, there was a carrying power short of what was expected to the extent of 309 tons. I am disposed, although not without some difficulty, to apply the clause to which I have referred to that case, and to allow a corresponding deduction.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in the construction which he has put on the charter-party, and to hold (1) that there was an implied obligation on the shipper to furnish a cargo, which, with proper stowage, could be loaded to the stipulated amount; and (2) that a deduction from the gross freight can only be allowed where there has been a breach of obligation on the part of the shipowner either in not furnishing a ship of the requisite carrying capacity, or in not loading the cargo to the amount of 2000 tons, being able so to do. I think that no breach of obligation in either respect has been committed by the shipowners, for they furnished a ship of the carrying capacity of 2000 tons, and loaded all the cargo which it was possible to load consistent with proper stowage. Hence, in my opinion, it follows that no deduction from the freight can be allowed. I think that the shipper did not furnish a cargo, which, with proper stowage, could be loaded to the extent of 2000 tons. The only condition on which that amount could have been loaded was that

No. 163. machinery and coals should be stowed together. But that would have been improper stowage unless with the consent of the owners of the machinery and the owners of the coals. This consent I think the shippers were bound to obtain, and to furnish to the shipowner before either the machinery or coals were loaded. They did not do so, and these articles were loaded in separate places in accordance with the intention of the shippers. When it was found that the ship could not carry 2000 tons of dead weight with this form of stowage it was proposed that the coals and machinery should be stowed together, for which the shippers had obtained the necessary consent. This would have necessitated the removal of part of the cargo, and would of course have caused expense. It appears to me that the expense should have been borne by the shippers, but they declined to do so. Hence I think that the shipowners were justified in refusing to unload so much of the cargo already loaded, so as to permit of the machinery and coals being stowed together. On the whole I am of opinion that as there was no breach of obligation on their part the shipowners are entitled to receive the full amount of the stipulated freight.

DONALD HORNE MACFARLANE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—

July 5, 1887.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

ALEXANDER BLACK & COMPANY AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—
Balfour—Murray.

Reparation—Slander—Issue.—During a contest for a seat in Parliament a newspaper published an article concerning one of the candidates, in which he was described as a “scoffer,” who talked in a “morally offensive way,” and spoke sarcastically about “God Almighty’s earth.” In an action of damages against the proprietor of the newspaper, held (rev. judgment of Lord M’Laren) that the expression “scoffer” was prima facie defamatory, and that the candidate was entitled to an issue, putting the question whether the article falsely and calumniously represented him as a “scoffer at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at the Divine Government and Providence.”

During a parliamentary election a newspaper stated that it was alleged that a boat’s crew from the yacht of one of the candidates was captured while poaching, and that it was “affirmed” that a boat’s crew from his yacht had been seen fishing on a Sunday. In an action of damages raised by him, held (dis. Lord Young) that he was not entitled to an issue, as it was not averred that the acts alleged had been done with the pursuer’s knowledge or authority.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M’Laren.
M.

DONALD HORNE MACFARLANE raised this action against Alexander Black & Company, publishers in Oban, and John Lorne Stewart of Coll, proprietors of the newspaper called the Oban Telegraph and West Highland Chronicle, jointly and severally, for damages and solatium for alleged slander contained in articles published in that paper on 9th July 1886.

The pursuer stated that he had represented Argyllshire in Parliament from the beginning of December 1885 till the dissolution of Parliament in 1886; that being a candidate for re-election in the summer of 1886 he visited various parts of the county in his yacht, and was, among other places, at Corpach, off which place and near the mouth of the Lochy his yacht lay over Sunday, 4th July 1886. (Cond. 4) “During the whole period since before the general parliamentary election of 1885, when the pursuer first became a candidate for the parliamentary representation of Argyllshire, down to and since the last parliamentary election, which took place on 15th July last, the defenders have persistently inserted and published, and caused and allowed to be inserted and published, abusive, malicious, calumnious, and untrue statements regarding the pursuer, not only in his public capacity, but also in his private character as a gentleman, and in regard to his religious views. A paragraph was inserted by the defenders in the issue of said newspaper, which appeared on 9th July last, entitled 'Macfarlane the Scoffer.' This paragraph is throughout couched in most offensive terms, and proceeds, 'The Irish people tolerate a few vices, but a political quack they at once dismiss. He talks to the "rabble" in a vulgar and morally offensive way.' The same paragraph also puts the question, 'Is the man who would stand up before a respectable audience and speak sarcastically about "God Almighty's earth" a man you could admire? The most ignorant crofter in the Highlands would blush to the roots of his ears if he had in an unguarded moment publicly used the same words.' The same paragraph refers to the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represents him as a scoffer at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at the Divine Government and Providence. The pursuer has in consequence suffered in his feelings and in the estimation of many of the electors of the county of Argyle. It was inserted and published by the defenders maliciously, falsely, calumniously, and without probable cause, and for the purpose of injuring the pursuer. A copy of the defenders' said newspaper of 9th July last is herewith produced." (Cond. 5) "The defenders in their issue of said newspaper of 9th July last further inserted and published, or caused and allowed to be inserted and published, a paragraph headed 'Mr D. H. Macfarlane's Doings,' in which it is, inter alia, stated,—'It is also affirmed that a boat from Mr Macfarlane's yacht was observed fishing near the Lochy on Sunday. Mr John Boyd and other members of the local Land League are reported to be incensed at this conduct, and to have refused to give further support to Mr Macfarlane's candidature.'"

The pursuer then went on to state that it was untrue that any boat from his yacht fished or was observed fishing near the Lochy on Sunday, that he had denied the statement publicly at meetings held on 10th July, but as the polling-day was 15th July, and there was no local newspaper in which these meetings could be reported before the polling, his denial could not be made public till after the election; that the first Argyllshire newspaper published after these meetings was the defenders' paper of 16th July, which contained no proper report of them, "but only refers inferentially to the pursuer's said repudiation and denial in a leading article headed 'The Galled Jade Winces.' In that article the defenders do not withdraw the allegations contained in said last-mentioned paragraph, but rather draw attention to and seek to emphasise it."

(Cond. 6) "The statement contained in the said last-mentioned paragraph that a boat from Mr Macfarlane's yacht was observed fishing near the Lochy on Sunday, taken together with the said heading of the paragraph in which it is contained, is of and concerning the pursuer, and was made by the defenders falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, for the purpose of representing, as it in point of fact does represent, the pursuer as a person who had been guilty of a public breach of Sabbath observance, who was irreligious, and disregarded and outraged the religious opinions of others, and as guilty of such indecorous and improper conduct as rendered him unfit to represent the constituency in Parliament."

Black & Co.

No. 164.

Macfarlane v.
Black & Co.

The pursuer further stated that by the false and calumnious statements complained of he had been injured in his feelings and in character and reputation; that the offence of Sabbath-breaking was of a grave character, and was regarded as particularly heinous by a large number of persons in the locality in which the defenders' newspaper circulated, as was well known to them, and that he lost the election, and that he believed and averred that this result was greatly due to the statements expressed and implied in the paragraph complained of, in consequence of the impression conveyed, and intended to be conveyed, as to his conduct and character.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's statements were irrelevant, and that the articles libelled having been only fair comment on the pursuer's political attitude, they ought to be assoiized.

The pursuer proposed these issues for the trial of the action:—“(1) It being admitted that on or about 9th July 1886 the defenders wrote and caused to be published in the Oban Telegraph and West Highland Chronicle of that date the article contained in schedule A hereto appended, whether said article, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents him as a scoffer at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at the Divine Government and Providence, or contains similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? (2) It being admitted that on or about 9th July 1886 the defenders wrote and caused to be published in the Oban Telegraph and West Highland Chronicle of that date the article contained in schedule B hereto appended, whether said article, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents him as a person guilty of a public breach of Sabbath observance, who was irreligious, and disregarded and outraged the religious opinions of others, and as guilty of such indecorous and improper conduct as rendered him unfit to represent the constituency of Argyllshire in Parliament, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The Lord Ordinary (Lord M'Laren) disallowed these issues, found that there was no issuable matter on record, and dismissed the action.*

* “OPINION.—In this case I am clearly of opinion that I ought not to allow any issue. There is no issuable matter on record, in my view.

“I take the two charges separately,—the charges that are made the subject of the first and second issues. Under the first of these charges the alleged libel is contained in an article which alludes to Mr Macfarlane, in connection with his candidature for the parliamentary representation of Argyllshire, as having used the expression ‘God Almighty's earth’; and the writer asks whether ‘a man who would stand up before a respectable audience and speak sarcastically about “God Almighty's earth” was a man whom you could admire.’ It is not denied that Mr Macfarlane used the expression. I do not know whether he used it or not, but he does not deny it; and it is not said that the expression is in itself exceptionable. We may not admire it, and I think it is an expression which has come from the New World, and has not yet been fully naturalised in our country. Anything said about the use of it in this article is simply an imputation regarding the good taste and literary qualities of the candidate who used these words; and I am of opinion that the article will not bear the interpretation that is put upon it in the first issue, as representing Mr Macfarlane as ‘a scoffer at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at the Divine Government and Providence.’ Nor do I think that by any amendment of the issue it is possible to spell a libel out of this article. I regard it as a mere vituperative attack, such as is common at election times, and as meaning nothing but opposition or dislike to the candidate. Of course if there had been anything really libellous,—the imputation of a crime or anything that

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that the action was relevant. He was called a "scoffer" at religion, and accused of conduct on the Sabbath which was offensive to usual ideas of propriety of conduct. He ought, therefore, to have an opportunity of bringing the accusations before a jury in order to have it established that, as he offered to prove, they were false and calumnious.

No. 164.

Macfarlane v.
Black & Co.

In the course of the pursuer's argument it was suggested to his counsel by the Court to consider whether he ought not to amend his record so as to set forth that the defenders had held him up in a series of attacks to the public contempt and odium, and take an issue appropriate to such a case.¹ Such an issue was in consequence prepared and lodged, but ultiwould outrage the public conscience or sense of propriety,—the fact of it being made at an election time would not excuse it. But I really do not think this goes beyond the licence of newspaper comment upon election speeches. It is to be observed that the editor quotes the words 'God Almighty's earth,' and whilst he gives his opinion upon them, he does not impute to Mr Macfarlane any intention beyond what he deduces from the words used.

"Now, with regard to the second issue, the alleged libel is of a different character because it is founded upon an erroneous statement of fact. The statement is in substance that Mr Macfarlane, by himself or his servants or guests on board the yacht, fished on the loch on a Sunday. It is said by the pursuer that the statement is untrue, and I must take it that the pursuer comes into Court offering to prove its untruth. But the question is, whether this imputation is not only false but calumnious. It is not necessary, in order that the statement should be calumnious, that it should impute a crime; a statement may amount to a libel if it accuses a person of what is universally considered to be an immoral act, or if it imputes conduct which is contrary to the generally accepted standard of honour or propriety amongst gentlemen—amongst the class of persons to which the individual aggrieved belongs. But I cannot look at this statement as falling under either of these categories. No doubt the denunciation of a candidate on a charge of fishing on the Sunday was calculated to be prejudicial to his election prospects, but I cannot regard the statement as charging something contrary to the generally accepted standard of morality in the community. Many persons hold that fishing, playing cards, or engaging in lawful sports, are perfectly innocent when engaged in on Sunday, as much so as on any other day of the week. Others think quite the reverse. There is no statute against engaging in sport on Sunday; and the matter of Sabbath observance on the first day of the week is a matter on which there is a great difference of opinion in the community. Indeed, there are great differences even amongst theologians as to the degree in which the first day of the week may be lawfully devoted to recreation or amusement. That being the case, I think that however offensive this article may have been to Mr Macfarlane it does not accuse him of anything criminal or immoral; and I do not think the article bears the interpretation put upon it in the issue. The act is not charged in the article as a breach of Sabbath observance, or as having been done from irreligious motives. I think it is quite possible that the editor knew that Mr Macfarlane was a Roman Catholic, and that a person of his persuasion would not feel bound by the views that prevailed in Argyllshire as to Sabbath observance.

"On the whole, I think that this article is nothing more than an exhibition of the usual licence of election articles. It differs from the other article in so far that it represents Mr Macfarlane as having done something which he did not do. But it does not follow from this that it is actionable, and the remedy for verbal or written attacks of this sort is, that the gentleman may defend himself in the same way, which I have no doubt Mr Macfarlane is quite able to do. I shall therefore find that there is no issuable matter in the record, and dismiss the action, with expenses."

¹ M'Laren v. Ritchie, July 8, 1856, not reported, but the issue in which was as follows:—"Whether the said articles, passages, verses, and fictitious adver-

Black & Co.

Argued for defenders ;—The action was not relevant. The words complained of were not per se libellous, and required an innuendo to be put on them. That sought to be put on them was much too wide. Further, much freedom was to be expected and allowed in criticism of a candidate for Parliament during an election.¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has found that there is no issuable matter in the articles of which the pursuer complains. I have come to a different conclusion. I think that there is matter in these articles of which a jury may be reasonably asked to judge. The first issue is asked with reference to an article entitled “Macfarlane the Scoffer.” Whether the statements in that article are sufficient to shew that the pursuer deserves that designation is not the question now for consideration. I do not think that any man is entitled to apply that designation to another in a newspaper article without being liable to be called upon to justify before a jury his conduct in doing so. I think the phrase is prima facie defamatory, unless it be shewn that it has not such a meaning, or could not be supposed to have such a meaning as prima facie it bears. That is my opinion on the first issue proposed. I am for disallowing the second.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree that this action must go to trial, but I should have thought that the whole case ought to go to trial. It has, I think, got into some confusion by the way in which the issues proposed have been dealt with. The pursuer at first proposed two issues, which are printed in the print of 2d April, and one of which related to the article titled Macfarlane the Scoffer, while the other related to an article which stated that “it is alleged that a boat’s crew from his” (Mr Macfarlane’s) “yacht was captured while poaching for salmon,” and that it “is also affirmed that a boat from Mr Macfarlane’s yacht was observed fishing near the Lochy on Sunday.” It was suggested when these issues were discussed, as part of the general argument on the relevancy of the action, that possibly the case was one of another category, that in which a party complains of being injuriously held up in a series of attacks to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, and in consequence of observations which were made on that subject an issue was proposed in the terms which are set forth in the print dated 20th May. At the last discussion before us Mr Comrie Thomson, on behalf of the pursuer, in answer to more than one appeal made to him as to the course which he had resolved to take, intimated, as I understood, that he meant to proceed to trial on the two issues originally lodged, and not on that of 20th May, which treats the case as one of holding up to public hate, ridicule, and contempt. I have no doubt he is quite entitled to take that course, though my own impression was that he was choosing what I should have thought the more difficult case for his client. But he has means of judging which I have not, and it is tisement, or any parts thereof, are of and concerning the pursuer, and whether the pursuer is thereby calumniously and injuriously held up to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, to his loss and damage?”; Cunningham v. Phillips, June 16, 1868, 6 Macph. 926, 40 Scot. Jur. 533.

his resolution to go to trial, if allowed, on the two issues as to the article on No. 164.
 Macfarlane the Scoffer, and as to Sunday fishing, and to maintain that both July 6, 1887.
 these charges are false and calumnious. My opinion is that he is entitled to do Macfarlane v.
 that, and that both issues ought to go to trial. The defender will then try to Black & Co.
 justify them as a fair or allowable criticism, even if a coarse one, on the language and conduct of a candidate for election to Parliament, but, in my opinion, they are such that the pursuer is entitled to submit them to a jury and to endeavour to persuade a jury to characterise them as false and calumnious. I am therefore disposed—and obviously, as the case is to go to trial, it is expedient to abstain from further observation on it—to think that the two issues ought to be allowed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have no doubt as to the first issue. I think a jury ought to determine whether or not there is good ground for complaint of what is I think, on the face of the article, a libel. If its character is proved to be such as the pursuer alleges, then the jury will give such reparation as they see fit.

But as to the second issue, I think it ought not to be allowed. The article says that “it is alleged that a boat’s crew from Mr Macfarlane’s yacht was captured while poaching for salmon,” and that “it is also affirmed that a boat from Mr Macfarlane’s yacht was observed fishing near the Lochy on Sunday.”
 It is not said that the things were done with the knowledge or with the authority of Mr Macfarlane. All that is said is that these things are said to have happened, and Mr Macfarlane may, for all that is stated in the article, have been perfectly innocent of them. There being no such allegation made against him in the article, I think that the second article ought not to be allowed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion with all your Lordships as to the first issue.

As to the second, I agree with Lord Craighill that it should not be allowed.
 I do not think there is on record a sufficient statement to admit of it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I also agree in the opinion of Lord Craighill as to the second issue.

THE COURT approved of the first issue, and disallowed the second issue.

Road—Right of way—Evidence of public use.—In an action of declarator that there existed a public right of way for passengers on foot and on horseback, and for driving cattle and sheep through the Glen of the Doll in Forfarshire, it was proved that the pass formed the direct and natural access from Clova to Braemar, and that from time immemorial there had existed a well-known and well-defined track through the glen; that there had been a practice of drovers taking sheep by this track from the public market at Braemar in spring and autumn to a public market near Kirriemuir; that the track had been used by farmers in the district going to Clova or to Braemar, and occasionally by tourists going

THE SCOTTISH RIGHTS OF WAY AND RECREATION SOCIETY, LIMITED, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and Thomas Duncan and James Farquharson, two members of the public, residing in Clova and near Braemar respectively, raised this action against Duncan Macpherson of Glen Doll for declarator that "there exists a public road or right of way for passage on foot and horseback, and also for driving cattle and sheep, in or near the direction shewn by the red line A B C D E on the plan produced, leading the said road from the point A or a point near thereto on the public highway between Braemar and Blairgowrie, ascending Glen Callater and descending the Glen of the White Water and Glen Doll to the point E or a point near thereto on the public highway, proceeding down Glen Clova to Kirriemuir so far as the said road passes through the property of the defender," and that the public were entitled to the free enjoyment thereof for passage on foot and horseback, and driving cattle and sheep in the particular line mentioned, or such line as the Court should fix, and that the defender had no right to impede such free use. There were also conclusions to have him ordained to remove all gates and other obstructions from the road claimed, and for interdict against his interfering with the peaceable enjoyment of it by the public.

The line of road claimed began on the north at Auchallater, near Castleton of Braemar, on the property of Colonel Farquharson of Invercauld, and passed in a south-easterly direction through Glen Callater, part of Invercauld, till it entered the defender's property, where it marched with Invercauld near a hill called the Tolmount, marked C on the plan, whence it passed down the Glen of the White Water by a steep road or path called Jock's Road, and thence down the Glen of the Doll past the Glen Doll shooting lodge, which was, as pursuers alleged, at a farm-steading known as Acharn, to a farm-steading called Braedownie, marked D on the plan. It was between the points C and D, i.e., Tolmount and Braedownie by way of Jock's Road, that the defender denied the existence of the right of way claimed. It was admitted that from D to E, i.e., from Braedownie south-east to the village of Milton of Clova, there was a county road.

Colonel Farquharson, before the action was raised, intimated that so far as the right of way claimed passed through his lands of Invercauld, i.e., from A to C—Auchallater to the Tolmount—he had never interfered, and had no intention of interfering, with the right of way.

The pursuers averred that from time immemorial the way in question had been used by the public on foot and on horseback, and for driving cattle and sheep; that it was extensively used by drovers going from Braemar Market to that at Cullow and other places in Forfarshire, and was the ordinary route by which cattle and sheep from Strathspey, Rhynie, and other districts, which had been brought to Braemar were taken south into Forfarshire.

The defender denied these averments.

It was admitted that the defender claimed right to plant trees on the solum of the right of way claimed, and to exercise all acts of ownership over it, and that he had placed a locked gate upon it and refused all access to it.

No. 165.

A proof was led, from which the following facts appeared:—

There was a well-known and well-defined track in the direction claimed. The track after entering the defender's property at the Tolmount (where there was at one time a shieling, traces of which still remained), which was the highest part, descended somewhat to the west and passed a shieling, known as the Lunkard shieling, and then came to a very steep place, where it descended certain rocks into the Glen of the Doll. This steep and very rocky place was called "Jock's Road," and there were traces of a zigzag path on it. It was a place down which sheep could only pass very slowly, and when very carefully driven. After passing Jock's Road passage the track claimed passed down the howe of the Glen of the White Water and thence through the narrow glen of the Doll to Braedownie. During this portion the road was much easier, though still very rough. In order to reach Braedownie it passed Acharn, and the pursuers' evidence was that on reaching Acharn those who pursued this route sometimes kept the north and sometimes crossed to the south side of the White Water. At Braedownie there was formerly a ford, and more recently a bridge, to be hereafter noticed, across the river Esk, which at that point came down from the north-east, and one who had taken the south side could cross there and go down the county road to Milton of Clova, or keep on the south of the Esk and pass southwards by the farms of Whitehaugh and Clayleith.

It was not disputed that there were other routes from Braedownie into Aberdeenshire than that claimed, the dispute being whether the way claimed had not been used as of right and not of tolerance for the prescriptive period as the shortest way to Braemar. One of these roads, known as the Capel Road, led north from Braedownie by way of the Capel Burn, and passed near Loch Muick into Glen Muick and thence to the Ballater and Braemar Road, either by proceeding along Glen Muick to Ballater or over a track from Inchnabobart in Glen Muick to Crathie Church. Another passing north at first in the same direction as the Capel Road afterwards turned westwards, and passing the shooting lodge of Bachnagairn thence went on by a scarcely discernible track to the Tolmount, and so by that part of the right of way claimed which passed through Invercauld to Auchallater and Braemar. It was by this route, and not via Jock's Road, that the defender alleged that a considerable part of such traffic as there had been between Braedownie and Braemar had come.

The pursuers did not lead the evidence of any tourists who had passed through the way claimed, but there was evidence of the present and former innkeeper at Clova to the effect that there had been considerable traffic of that kind. There was also the evidence of the Invercauld gamekeeper at Glen Callater that he had directed tourists after reaching the Tolmount to go by Jock's Road and the White Water to Clova, and the evidence of a guide at Braemar that he had conducted such persons as far as the Tolmount, and thence directed them to go by that route. The defender's case with regard to such persons was that if they had really passed in that direction they had probably come by the easier, if slightly longer, route by Bachnagairn.

The main part of the pursuers' evidence was directed to shew that there had been always a practice, as matter of right, and because the way in question was a drove road, of driving sheep and cattle from Braemar to the Forfarshire markets. This, from the high ground over which the stock must come, was possible only in the season when snow was not lying on the hills, and the evidence pointed almost altogether to the traffic passing only from Braemar towards Forfarshire, and not vice versa. This the pursuers explained by shewing that the half-yearly Cullow market in Forfarshire followed that at Braemar at both seasons, April and October, and that in the former month the Cullow market was held only two days after the Braemar market, so that it was necessary to take stock which did not sell at the latter as quickly as possible southwards to be sold at Cullow. When time did not press, or the hills were impassable, stock from Braemar could be taken by the longer route of the Capel or by the high road from Braemar to Blairgowrie, passing by way of the Spittal of Glenshee. The evidence of shepherds and drovers, and persons who had been such, was to the effect that they had passed over the way claimed, that they had stopped a night at or near the keeper's house at the top of Glen Callater, where they were frequently entertained overnight by him, leaving the sheep to graze and rest outside, and that they passed the next day by the Tolmount and over Jock's Road, passing the night if necessary at Acharn or Braedownie, and going on early in the morning to Cullow market.* It was customary if they passed a night at Acharn or Braedownie that they were entertained by the tenants of these farms, and that their sheep rested close by, as was the case when they spent the previous night at Glen Callater. One witness, a man of sixty-eight, named Ogilvy, who had long known the district, and had been brought up in it, at the farm of Clayleith, in Glen Doll, where his father had been farmer, stated that he had known from boyhood of sheep being driven through Glen Doll by the way claimed, and that his father had been anxious, if it had been thought possible, to stop the use of it, as the animals passing through trampled on and dirtied the pasture. Another witness, who had been a keeper in Glen Doll at one time, spoke to the practice being thought prejudicial to the use of it as a deer forest, but to its being believed impossible to stop it.

Clergymen who had been ministers of the parish in which Glen Doll is situated spoke both to the fact of their having used the road as a public road and to their having been told that it was so by residents in the district who were now deceased. The defender attributed their use of the road to the fact that as the district clergymen they were well known to the people, and their office would prevent them from ever being interrupted in their use of it. A travelling tailor also gave evidence that for many years he had been in the habit of using the road in question in his journeys from Kirriemuir to the various farms and sheilings at which he worked, as a public road. The defender attributed this use to his being on journeys to various farms in the discharge of his business.

The defender's property at one time belonged to Donald Ogilvy of Clova, as did also Bachnagairn and other adjoining property. Between 1862 and 1870 Glen Doll and Bachnagairn were rented by Lord Southesk. He bought Glen Doll from Ogilvy of Clova in 1870, and at the same time Bachnagairn was acquired by Mackenzie of Kintail. Lord Southesk was a witness for the pursuers, and stated that he had always understood during his tenancy and ownership of the property that there was a right of way through Glen Doll in the direction claimed, his information as to it being derived from the late Mr Forrest, a solicitor in Kirriemuir, who was agent for Ogilvy of Clova. He (Lord Southesk) had never endeavoured to stop people passing through Glen Doll, but he had never used the road himself, or, with a single exception, seen others using it. The estate was sold by Lord Southesk to Mr John Gurney, the immediate author of the defender. Mr Gurney held it from 1877 to 1883. He also was called as a witness for the pursuers. He deponed that foot-passengers, sheep, and cattle, could pass through Glen Doll, that they did so on one or two occasions with his knowledge, but without asking his permission, and that in planting trees near Acharn he had ordered a space to be left so that if sheep or cattle were passing through the glen they would pass through the opening so left without coming too near the house, which was close to Acharn, and this with no special view to the benefit of his own tenants, but "in case a right of way through the glen should be sustained." Mr Gurney's keeper, who had formerly been keeper to a shooting tenant of Bachnagairn, gave evidence for the pursuers that sheep had been in use to be driven through the glen. He also deponed that the space left by Mr Gurney's instructions in the planting was so left to avoid shutting up the track. It was he who had the planting done for Mr Gurney.

The pursuers also relied on the fact that there was close to Acharn, and therefore some distance up the disputed road, an old milestone, marked "18," meaning, it was believed, eighteen miles from Kirriemuir. They pointed to the fact that this stone was to the north and west of the point where the Capel Road went over to Glen Muick from Braedownie, and so seemed to indicate an old road in the direction claimed. They relied also on the evidence led with regard to the building of the bridge at Braedownie, as to which it appeared that it was first erected by the tenant of Braedownie, and that in order to its erection he had collected some subscriptions from people of the class who used the road in dispute.

The defender called a Mr Blackadder, C.E., who had been engaged in making and assisting to make certain plans of the Clova estate in 1852 with a view to the re-arranging of farms, and again in 1858 for the same purpose, and also with that of forming a deer-forest. In 1852 he was engaged at the lower end of the property, and in 1858 at the upper end. He deponed that in making these plans every road and right of way, whether a made road or path or mere track, was laid down carefully, that so far as could be done every information as to such was obtained from the people of the district, and that it was never suggested to him that any right of way through Glen Doll existed. He had had occasion to go to the west of Jock's Road, and had always gone by Bachnagairn, and thought that there was nothing like a road at Jock's Road, but only the termination of a very precipitous piece of the hillside. In any view, he thought the Bachnagairn path a far more easy one than Jock's Road. The defender also examined another engineer, Mr Blyth, C.E., who had inspected the ground, and who stated that the Bachnagairn road was infinitely superior to that by Jock's Road, and that the way by Jock's Road, though comparatively easy elsewhere, was at that point so steep that no one who could go another way would choose it, and that the way over it could not be called a drove road. Shortly before the raising of this action one of the individual pursuers, James Farquharson, while taking sheep through the disputed way from Braedownie to Auchallater, in the service of Mr Gordon, the tenant of the latter farm, had been stopped and turned back by the defender. The defender relied with regard to this incident on a letter relating to it written to him by Mr Gordon on 24th October 1885, and which contained an apology for "what had happened," and a statement that he, Gordon, did not know that Farquharson was going to Clova for sheep, and that what he had done was without his

No. 165. sanction and approval. The letter continued,—“I am sending a lot of sheep to turnips. They are leaving this (Auchallater) on Tuesday, weather permitting. It would be a very great favour if you will allow them to go down Glen Doll, and I will be very much obliged. It will save me a distance of twenty miles going the other way.”

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that there exists a public road or right of way for foot-passengers, and also for driving cattle and sheep, leading from the point A on the plan No. of process, or a point near thereto, on the public highway between Braemar and Blairgowrie, ascending Glen Callater and descending the Glen of the White Water and Glen Doll to the point E on the said plan, or a point near thereto on the public highway between Glen Clova and Kirriemuir, and that the pursuers, and all others, are entitled in time coming to the free use and possession of the said right of way, so far as it passes through the property of the defender: Continues the cause in order that the particular line and direction of the said road as it passes through the defender's property may be defined; and grants leave to reclaim.”*

* “OPINION.—The road in question is a natural hill pass between Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire. It traverses some very high ground, and is in some parts steep and rugged; but there is no doubt that it is a practicable way for foot-passengers and sheep. I do not think it proved that, in its present condition, it is a practicable road for cattle or horses. But for foot-passengers and sheep it is a practicable means of transit between Braemar and Glen Clova; and it has been used for these purposes for more than forty years.

“Much of the evidence is too general in its character, if it had stood alone, to establish a right of way. But when all necessary deductions upon this account have been made, there still remains a sufficient body of testimony to prove that the road has been used as of right by the inhabitants of the district and others, as a means of transit between Clova in Forfarshire and Braemar.

“It is true that the use which has been proved, taking all the evidence together, is by no means extensive. There could be little or no use made of such a pass during the winter months; and even during that part of the year when it was practicable and convenient to travel by it, there may have been weeks together without any stranger to the estate making any use of the road. The most important purpose for which it would appear to have been used by persons not resident on the estate was the driving of sheep from Braemar to Forfarshire; and this could not have occurred more than once or twice in any year. Nor does the use for any other purpose, which can be referred to as an assertion of right, appear to have been much more frequent. The uses which have been proved, therefore, would probably be altogether insufficient to establish a public right if the road in question had traversed a populous district, well provided with other means of communication. But the extent of the use which will indicate right must depend upon the nature of the country and the requirements of the inhabitants. It must be such a use as might reasonably be expected if the way were reputed to be public, and admitted to be so by the proprietors of the land; and I think the use which has been proved is just what might have been expected in such a district. The material point is, that the pass through Glen Doll is the natural and direct means of access to Braemar on the one side, and Clova on the other. The only road which can reasonably be brought into competition with it—that by Bachnagairn—does not seem to have been used to anything like the same extent; and it does not appear that anybody ever abstained from using it who might have been expected to do so if it had been admittedly public.

“It is said, however, that the evidence is not only scanty, but that, if uses which in no way indicate an assertion of right are disregarded, there has been

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—There was not sufficient evidence either in point of quantity or of character to justify the Lord Ordinary's hardly any use, except on very rare occasions, which might easily escape the notice of a proprietor; and in the application of this argument it is said that the use of the path through Glen Doll by the tenants of that estate, and by the tenants on the neighbouring estates, ought not to be taken into consideration. In so far as regards the tenants in Glen Doll, this observation appears to me to be well founded. But it does not apply with the same force to the tenants of neighbouring proprietors, nor to persons living in Clova, who, although they might be tenants of the proprietor of Glen Doll, had no occasion to make use of a way through the glen for the enjoyment of their tenancy. It may be that a proprietor may be disposed to allow his own tenants, or those of his neighbours, to make use of roads on his estate which he does not throw open to the public. But it does not follow that the use by such persons of such a way as that in question is to be thrown altogether out of consideration. The greater part of the population in such a district must be tenants, either of the proprietor whose land is traversed by the alleged road, or of his neighbours. It is true that the use of a road by farmers or others living on the line of road exclusively will not prove a public right, because it does not prove that the road is used as a means of communication between two public places. But it may still be taken into account along with other evidence, although it is in itself the use of a part only, and not of the whole line of road, of which it is necessary that a public use should be proved. The question is, whether such use as has been proved, taking all the evidence together, is to be ascribed to tolerance or to the assertion of a right?

“But the most important evidence of any specific use of the road is that by drovers and cattle-dealers who were accustomed to take sheep which had not been sold at the Braemar market to the market at Cullow, in Forfarshire. This use alone would probably be sufficient to establish the pursuers' case, because it cannot be explained by tolerance. It is said to be obsolete, because the market at Cullow has been discontinued. But there is nothing to shew it may not be resumed; and if it were certain that this particular use was now at an end, that would not affect its value as a piece of evidence to shew that during the period of prescription the road had been resorted to by the public, and not merely by privileged persons.

“Taking the whole evidence together, I think there is enough to shew that there was such a use of the road by the inhabitants of the district generally, in the course of their ordinary avocations, as to infer a public right. I do not think it possible to ascribe this use to tolerance. There can be no question that the pass through Glen Doll was generally reputed to be a public right of way. Those who used it did so because they believed they had a right to use it. There is no evidence that anybody ever asked leave of the proprietor of Glen Doll to use it. And it is certain that there is no room for the suggestion of tolerance during the ownership of Mr Gurney and of Lord Southesk, because they, both of them, say that they believed that there was a public right of way through their property. It may be that they did not feel the public use to be at all burdensome, and they might have been willing to submit to it, irrespective of right. But their evidence shews that they did not understand that they were tolerating a use which they might put a stop to; but they, as well as the inhabitants of the district, believed they had no right to object. There is a material piece of evidence to the same effect, but of much earlier date than the ownership of Lord Southesk,—the evidence of a witness named Ogilvy, who was examined on commission, and who speaks to the objection entertained by his father, who was a tenant in Glen Doll, to the use by the public of the road through the glen, and says that his father was desirous to put a stop to it, but became satisfied that there was no use in attempting to do so, because there was a public right of way. There is some real evidence in the same direction, because the construction of the bridge at Braedownie by subscription indicates a belief on the part of the subscribers that the public had an interest in the access to Glen

No. 165. judgment. A right was claimed for foot-passengers, horses, and driving cattle and sheep. Not a single tourist was proved to have used the road, and there was almost no evidence of the passage of cattle. Such persons as had passed over the route claimed were in great part connected with adjoining farms, and the existence of neighbourly feeling or business dealings would account for their use. Of the existence of such neighbourly feeling and business dealings between those in the glen and the few people who passed through it, there was evidence in the proof. But what was required to establish a right of way was something very different. It must be evidence which would prove that the public asserted a right, and that the landowner submitted to it as such, or vainly attempted to interfere with it. Now, the allowing a few people, some of them neighbours, to pass through the glen at certain seasons when markets were about to be held was a good specimen of tolerance, not a case of submission to the assertion of a right. This was strengthened by the proof that persons so passing received hospitality from those on the route traversed. The shepherds and keepers gave them food and lodging, and let their sheep browse out of good neighbourhood, and because of their masters' tolerance of such a use, not burdensome in itself, and which in such a district would naturally be allowed, because the interest was rather to let people pass than to stop them. The issue in a right of way case was whether for forty years prior to the summons there had been a right of way. This case shewed no use as of right. Nor yet did it shew that there had been use, to whatever cause it might be ascribable, down to the date of the summons, for there was no proof of use after 1879, except the use in 1885, when the pursuer Farquharson was turned back and his master apologised for his intrusion and asked leave to send sheep that way. Cullow market had ceased for several years, and there was no traffic to it at all. It was said on the other side that there had long been a consensus of opinion in the district that there was a right of way in the direction claimed, and that the two predecessors of the defender believed that and acted on it. But that was because they believed in gossip about it which they never tested, because the use was so little burdensome that they had no occasion to dispute it, and were quite willing it should go on. It was different with the defender, because his deer forest was likely to be injured by the establishment of a right of way through it, and because it was now proposed to declare against him the existence of a road through his property at the instance of a society established for the very purpose of putting forward such claims. The use, previously little burdensome, would thus be much increased. It was truly in the public interest that such a right of way should not be held to be established because a proprietor had been good-natured with his property, and a decision against the defender would involve that the law leaned not to the simple and natural inference from the facts proved, that the use was Doll. Although I do not think there is evidence of the use of the road by cattle to any material extent, it does not seem necessary to qualify the terms of the declarator on that account, because it would be within the public right to use it for cattle if it be a drove road for sheep.

"It does not appear to me to be material to the question of right that sheep-drovers in coming through Glen Doll were at one time in the habit of crossing the stream which runs through the glen, and taking the south side, and afterwards were more in the habit of keeping to the north. But there is a question as to which the parties are not agreed,—whether the line of road should now be laid down on the north or on the south? Both parties, however, agree that the question of right should be finally determined before the line is definitely fixed, and I have therefore granted leave to reclaim."

tolerated, but rather leaned so much towards attributing such use to assertion of right that it would become unsafe for a proprietor to give the public a small favour lest it should yet be turned to his disadvantage. No. 165.
July 6, 1887.

Argued for the pursuers;—The hospitality shewn to passing drovers, of which so much was made as shewing tolerance, was just as likely to have been shewn to people who were passing that way as a matter of right. Everybody attributed their so passing to their assertion and use of a right. Except the case of Mr Gordon in 1885, after the defender began to put forward his claim to interrupt the public, no leave had ever been asked, and all the people who knew the place thought it was a public right of way. This opinion and the conduct to be ascribed to it were traced to Mr Forrest, the agent for Ogilvy of Clova, and through him it descended to Lord Southesk and Mr Gurney. It was not matter of inference so much as of direct testimony that they viewed the use by drovers and other members of the public as matter of right. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society,
Limited, v.
Macpherson.

Now, that bore upon the true question in the case, was the usage to be ascribed to tolerance rather than right? It shewed that what in some circumstances might have been ascribed to tolerance was here to be ascribed to right. The foundation of the acquisition of a public right of way was the theory that there was a presumed grant of the right to pass through the landowner's property,¹ and the evidence was to be approached from the point of view of a desire to see not whether there was much traffic or little, but whether its character was that of tolerance or right. No doubt it was somewhat in favour of an ascription of the use to tolerance that there was not much interest on the landowner's part to object, but that did not go far. When there was little need to use the right, that could always be said, and indeed in the Glen Tilt case,² and in other cases of this class, the same element existed. The road claimed was proved to be the shortest and best of those leading in its direction, and that of itself, when coupled with the use made of it, aided the pursuers.

It was said that there was little or no recent use of the road, but that was because Cullow market was recently discontinued, and because the defender molested people who tried to pass. Besides one witness was brought who had resisted an attempt to turn him and had gone right on to Braemar. It was true that no tourist who had actually traversed the route was called as a witness, but many such had been seen going over it. There was real evidence for the pursuers' case. The obtaining of public subscriptions for the bridge at Braedownie could only have been because the public had an interest in the bridge to be built, and the existence of a mile-stone west of Acharn was more consistent with a public than a private and tolerated way.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case, which is one raising a question of some importance, the Lord Ordinary has sustained the right of way claimed by the pursuers, and given decree. I have come, though not without difficulty, for the case is narrow and exceptional, to agree with his Lordship, and on the grounds which are clearly expressed in his note. The right of way claimed, that is the territory through which it extends, is a stretch of some fourteen or sixteen miles in Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire, running from Castleton of Braemar on the north-west to the vicinity of Kirriemuir on the south-east. The nature of the ground through which the right of way is claimed to exist is rough and steep, rising at summit level, about the centre of the right of way claimed, to about 1000 feet above the level of the sea. It is an unformed road as far as metalling or any care of that kind is concerned, but it is a definite track, and perfectly well known. It is said by the pursuers to have been used without challenge for more than the prescriptive period, and it certainly has been used for more than that period, and without challenge. Whether the public have used it in the sense necessary to create a right in the public to a right of way is the question in the case. It must be conceded, as indeed it was both in argument and in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, that the public use has been more slender than is generally found in these right of way cases. One reason for that is that the district is thinly populated, wild, and remote, and that the use is one adapted to and characteristic of a country of that kind—namely, the use of driving sheep from Castleton of Braemar, where a market is held, to a place in the vicinity of Kirriemuir where also there is, or rather was till recently, a market twice a-year. Without going into details, the nature of the use is that from time immemorial it has been the habit of persons in the district to use that way as a mode of transit from the one market to the other. These markets are public markets, and if the nature of the use has been sufficient and sufficiently long continued to amount to the assertion of a right, that is sufficient use to justify the decree which the Lord Ordinary has given, and whether it is so or not is the real question. I concur with the Lord Ordinary that a use such as I have described, uninterrupted and unchallenged, is sufficient use to found the right of way claimed. The Lord Ordinary has fully gone into the facts of the case. I entirely agree with him, and do not think it necessary to say more than that I concur in his opinion.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I think the Lord Ordinary is right, and I concur with him in the result, as well as in the reasons which he has presented in support of his judgment. From time immemorial, there has been a road in the line of that which has been claimed by the pursuers. Nor was there ever opposition or obstruction till the defender, two or three years ago, blocked the way. That of itself is a strong consideration in favour of the view which the Lord Ordinary has adopted. But I do not rest my opinion upon presumption. I think the evidence has established certain facts which are conclusive of the question. In the first place, the use of the road has, I think, been established, and that use has not been confined to those who lived on the ground or near to the road, but has been taken by others who were strangers to the neighbourhood. It is said that many of those who used the road were farmers upon the lands over which the road was carried, and their servants and visitors, and that these witnesses should be put out of account in considering what is the use which has been taken of the road. If these witnesses had used only a part of the road, this consideration would have been material. It would undoubtedly have diminished the value of the testimony of those witnesses, but when we find that they used the road from end to end, one part in going one way, and the other part going in the opposite direction, thus traversing ground which in part was not the property of their landlord, I think the use had by them of the road as a whole is available to the pursuers in proving the right of way over it. For one thing, it shews certainly the need for such a road, as well as that the road was used. Without this road the witnesses referred to might have travelled from their farms to Forfarshire on the one side, and to Aberdeenshire on the other, but they could not have gone from the one shire to the other without the road as a public road. In the second place, however, that by which I am most impressed in the use of the road is its use as a means of communication between Braemar market and the market at Cullow. These markets were separated in point of time only by two or three days, and the course followed by cattle-dealers was to take the stock which remained unsold at Braemar across the country to the coming market at Cullow. The defender treats this part of the evidence as if the use was only that of an individual. In my opinion it is the use, not of an individual, but of a class,—that is to say, of the public. Those who went to the first market arranged, if necessary, to go to the second, taking their unsold stock with them. What the number of men or animals might be depended on circumstances. Sometimes it would be comparatively large, at other times comparatively small, but all arranged for the use of this road were its use required. Now, this seems to me to be inconsistent with the notion that the road was used as if it were a matter of toleration. Such a use of the road is only to be explained by the repute of the road as a way open to the public. Much has been said by the defender as to the fewness of those by whom the road was used. Everything, of course, is relative, and it appears to me that, according to the evidence, as much use has been proved as could reasonably have been expected. No tourists who went by this road have been examined, but that there were tourists as well as others unconnected with neighbouring farms or with markets who used this road is, I think, amply proved. Guides went with them to a certain point, and shewed them the way beyond, and on all occasions the way by which they were taken was held out and was taken to be a road which was open to the public.

Over and above all this, there is the existence of a mile-stone on the side of this road not far from the place where it joins the county road leading to Mil-town of Clova and Kirriemuir. How came that there if the road was not a public road? Its presence was demonstrative of the character of the road. Mile-stones were never heard of except on public roads. They are placed there for the public on what must be taken to be a public place, and afford abundant evidence of public right.

I think it unnecessary to say more, because, as I regard the case, all that is necessary to support the judgment reclaimed against has been set forth by the Lord Ordinary in his note.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—The question is one of fact, and as the Lord Ordinary has given a strong opinion on that question, and all your Lordships agree with him, I can have no confidence in my own, which is different. I think the right of way through the defender's property which is claimed has not been established. The conclusion of the action is for declarator of a right of way for foot-passengers, horses, and cattle, in a certain direction through the defender's property as part of the road between two admittedly public places. There is no ground for declaring that there is this right of public road which is alleged, unless we find it in the evidence of use. We know that there are many of our old well-recognised public roads of which we have no evidence that they are public except that they have been always used and regarded as such. That is the nature and character of all cases of this description where the party claiming the right of way on behalf of the public appeals to use. It may be appealed to, as I have said, with respect to the oldest and best-recognised public roads in the country. Now, here there has been some use no doubt; the line in question has been used for passage, particularly about twice a-year, which occasional use has now, however, ceased, because the occasions for it have ceased. The question, as the Lord Ordinary accurately puts it, is "whether such use as has been proved, taking all the evidence together, is to be ascribed to tolerance or to the assertion of a right?" Now, the only criticism which I would make on that language is that I would add to the words "assertion of right" the words "understood as such, and assented to by the owner of the soil." My opinion is that there has here been no use which, on the assumption of the total absence of right, I should have expected any reasonable proprietor to interfere with. It is a remote part of the country, where there is very little passage required. That is a consideration which tells both ways, being in one view of it favourable to the one side, and in the other view of it favourable to the other side. The Lord Ordinary says that "the uses which have been proved would probably be altogether insufficient to establish a public right if the road in question had traversed a populous district well provided with other means of communication." Well, twice a-year farmers occupying farms upon the property through which the line of road ran (and indeed it is not a defined line, but the case has been continued that it may be defined by the Lord Ordinary) seem to have used it in driving sheep to market. When they were not sold at one market, they were brought to another along this line as being the shortest way. The people who drove them on these rare occasions were hospitably entertained by the shepherds who had huts on the line of this road, being provided with lodging, and the sheep were allowed to pasture. This was nothing but good neighbourhood and what I should have expected on the assumption that there was no right of way existing, none asserted, and none recognised, nothing but ordinary good feeling and good neighbourhood appealed to. If that be the correct view, I cannot ascribe that to right which may be, and is reasonably to be, accounted for, not by any exceptional goodness, but by mere absence of any disposition to prevent others taking a use which could do no harm, and was so little burdensome as not to be required more than twice a-year. I think that it is far from the interest of those who wish to maintain public rights of way to proclaim to proprietors of hill sides and barren country,—“Now, remember that though people are doing you no harm by taking this occasional use of your property, really affording society to your people who live in this remote place, though it will certainly do you no harm if a tourist, wishing to enjoy a fine view, may climb up to a point on your property without you even knowing it—unless you get watchers—doing nothing with which a good-natured man would interfere, still, unless you prevent such use of your property, there will be established a public right which will be prejudicial to you.” That is an undesirable proclamation to make to proprietors. Besides, we ought to have regard to the consideration that to watch a road of fourteen miles in length over a barren country in order to turn back occasional trespassers—assuming them to be trespassers—is practically impossible. I proceed upon this, that there has been very occasional, rare, and harmless use, such as no ordinary proprietor or tenant would dream of interfering with. If the character of the road, public road or not, depends upon usage—(assertion of right openly made and assented to)—we have no such case established here. The case is not only narrow in respect that there is little evidence of usage—or, I should rather say, evidence of very little usage—but there is no case, I think, established at all; and so far as my judgment goes, I think the conclusion that public rights of way may be established by such evidence is absolutely prejudicial to the public, because it will set all proprietors on their guard to stop innocent, and to them perfectly harmless, use as the only way in which they can prevent a public right being established. The Lord Ordinary says, in the passage I have already quoted, that the question is whether such use as has been proved is to be ascribed to tolerance and not to the assertion of right. Why, I venture to ask, is it not to be ascribed to tolerance? Does anybody think that an ordinary proprietor would have objected to it, or appealed to a Court of law to prevent it, on any of the occasions referred to in the evidence. He would have been thought very ill of by his neighbours if he had, and deservedly so. And why? Because he would be acting intolerantly. But if he is not intolerant and does not appeal to a Court of law to stop what he may think is affording convenience or innocent amusement to some, however rare and occasional—for it is according to the evidence that it was very rare and occasional—I say if he is not intolerant in a way to cause condemnation of his conduct, is it after a lapse of time to be said that he was not tolerant but yielding to a right all the while?

I have thought it right to make these observations, expressive of the views which press upon my mind in this case; although I repeat what I began by saying, that the question being one of fact, and your Lordships agreeing with the Lord Ordinary in the answer to it, I have no confidence in my own opinion to the contrary.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary.

And we do hereby reserve our liferent of the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed, with full power to us, with consent of each other, to alter and revoke these presents in whole or in part. . . .”

Mr Wilson died on 4th September 1855, and Mrs Wilson on 27th March 1883. There were no children of the marriage. Mrs Wilson was her husband's executor. There was no real estate, and the whole personal estate of both spouses amounted to £3637, 16s. On Mrs Wilson's death, Mrs Agnes Wood or Hogg, as her only surviving sister and next of kin, was decerned executor-dative to her. The amount given up in the inventory was £3014, 14s.

A question having thereafter arisen between the next of kin of the two deceased spouses as to their rights to share in this estate, a special case was brought, to which the parties were (1) Mrs Hogg and (2) the three daughters of a sister of Mr Wilson. The first party maintained that she was entitled to one-half of the whole estate; the second parties, that the nearest in kin of both spouses were called as a class, that the estate should be divided among them per capita, and that the division should accordingly be into four equal parts.

The question put was,—“Whether the destination in the above-mentioned contract and mutual disposition ‘to the nearest in kin of us, the said David Wilson and Isabel Wood, equally,’ confers a right to one half of the succession on the nearest in kin of the husband, and to the other half to the nearest in kin of the wife; or whether the nearest in kin of both spouses are to be treated as a single class, and the succession divided equally among the individuals of that class?”

It was stated at the hearing that it was not known whether the estate had been contributed by the husband or the wife. It further appeared that at the date of the mutual deed Mrs Wilson had six next of kin in life, and that Mr Wilson had then only one next of kin.

Argued for the first party;—Both parties were agreed that the words “nearest in kin” here were not to be construed by a reference to the Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855. It could not be said that the clause was unambiguous. Had the word used been “among” or “between” instead of “to” the nearest in kin, it would have been different. In most cases it was the will of a single person which was in question, where he divided his estate among relations of different degrees. The division there was per capita. But there was no such presumption here. This was a mutual will by two spouses. The word “equally” implied a division into two parts. It was further to be observed that there was no propinquity between the nearest of kin of the husband and of the wife, and further the element of equal nearness was wanting.¹

The second parties argued ;—The division ought to be per capita. That construction reasonably and plainly satisfied the intention of the makers of the deed. There was only one class, and no distinction was taken.¹

Hogg v.
Bruce.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The probability is that the estate left by these spouses was originally the husband's. At all events, there being no marriage-contract between the spouses, it must be assumed that the husband jure mariti was owner of the whole. But the present question falls to be decided on the footing that a share of the estate belonged to each spouse, and that may have been due to various causes—either that the wife succeeded to estate from which the jus mariti was excluded, or otherwise. At all events, the whole of it is dealt with in this deed, and it is provided that it is to go to the survivor of the spouses, and that in fee,—for there is no limitation and no minor right of any kind,—and failing the survivor there is a substitution in favour of the nearest in kin of the two spouses equally. That substitution is effectual, and could not be defeated by either of the two spouses after the death of the other, because it is matter of contract, and the reservation of a power to alter is to both spouses jointly.

The words which we have to construe are “to the next of kin of us, the said David Wilson and Isabel Wood, equally.” I cannot see that the mention of the names makes any difference, and therefore it appears to me to be upon the other words which are used that the whole question turns. I cannot help thinking that the spouses were dealing with the nearest of kin of both of them as constituting one class. I do not mean to say that they do not in fact constitute two classes, but rather that the spouses seem to deal with them here as if they were one. A very slight change of expression might have made all the difference in the matter—for instance, if the conveyance had been of one half to the nearest of kin of the husband, and of the other half to the nearest of kin of the wife. It is said to be very strange that persons not connected with one another should be so treated as to form one class in a deed of this kind. But I cannot say that I agree in that. It is not at all peculiar that a husband and wife living together and having no child should look upon their next of kin as having equal claims. Feelings of this nature frequently grow up in the minds of childless spouses, and this I think is the spirit in which the deed is framed. The spouses said to one another that they would leave their joint estate to all their next of kin, whether they were the husband's or the wife's. I cannot construe the deed in any other way than that the fund was to be divisible equally among the individuals of one class.

I cannot help thinking that this construction derives strength from the clause of nomination of executors, although one is obliged to confess that it is a very bungled clause. There was a confusion of ideas in framing it. But the intention is plain that on the death of one of the spouses the surviving spouse should be his or her executor, and that the nearest of kin of the two spouses should be executors of the surviving spouse after his or her death. The cause of the blunder is that an attempt was made to put two sentences into one. The result is that when the second of the two spouses dies, it is provided that “the nearest

That is not the nearest in kin of one of us, and it would be impossible to exclude any one of the next of kin of either spouse from being executor-nominate. And if all are thus to come in equally as executors-nominate, it affords a strong presumption that the words in the clause of bequest are to receive the same interpretation. It appears to me to be impossible to extract from the deed any idea that there is to be a division between the two sections or classes of next of kin.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—It is so natural and so common a settlement that two spouses making a joint deed should give the property of the husband to his relations and of the wife to hers' that terms which can fairly be read as indicating such an intention would be enough to support it. But this case is different, and must be solved by the rule that words used must receive their ordinary signification, unless there be something in the context to shew that a different meaning was intended. There is nothing of that kind here. There are next of kin of the husband and next of kin of the wife, and the testators have given their estate to the "nearest in kin of us, . . . equally." That being so, the nearest in kin of both spouses have been treated as one class, and I think the estate must be divided among that class per capita.

LORD ADAM.—No doubt the judgment proposed may produce capricious results. At the time when the deed was executed, Mrs Wilson had three brothers and three sisters alive, but now there is only one, Mrs Hogg, who claims to share in the succession. But suppose Mrs Hogg had happened to predecease the longest liver of the spouses, then that would have let in all Mrs Wilson's next of kin in the next degree, who are very numerous, some twelve or fourteen, and her next of kin would have carried off much the largest share of the estate in place of only one-fourth under the judgment proposed. But I cannot get over the words of the deed, which I think are capable of only one meaning.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the destination in the contract and mutual disposition mentioned in the case, 'to the nearest in kin of us, the said David Wilson and Isabel Wood, equally,' confers a right to the nearest in kin of both spouses as a single class, and that the succession falls to be divided equally among the whole individuals of that class."

v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The bridge, which was of wood, was in a bad state of repair, and was not of such construction as to be capable of being repaired, but required to be rebuilt.

The Road Trustees of the Lower Ward applied to the Secretary for Scotland, under the 88th section of the Act, to determine that the bridge, in respect of its accommodating other traffic than that of the city of Glasgow and the Lower Ward should be deemed to belong in common to the county or counties and burgh or burghs named in his determination.

In terms of that section commissioners were appointed to institute the local inquiry, and to report.

In the course of the inquiry a difference arose between the parties as to the construction of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and the commissioners, in respect the construction of the statute was a question which fell to be settled by a Court of law, stayed procedure to enable a special case to be submitted to the Court of Session.

A special case was thereafter submitted to the Court, to which the Road Trustees of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire were the first parties, the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow the second parties, the Road Trustees of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire the third parties, and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Rutherglen the fourth parties.

In the case the facts above set forth were admitted, and the opinion and judgment of the Court on the following questions of law was requested :—“(1) Has the Secretary of State power under the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, to determine, if he sees fit, that Dalmarnock Bridge shall be deemed to belong in common to the county of the Lower Ward of Lanark, the city of Glasgow, the county of the Middle Ward of Lanark, and the burgh of Rutherglen, and to apportion among them in his determination, in such way as he thinks right, the expense of managing, maintaining, repairing, and, if need be, rebuilding said bridge? or, Has the Secretary of State power to determine only the proportions of said expense to be borne by the third and fourth parties, and does the balance of said expense fall to be borne equally by the first and second parties? (2) In the event of it being determined by the Secretary of State that the county of the Middle Ward of Lanark and the burgh of Rutherglen are bound to contribute to the expense of rebuilding and maintaining Dalmarnock Bridge, are said county and burgh entitled to take part in the management of said bridge and to appoint representatives on the Joint Bridge Committee thereof?”

The contentions of parties were thus set forth,—“The second party maintains that the relative liabilities of the first and second parties for the expense of maintaining, managing, repairing, and, if need be, rebuild-recommend that the Secretary of State should make, setting forth therein the proportions in which such burden should be borne by the county or counties, or part or parts, or district or districts, of such county or counties, and by the burgh or burghs named in the determination.

“(5) The Secretary of State, after such further inquiry, if any, as he shall deem necessary, may approve of the draft submitted, with or without alterations, and any determination made by him under his hand and seal shall have the same effect as if it were contained in this Act: Provided,” &c.

ing the bridge, are settled by secs. 11 and 37 * of the Roads and Bridges No. 167. (Scotland) Act, 1878, and that such liabilities must remain equal to each other, and that sec. 88 of the said Act makes provision whereby 'the adjoining county, or other counties or burgh or burghs' (other than those of Lanarkshire whose liability is fixed by the local situation of the bridge), whose traffic is accommodated by the bridge, may be called upon to contribute towards such expense. The second party further maintains that the duty of the said commissioners is confined, and the determination of the Secretary of State is accordingly limited to fixing the contributions to be made by the county of the Middle Ward of Lanark and the burgh of Rutherglen towards such expense, leaving the balance thereof to be defrayed by the first and second parties equally in terms of section 37. (5) On the other hand, the first party maintains that on a sound construction of the statute the Secretary of State falls to declare that Dalmarnock Bridge shall be deemed to belong in common to the whole parties hereto, and to apportion the expenses among them severally in such proportions as may be right, having regard to the extent of the use of said bridge by the respective localities and other similar considerations; and that the commissioners ought to submit a draft determination giving effect to this view. This contention is also maintained by the third and fourth parties hereto, assuming for the purposes of this case their liability to contribute towards its rebuilding and management. (7) A difference has also arisen between the second, third, and fourth parties as to the true construction of the statute with reference to the right of the third and fourth parties to share in the management of the bridge should they be found liable to contribute towards its rebuilding and maintenance. The second party contends that the third and fourth parties have no right to share in said management. The third and fourth parties contend that in such event they have a right to take part in said management, and to appoint representatives on the Joint Bridge Committee, which falls to manage said bridge."

glen, as parties in the situation of being accommodated for their traffic by that bridge in passing and repassing the Clyde, although no portion of the bridge is built upon their property, and the question is as to the power of the Secretary of State to deal with the claims of those parties in the apportionment of their liability.

Now, there is no question raised here as to the circumstances of the case bringing these parties within the operation of the 88th section of the statute. They are agreed that in the circumstances their respective rights are to be regulated under the provisions of that section. But the town of Glasgow, the second party, maintain that although their liability is to be regulated by the provisions of that section, it is so subject to this qualification, that whatever portion of the expense of maintaining and rebuilding this bridge is laid upon the burgh of Rutherglen, and the trustees of the Middle Ward, the shares of the town of Glasgow and the Lower Ward respectively must be equal, because the 37th section expressly provides that where a bridge is locally situated in the same way as this bridge is, the town and the county respectively shall bear an equal share of the expense of maintaining or rebuilding it, and that that being so, the way in which the liability is to be dealt with under the 88th section is that the Secretary of State shall fix what in the circumstances of the case is a proper amount of contribution to be made by the town of Rutherglen and the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire for the accommodation which is afforded to them by this bridge, and having fixed that, shall then divide equally the balance which remains between the town of Glasgow and the Lower Ward. That is the contention of the town of Glasgow. The Lower Ward of the county and the third and fourth parties,—that is, Rutherglen and the Middle Ward,—maintain on the other hand that when a bridge comes within the operation of the 88th section of the statute, it is competent for the Secretary of State, in dealing with the application which may be made to him for the fixing of the expense, to fix those proportions in any way that to him may seem just.

Now, the case substantially must be ruled by the 88th section, because there is no provision under the 37th section for burghs in the position of Rutherglen here, or road trustees in the position of the Middle Ward Trustees, because having no property in the bridge, they are to be called upon to pay for the accommodation that it is supposed to afford to them, and the expense they thereby incur in the maintenance and keeping up of that bridge. But after reading this 88th section with careful consideration, although it is attended with some little dubiety, I have come to the conclusion that the contention of the town of Glasgow is not well founded. When a bridge is situated as this is, and there are only two parties interested in it and so liable for its maintenance, there is no doubt that their respective liability is fixed equally between them by the express provision of the 37th section. But where in addition to the parties upon whose property the bridge is built there are outlying portions of the county or separate burghs that are largely accommodated by the bridge, and it becomes necessary to have recourse to the 88th section of the statute, it appears to me that it is by the provisions of the 88th section that the responsibility of parties so situated is intended to be regulated, and that the words of the 88th section are sufficiently broad to entitle the Lower Ward of the county and burgh of Rutherglen, and the Middle Ward to maintain what they do maintain. Now, the section runs thus,—“Whereas there are or may be bridges in Scotland which accommodate or may accommodate the traffic not only of the county or counties, or burgh or burghs, as the case may be, within which they are locally situated, but also of the adjoining county or of other counties and burgh or burghs, or one or more of them, and it is not reasonable that the whole burden of managing, maintaining, repairing, and, if need be, rebuilding such bridges, and of paying the debt affecting or which may affect the same, should be imposed upon the county or burgh within which they are so situated: Be it enacted that in respect of such bridges the following provisions shall have effect." And subsection 1 is as follows:—"The trustees of counties and burgh authorities may agree that any such bridge accommodates other traffic than that of the county or burgh in which it is situate, and may agree as to the proportions in which the debt, if any, and the cost of maintenance, and, if need be, of rebuilding such bridge, shall be borne and defrayed by the county or counties, and burgh or burghs, to which it is common; and such agreement, when confirmed by a resolution of the trustees in general meeting, and of the burgh authorities, shall have the same force and effect as an order by the Secretary of State." Power is given to the trustees there to agree as to the proportions in which the debt is to be regulated and the expense to be maintained. Then the section goes on to provide for the case where the trustees do not agree. Under the 1st subsection it is plain they may fix amongst themselves what proportions they like, but when they do not agree then they come under the operation of subsection 2, which provides that "it shall be lawful for the county road clerk or clerk of supply of any county, or for the town-clerk or clerk of any burgh, to apply to the Secretary of State to determine that any bridge locally situated within a county or burgh, in respect of its accommodating other traffic than that of such county or burgh only, shall be deemed to belong in common to the county or counties and burgh or burghs to be named in his determination." Now, the general power given to the Secretary of State by that second subsection is that he shall declare that each particular one of these burghs or portions of counties has a common property in the bridge—that it shall belong in common to the county and the burgh. That is what he has power to do. Then the machinery is provided by which that power is to be carried out; and that is done by the third and fourth subsections. Under the third, when an application is made to the Secretary of State, he is to appoint commissioners to report to him; and then the fourth subsection provides,—“If the commissioners are of opinion that the Secretary of State should determine that the burden of managing, maintaining, repairing, and, if need be, rebuilding the bridge mentioned in the application, and of paying the debt affecting or which may affect the same, should not be borne wholly by the county or burgh within which the same is locally situated, they shall prepare and transmit along with their report the draft of the determination which they recommended that the Home Secretary should make, setting forth therein the proportions in which such burden should be borne by the county or counties, or part or parts, or district or districts, of such county or counties, and by the burgh or burghs, named in the determination.” Now, in the view I take of that fourth subsection, following upon the words in which the general nature of the inquiry is said to be to ascertain the rights of the respective parties, and the uses they are to make of the bridge,—its object being to enable the Secretary of State to decide upon the common property and use of the bridge,—it appears to me that the general words which are used in subsection 4 put it in the power of the Secretary of State, by the directions he gives to these commissioners, to decide what the proportions are that each party, however numerous they may be, who come before him, is to bear in the expenses and the burden of that bridge. I cannot read these general words in any other sense. The contention on the part of the town of Glasgow implies the writing into subsection 4 words which I do not find there, and for the use of which I think there is no authority, because what the town of Glasgow maintains is this, that the provision for adjoining counties and burghs in that section shall be read with these words introduced,—“other than those whose liability is fixed by the local situation of the bridge.” Now, there are no such words to be found in subsection 4 of section 88, but the contention of the town of Glasgow would involve the writing in of those words at the end of subsection 4, instead of its being in the general terms in which it now is. That is to say, taking the very words of their contention from the case, they would read in after the word “determination” the words “other than those whose liability is fixed by the local situation of the bridge.” That is just what the section does not contain, and it is the omission of any such special provision of that sort, keeping up what they maintain as the general provision of the 37th section, that makes me think that subsection 4 is conclusive against the claims of the town of Glasgow in this case.

We were referred to the decision of the House of Lords in Magistrates of Glasgow v. Police Commissioners of Hillhead, March 20, 1885, 12 R. 864; May 14, 1886, 13 R. (H. L.) 110; 11 App. Cas. 699, on this point, and though it was admitted that it did not rule this question, it was argued that some of the opinions of the Judges, particularly that of Lord Herschell, pointed at a construction favourable to the town of Glasgow. I have looked carefully into this question, and taking the expressions precisely as they are used, they are obiter of this question, but the expression of Lord Herschell founded on was where his Lordship dealt with the 37th section, dealing with those cases where there were only two parties,—when equal liability had to be fixed. But that leaves open the question where four sets of parties enter into the case. I agree with his Lordship in thinking that that section is conclusive on the kind of cases that alone are dealt with; but whenever that section does not rule,—and it does not rule here any more than it ruled in the case of Hillhead,—I do not think you can import into it a general provision of that sort, made to meet a set of circumstances very different from that for which the 88th section provides. On that ground I come to the conclusion that the contention of the town of Glasgow is not well founded, and that the first alternative of the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

There still remains the second question, as to the expenses of management. If I am right on the first question, the Secretary of State will hold that this bridge is the common property, not of the town of Glasgow and the Lower Ward, but of the town of Glasgow, the Lower Ward, the Middle Ward, and the burgh of Rutherglen; and that being so, it appears to me that if they are jointly responsible in certain proportions for the expense of maintaining or rebuilding that bridge, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence that these new proprietors who are brought in shall have a say in the management of the bridge that they are to pay for, and therefore the Magistrates of Rutherglen and the trustees of the Middle Ward are entitled to be represented on the board of management of this bridge which is provided for by the earlier sections of this statute. As they are to have a considerable burden laid upon them, they are entitled to have a voice as to how those management expenses are to be applied, and I think we must answer the second question by saying that they are entitled to take part in the management, subject to the rules of the statute.

LORD SHAND.—I think it is the result of the decision in the case of the Hillhead Commissioners—as I am of opinion that is also the effect of the statute—that section 37 applies only to a case where the liability for the maintenance and repair of a bridge rests on the authorities within whose localities or districts the bridge is situated, and does not apply to what in the former case was described as outside traffic, by which I mean a case in which the authorities who furnish outside traffic, and who have no property in the bridge, may be called upon to contribute to the maintenance of it. Where you have, as under section 37, the liability confined to the local authorities within whose districts the bridge is situated, the statute expressly provides for equal liability. I suppose that provision will have effect in almost every case in Scotland as directed against two parties, and two only, where outside traffic is not brought in; but there may be cases in which a bridge may be locally situated within three districts. There again section 37 applies, because the bridge is locally within these different localities, and again the provision of the statute applies that in that case there shall be equal liability, which in the case I have figured would be a tripartite liability. Again, in regard to the management of such bridges, you have also as part of section 37 a provision that the management, failing agreement, shall be vested in a committee (hereafter called the joint bridge committee) to be appointed by the trustees or local authorities chargeable with the cost of maintenance or rebuilding. The management is to be co-ordinate and commensurate with the liability, and if there be no outside traffic, then the liability being equal upon the part of those who are owners of the bridge, the management must be represented in the same way. And we find that by section 39 there are provisions for the appointment of a joint bridge committee to be appointed annually, in which it is provided that each road authority may appoint not more than five persons to be members of that committee, but further, that in the event of any question falling to be determined by votes, each road authority shall jointly have one vote, and one vote only on the board.

Now, that rule, which is limited to the case where the liability arises from the local situation of the bridge only, seems a very reasonable rule to be adopted in that general case. The statute might have provided that there should be commissioners in every case to determine whether there should be a measure of liability because one of these authorities took rather more use of the bridge than another; but one can very well see that it was a much more expedient and a much better plan in a case of that kind, where you had the marked feature of direct property in the bridge, that a somewhat rough-and-ready rule should be taken, and that the liability should be declared to be equal. When we come to the other set of provisions, which are intended to regulate not merely the case of traffic such as I have figured but the case of outside traffic—where counties that have no real property, or burghs that have no real property in a bridge are yet using it extensively, so extensively that it may be they are taking the chief use of it—when we come to deal with that, I think we have an entirely new set of provisions as to liability altogether; and there, I think, comes in the provision of the statute, that as there are different elements to be taken into view, the Secretary of State, with the benefit of a report by commissioners, shall settle the proportions in which the different contributors of traffic shall bear the expense of maintenance and management of the bridge. And the general view I take of section 88, which I think is entirely borne out by the decision in the case of the Hillhead Commissioners, is simply this, that while section 37 is intended for the class of bridges I have first referred to, so section 88 is intended to form in itself practically a code with reference to the bridges which are in this position, that outside counties or burghs are to be called upon to contribute.

Now, taking that to be so, I am entirely of the opinion which my brother Lord Mure has expressed, and I adopt entirely the observations which his Lordship has made. It appears to me that the contention of the parties to this case, other than the town of Glasgow, is sound, and that this is clear upon several grounds, which may be gathered from the provisions of section 88. In the first place, it is of importance to notice that under subsection 2 it becomes the duty of the Secretary of State, where there is an application made to him to determine that a bridge is accommodating other traffic than that of the county or burgh in which it is situated,—it is his duty, in the order which he makes, to name in his determination the whole of the bodies that are to contribute to the building and maintenance of the bridge. I say that is of importance, because it will be observed that the words with which subsection 2 concludes, “to be named in his determination,” are again to be found at the end of subsection 4, where their importance is great. The application having been presented to the Secretary of State, what he is called upon to determine is this, “to determine that any bridge locally situated within a county or burgh, in respect of its accommodating other traffic than that of such county or burgh only, shall be deemed to belong in common to the county or counties and burgh or burghs to be named in his determination.” The determination will not be complete by merely naming the two outside burghs or counties that contribute outside traffic. The clause is so framed that he must name all the parties in his determination to whom this bridge is to belong in common, because if he proceeded only to name two of these, he would not be stating the persons to whom the bridge is to belong in common. He requires to exhaust the whole of them. In the next place, you not only get the authorities within whose district the bridge is situated so named, and the authorities contributing traffic, but you get this further declaration by the Secretary of State, that the bridge shall be deemed to belong in common to these different parties. Of course that determination does not transfer the property of the bridge. The property remains as before; but for the purposes of this statute in reference to maintenance and contribution it shall be deemed to belong in common to these as well as to the bodies to whom it really does belong. But it seems to me to go a very long way in the determination of this case, upon the question of expense of building, maintenance, and management, if you find that there is a determination that the bridge belongs in common to these four different parties—is to be deemed to belong to them, so that they shall have at all events the responsibilities, if not the full rights, of proprietors of the bridge; so there again you have a second feature which is of importance here. But, of course, the question ultimately comes to turn upon subsection 4. Subsection 3 provides that the Secretary of State shall have the assistance of two persons as commissioners, who shall institute a local inquiry; and subsection 4 provides that “if the commissioners are of opinion that the Secretary of State should determine that the burden of managing, maintaining, repairing, and if need be rebuilding, the bridge mantioned in the application, and of paying the debt affecting or which may affect the same, should not be borne wholly by the county or burgh within which the same is locally situated, they shall prepare and transmit along with their report the draft of the determination which they recommend that the Secretary of State should make, setting forth therein the proportions in which such burden should be borne by the county or counties, or part or parts, or district or districts, of such county or counties, and by the burgh or burghs, named in the determination." Now, I have shewn that all of the parties must be named in the determination, and if the commissioners are to report to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State is to report to Parliament, the names of those who are to contribute, he is further to report the proportions in which such burden should be borne by those different bodies so named. How is it possible to read that in this way, that in regard to two of those—the two who are proprietors of the bridge on each side—the proportions are already fixed? That would be introducing into the statute an element for which there is no warrant. The Secretary of State, through those commissioners, is to fix the proportion of each of them, and as Lord Mure has observed, in order to give effect to the argument for the city of Glasgow, one would require to introduce limiting terms indicating that the proportions of two of them have already been fixed, and fixed irrevocably, by the statute. It think it is impossible to take, and so far as I am concerned I cannot take, that view. I think that in regard to the whole of this class of bridges the statute has introduced a new and different element—probably an element in which there is greater equity than that which applies to section 37, viz., the element of what is fair and reasonable in the circumstances, looking to the traffic which each of these four bodies contributes; and I think it is clear, on the grounds I have now stated, that the Secretary of State has the power to fix the proportions in which each of the different bodies shall contribute, upon principles which shall commend themselves to his mind as fair and reasonable. He may very well, so far as he thinks right, take into view the previous provision in section 37 as applicable to bridges in the position to which that section applies as an element in his mind in fixing what is reasonable as a proportion when he comes to deal with such a case as we have before us, but I hold that under this statute he is absolutely entitled and bound to exercise a reasonable discretion in fixing the fair burden as applicable to each of these bodies, and I think that is a very fair and reasonable thing to be done in such circumstances.

I have only to add upon this part of the case that I think the view which Lord Mure has stated of the statute, and with which I concur, is very much borne out by subsection 1, which gives the whole of the different bodies in such a position as the present the power of making agreements, and, instead of reporting to the Secretary of State, of arranging amongst themselves to avoid the expense and delay in bringing the machinery of the other subsections into operation, and of fixing the proportions. I can see nothing to prevent any of these bodies from entering into an arrangement by which they may fix the amounts at any proportion they think fit, or bind themselves down to this, that the contributions of two of them shall stand in a certain proportion.

The only other question in the case is that which relates to management, and here undoubtedly we are confronted with the difficulty—I do not think it a serious or important one—that in section 88 we have no direct provision for management. On the other hand, we start with this, from section 88, that if,
